The Respondent's defense to the summary judgment motion and 8(a)(5) complaint here is, quite simply, a reiteration of the same argument about Board precedent and the appropriate bargaining unit that was twice made and twice rejected by the Board in the underlying representation proceeding, Case 10–RC–12709. The third time around, however, my colleagues in the majority now see an unspecified conflict in Board law where none was seen before, even though the Respondent has consistently alleged it. Consequently, the majority will permit reconsideration and relitigation of a representation proceeding bargaining unit issue in the absence of newly discovered evidence, an intervening change in Board law, or any other genuine special circumstance which would require the Board to reconsider its earlier decisions. This decision derogates the Board's well-established policy against relitigation of representation issues in an 8(a)(5) case,[1] creates uncertainty about the finality of Board election procedures, encourages incessant litigation, and thereby contravenes the statutory scheme for the promotion of stability in labor relations.[2] The majority fails to acknowledge that the Respondent has exhausted its appeals in this administrative forum. It should now be required to recognize and bargain with the certified union in the unit found appropriate or to challenge the Board's unit determination before a Federal court of appeals.

The question whether relitigation is proper here subsumes the question whether a conflict in Board law exists; the majority erroneously suggests the reverse. To repeat, the Board has twice considered and rejected the argument that a conflict exists. It settled the issue of law for this case. Had my colleagues participated in those actions, the outcome would undoubtedly have been different. Before stating now that they see a conflict where their predecessors did not, however, they must identify some independent reason for even looking at the issue. They have not done so.[3]

[3] Thus, contrary to our dissenting colleague, we do not believe that we are required to cite "precedent which holds as a matter of law that a separate mechanics' unit cannot be found appropriate" in order to deny a motion for summary judgment.

[3] I note parenthetically that the majority has failed to cite any precedent which holds as a matter of law that a separate mechanics' unit cannot be found appropriate.

Local Union No. 7, International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and Bellingham Division, Georgia-Pacific Corporation and Bellingham Stevedoring Co. and Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers. Case 19–CD–415

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

Upon a charge filed 16 December 1982 by Bellingham Division, Georgia-Pacific Corporation (the Employer), and duly served on Local Union No. 7, International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (the Respondent or ILWU), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 19, issued a complaint and notice of hearing dated 24 August 1983, an amended complaint and notice of hearing dated 28 December 1983, and a second amended complaint and notice of hearing dated 10 January 1984 against the Respondent, alleging that the Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act. Copies of the charge, the complaint and notice of hearing, and the amended complaints and notices of hearing were duly served on the parties.

The complaint, as amended, alleges that since about 8 August 1983 the Respondent has failed and refused to comply with the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute[1] in the underlying 10(k) proceeding, which awarded the work to the Employer's employees who were represented by Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers. The complaint also alleges that since about 8 August 1983 the Respondent has failed and refused to notify the Regional Director that it will comply with the above-mentioned Decision and Determination of Dispute although it has been afforded a fair opportunity to do so. The complaint further alleges that commencing in September 1981, and for subsequent unloading operations since, the Respondent has filed grievances under its collective-bargaining agreement with Bellingham Stevedoring Co. (Bellingham Stevedoring), claiming "in-lieu-of" pay from Bellingham Stevedoring for the work in dispute, and that subsequent to the issuance of the above-mentioned 10(k) decision the Respondent has filed new grievances claiming in-lieu-of pay for such work. The complaint alleges that an object of the above acts and conduct by the Respondent is, and has been, to force or require the Employer to assign the work described in the 10(k) award to employees of Bellingham Stevedoring who are represented by the Respondent rather than to the Employer's employees who are represented by AWPPW.

The Respondent filed an answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations of the amended complaint and raising certain affirmative defenses. The Respondent admits the allegations that it failed to notify the Regional Director that it would comply with the Board's 10(k) decision, but contends that the Board lacked jurisdiction in the underlying 10(k) proceeding because the facts did not present a jurisdictional dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) and Section 8(b)(4)(D). The Respondent also admits the allegation that it filed grievances claiming in-lieu-of pay for the work in dispute, but contends that its claims for in-lieu-of pay do not have an object proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) and are not coercive within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(D). The Respondent further contends that the Board is without authority to order the Respondent to cease and desist from filing the in-lieu-of claims.

On 18 January 1984 the parties filed a stipulation and motion to transfer the proceeding to the Board. The parties agreed that the stipulation of facts, the formal papers, the transcript and exhibits from the hearing previously held in the underlying 10(k) proceeding, and the arbitrator's award involving the work referred to in the stipulation of facts constitute the entire record in this case, and that no oral testimony is necessary or desired by any of the parties. The parties also waived a hearing before an administrative law judge and the issuance of an administrative law judge's decision, and stated their desire to submit the case directly to the Board for findings of fact and conclusions of law.

On 9 March 1984 the Board approved the stipulation, made it a part of the record, and transferred the proceeding to and continued the proceeding before the Board for the purpose of making findings of fact and conclusions of law for the issuance of a Decision and Order. Thereafter, the General Counsel, the Respondent, and the Employer filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the stipulation, the briefs, and the entire record, and makes the following

[1] 267 NLRB 26 (1983).

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, a Georgia corporation, manufactures pulp, paper, and chemical products at its facility in Bellingham, Washington, where it annually sells and ships goods and materials directly to points outside the State of Washington valued in excess of $50,000, and purchases goods and materials directly from points outside the State of Washington valued in excess of $50,000.

We find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that ILWU and AWPPW are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

The Employer receives bulk shipments of salt about 14 times a year at its dock facilities in Bellingham, Washington. In a typical unloading operation prior to September 1981, cranes located in the hold of the ship were used to scoop the salt out and into a hopper on the dock, from where the salt was transported on a series of conveyor belts to a salt pad. At the salt pad, a shuttle conveyor was used to distribute the salt evenly over the pad. ILWU members employed by Bellingham Stevedoring operated the cranes on the ship, while the Employer's AWPPW-represented employees operated the conveyor belts, including the shuttle conveyor.

Around September 1981 the Employer decided to cease using the shuttle conveyor and instead to use bulldozers on top of the salt pad during unloadings. Following a meeting between the Employer and AWPPW officials, the Employer agreed to use its AWPPW-represented employees to operate the bulldozers. During the first unloading in September 1981, ILWU protested to Bellingham Stevedoring that under the Pacific Coast Longshore Contract Document (PCLCD), to which Bellingham Stevedoring was a party by virtue of being a member of the Pacific Maritime Association (PMA), ILWU members should have been ordered from the dispatch hall to operate the bulldozers used on top of the salt pad. ILWU filed a grievance under the PCLCD seeking monetary payments (in-lieu-of pay) as compensation for not getting the assignment of work. During all subsequent unloadings at the dock, AWPPW-represented employees continued to operate the bulldozers used on top of the salt pad, and ILWU continued to file grievances or claims for in-lieu-of pay. At some point, Bellingham Stevedoring approached the Employer about acting as a contractor for the work on top of the salt pad, but the Employer rejected the request. Meanwhile, ILWU's grievances proceeded through the various steps of the PCLCD grievance procedure until they were submitted for arbitration in late 1982. When AWPPW learned that the ILWU grievances had been referred to an arbitrator, it advised the Employer by letter dated 6 December 1982 that it would "take whatever action it determines is necessary—up to and including work stoppage—to assure that [the bulldozer operator] jobs remain covered by the AWPPW and its Local Union as they have in the past."

On 16 December the Employer filed the instant charge alleging that both ILWU and AWPPW violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act. A 10(k) hearing was held on 8 February 1983, and on 8 August 1983 the Board issued its Decision and Determination of Dispute in which it found reasonable cause to believe that both AWPPW and ILWU violated Section 8(b)(4)(D). Regarding ILWU, the Board based its finding of reasonable cause on ILWU's filing of grievances against Bellingham Stevedoring. Relying on evidence that Bellingham Stevedoring had no control over the work in dispute and that ILWU members never had performed the work in dispute, the Board rejected ILWU's "work preservation" defense and found reasonable cause to believe that ILWU's grievances had an object of applying indirect pressure on the Employer to assign the disputed work to ILWU-represented employees. On the merits, the Board concluded that the Employer's AWPPW-represented employees were entitled to perform the work in dispute based on, inter alia: the Employer's practice, assignment, and preference; relative skills and training; and economy and efficiency of operations. The Board also determined that ILWU was not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) to force or require the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees represented by that labor organization. The Board's decision further ordered ILWU to notify within 10 days the Regional Director, in writing, whether it would refrain from engaging in the proscribed conduct.

The parties' stipulation of facts indicates that subsequent to the 10(k) hearing, but prior to the issuance of the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute, an arbitrator's opinion and decision issued favorable to ILWU's position under the PCLCD. That decision, attached as an exhibit to the stipulation, indicates that on 10 February 1983, after a hearing in which ILWU and PMA participated, Washington Area Arbitrator Forrester decided that the dispute regarding ILWU's in-lieu-of claims turned "on the determination of control of cargo." Although noting PMA's position that Bellingham Stevedoring's control of the cargo ends when the cargo is dumped into the hopper on the dock, the arbitrator nevertheless found that the salt discharge operation is a continuous movement of cargo from the ship to the place of rest on the salt pad, and held:

> Regardless of the Agreement between Bellingham Stevedoring Company and Georgia Pacific, the [PMA] Employers are required to maintain control of the cargo in the continuous movement to sustain the integrity of the Agreement between the ILWU and the PMA as to the work to be performed by ILWU members.

He therefore concluded that the "work opportunity in contention is longshore work," but further held that "time-in-lieu"[2] was not payable for ILWU's claims made prior to the issuance of his decision.

The stipulation of facts further indicates that pursuant to the arbitrator's decision Bellingham Stevedoring and the PMA honored and paid ILWU's claims for in-lieu-of pay dated subsequent to that decision. Bellingham Stevedoring and the PMA refused, however, to honor ILWU's claims for in-lieu-of pay on or after the issuance date of the Board's 10(k) decision.

B. Contentions of the Parties

The Respondent contends, as a procedural matter, that the Board's finding of reasonable cause in the 10(k) proceeding is not binding in a subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding and therefore it is entitled to a de novo review of the complaint allegation that its filing of in-lieu-of claims was violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D).[3] The Respondent reiterates its contention from the 10(k) proceeding that its resort to the contractual grievance procedure on an issue involving work jurisdiction is the agreed-on method of resolving disputes under the PCLCD and thus is not threatening or coercive within the meaning of the Act. In this regard, the Respondent also reiterates that its claims for in-lieu-of pay were directed solely to Bellingham Stevedoring and the PMA, not to the Employer, and that its purpose in making the claims was to preserve for its members a remedy for lost work opportunities caused by Bellingham Stevedoring's violation of the PCLCD. Finally, the Respondent contends that the Supreme Court's opinion in Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. NLRB, 103 S.Ct. 2161 (1983), precludes the Board from holding that ILWU's filing of in-lieu-of claims under its contractual grievance procedure constitutes an unfair labor practice which may be enjoined.

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent's argument that its claims for in-lieu-of pay do not constitute unlawful pressure to obtain a jurisdictional assignment was previously litigated and, in the absence of newly discovered evidence or a change in the law, should not be reconsidered in this proceeding. The General Counsel also contends that the instant case is controlled by Longshoremen ILWU Local 32 (Weyerhaeuser Co.), 271 NLRB 759 (1984), which was pending before the Board at the time the instant case was transferred to the Board. The General Counsel further contends that the Respondent's demands for in-lieu-of pay from Bellingham Stevedoring effectively constitute a demand for the disputed work in violation of the 10(k) award. Finally, the General Counsel contends that the Respondent's admitted refusal to commit itself in writing to comply with the Board's 10(k) order is inconsistent with the Respondent's contention that it has not demanded the disputed work and constitutes a separate Section 8(b)(4)(D) violation. The Employer takes a position consistent with that of the General Counsel.

C. Discussion

As indicated above, in the Decision and Determination of Dispute we found reasonable cause to believe that ILWU's filing of in-lieu-of grievances against Bellingham Stevedoring had an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees represented by ILWU and that ILWU thereby was engaging in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(D). We determined that ILWU was not entitled to use proscribed means to force or require the Employer to assign the disputed work to members of ILWU, and we further directed ILWU to advise the Regional Director in writing whether or not it would abide by the 10(k) determination.

In this proceeding it is undisputed that ILWU has continued to file grievances against Bellingham Stevedoring seeking in-lieu-of pay for the work at issue herein. It also is undisputed that ILWU has failed to notify the Regional Director in writing that it would comply with the 10(k) determination although, as indicated above,[4] ILWU has denied that it did not comply with the 10(k) determination. The Board has held that engaging in the same or similar conduct which constituted the basis for a 10(k) determination constitutes proof of noncompliance with the 10(k) determination.[5] Moreover, the Board has required actual performance of the written notice requirement of the 10(k) determination.[6] We therefore find, contrary to ILWU's denials, that ILWU has not complied with the 10(k) determination.

[2] "Time-in-lieu" appears to be used interchangeably with "in-lieu-of" for monetary claims made under the PCLCD.

[3] The Respondent admits that it did not notify the Regional Director that it would comply with the Board's 10(k) decision. It contends, however, that because it has not engaged in any conduct proscribed by Sec. 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) there is no basis for requiring a written assurance of compliance with the 10(k) decision; that there is nothing coercive or threatening about failing to send a letter; and that, even assuming that its failure to notify the Regional Director constitutes a technical violation, such conduct does not warrant a remedial order.

Having determined that the Respondent has not complied with the 10(k) determination, we turn now to the merits of the complaint allegation that ILWU, by not complying with the 10(k) determination and filing in-lieu-of grievances against Bellingham Stevedoring, engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D).

In its first affirmative defense and in its brief, the ILWU seeks to place in issue the existence of a jurisdictional dispute. A review of the record in the 10(k) proceeding indicates that this issue was raised and litigated in the 10(k) proceeding. As the Board stated in Plaza Glass, above,[7] "It is settled that issues raised and litigated in a 10(k) proceeding may not be relitigated in a subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding, alleging violations of Section 8(b)(4)(D) which are based in part on factual determinations made in the 10(k) proceeding." Therefore, we find no merit in the Respondent's first affirmative defense.

In its second affirmative defense and in its brief, ILWU seeks to place in issue the Board's finding in the 10(k) proceeding that an object of its filing of in-lieu-of grievances against Bellingham Stevedoring was to force or require the Employer to assign the disputed work to members of ILWU. In support of its position, ILWU reiterates its argument from the 10(k) proceeding that its sole purpose in making the in-lieu-of claims was to preserve for its members a remedy for Bellingham Stevedoring's continued violations of the PCLCD. ILWU also relies on Arbitrator Forrester's decision in its favor as further evidence that its filing of grievances was based on a legitimate contractual claim.

As we found in the 10(k) proceeding, however, ILWU's in-lieu-of claims were for the amount that ILWU members would have earned if they, and not the Employer's AWPPW-represented employees, had been assigned the work in dispute. We also found, based on evidence that Bellingham Stevedoring had no control over the disputed work and that ILWU members never had been assigned such work, that ILWU's grievances did not have a "work preservation" object but rather were designed to induce Bellingham Stevedoring to put pressure on the Employer to reassign the disputed work to ILWU members. The post-10(k) hearing issuance of Arbitrator Forrester's decision does not warrant a different finding regarding ILWU's object. Neither the Employer nor AWPPW participated in or was bound by that arbitration proceeding.[8] Furthermore, it is well settled that a 10(k) determination by the Board takes precedence over an arbitrator's contrary award.[9] Thus, although Arbitrator Forrester's award upheld ILWU's contractual claims, it does not alter the facts that Bellingham Stevedoring had no control over the work in dispute and that such work remained at all material times under the sole control of the Employer.

The consequences of ILWU's conduct are also relevant to our determination of its object. It is obvious that Bellingham Stevedoring will suffer economically if it is compelled to pay wages for work not performed by its employees every time a shipment of salt is unloaded for the Employer at the Bellingham dock. Inevitably, to avoid the continuing imposition of such a wage liability, Bellingham Stevedoring would cease doing business with the Employer or otherwise exert pressure on the Employer to force or require the Employer to change its assignment of work.[10]

In these circumstances, we find that ILWU has used the filing of in-lieu-of grievances under the PCLCD as an economic device against Bellingham Stevedoring with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign the disputed work to ILWU members.[11] We further find that ILWU's conduct in filing the in-lieu-of grievances amounted to prohibited economic coercion.[12] Therefore, we reject ILWU's second affirmative defense.

[7] See also Teamsters Local 445 (Blount Bros.), 197 NLRB 46, 51 (1972).

[8] Thus, even if the arbitrator's award had issued prior to the 10(k) hearing, or if it had been brought to the Board's attention while the 10(k) decision was pending, the Board would have afforded it little or no weight in determining the dispute.

> Once the NLRB decides a work assignment dispute, its determination takes precedence over a contrary arbitrator's award. Carey v. Westinghouse Corp., 375 U.S. 261, 84 S.Ct. 401, 11 L.Ed.2d 320 (1964); NLRB v. Radio & Television Broadcast Engineers, supra; New Orleans Typographical Union No. 17 v. NLRB, 368 F.2d 755 (5th Cir. 1966). This is true regardless of which action was initiated first. Dock Loaders and Unloaders, ILA Local No. 854 v. Richeson & Sons, Inc., 280 F.Supp 402 (E.D.La.1968). In Carey, the Court specifically noted that where a NLRB determination and an arbitrator's award conflict, the former's ruling would take precedence. Further, "[t]he superior authority of the Board may be invoked at any time." 375 U.S. at 272, 84 S.Ct. at 409. Accord, New Orleans Typographical, supra.

[12] See Teamsters Local 85 (Pacific Maritime), 224 NLRB 801, 805-806 (1976). See also Weyerhaeuser, above.

Based on all of the foregoing, we conclude that, by filing the in-lieu-of grievances, ILWU has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D). We also conclude that, by filing new in-lieu-of grievances after the issuance of the Board's 10(k) determination and failing to notify the Regional Director in writing that it would comply with the 10(k) determination, ILWU has failed to comply with the Decision and Determination of Dispute and thereby has continued to engage in conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D).[13]

Finally, regarding ILWU's third affirmative defense that, based on the Supreme Court's decision in Bill Johnson's, above, the Board is without authority to enjoin it from filing its in-lieu-of claims, we find that the Board's recent decision in Weyerhaeuser is controlling. In Weyerhaeuser, the Board rejected the respondent's argument that Bill Johnson's compelled a stay of the 8(b)(4)(D) proceedings until such time as the courts resolved the respondent's Section 301 suit seeking time-in-lieu payments pursuant to an arbitration award.[14] Relying on Carey v. Westinghouse, above, the Board found that the Section 301 suit, "which seeks to enforce an arbitration award contrary to the Board's 10(k) award and also seeks to achieve a prohibited objective," lacked a reasonable basis in fact and law and therefore did not require a stay of the unfair labor practice proceedings. Based on the same reasoning, we reject the Respondent's third affirmative defense and shall order the appropriate injunctive relief.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Bellingham Division, Georgia-Pacific Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local Union No. 7, International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act by: filing in-lieu-of claims for work performed by members of AWPPW with an object of forcing or requiring the Employer to assign the work, described below, to employees represented by ILWU rather than to employees represented by AWPPW; and by failing and refusing to comply with the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute reported at 267 NLRB 26 (1983). The work consists of:

> The operation of bulldozers for the purpose of piling salt on a salt pad owned by the Employer and located on a pier leased to the Employer, during times when ships and barges containing salt to be deposited on that pad are being unloaded at the pier by employees of Bellingham Stevedoring Company who are represented by ILWU.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. We also shall order the Respondent to reimburse Bellingham Stevedoring Company and the Pacific Maritime Association for any in-lieu-of claims paid to the Respondent pursuant to Washington Area Arbitrator Forrester's award of 10 February 1983, with interest computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[15]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Local Union No. 7, International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Bellingham, Washington, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Filing in-lieu-of claims for work performed by members of Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers with an object of forcing or requiring Bellingham Division, Georgia-Pacific Corporation to assign the work described below to employees represented by Local Union No. 7, International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union rather than to employees represented by Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers. [14] In Weyerhaeuser, the Board's "reasonable cause" finding in the underlying 10(k) proceeding was based on a work stoppage by the union, a sister local of the Respondent in the instant case. After the Board's 10(k) decision, reported at 256 NLRB 167 (1981), an arbitrator ruled in favor of the union's claim that the work in dispute should have been assigned to its members and that its claim for time-in-lieu payments under the PCLCD should be sustained. The union thereafter submitted time-in-lieu claims against the employer, Jones, but none of these were paid. The union subsequently filed a Section 301 suit to enforce the arbitration award and to require PMA to pay damages in an amount equal to the time-in-lieu payments referred to in the arbitration award.

(b) Refusing to comply with the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute reported at 267 NLRB 26 (1983).

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Withdraw and cease filing in-lieu-of claims for the above-described work performed by members of Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers.

(b) Reimburse Bellingham Stevedoring Company and the Pacific Maritime Association for any in-lieu-of claims paid to the Respondent pursuant to Washington Area Arbitrator Forrester's award of 10 February 1983.

(c) Post at its office and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[16] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and mail sufficient copies of the notice to the Regional Director for posting by Bellingham Division, Georgia-Pacific Corporation, if it is willing, at all locations on the jobsite where notices to its employees customarily are posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT file "in-lieu-of" claims for work performed by members of Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers with an object of forcing or requiring Bellingham Division, Georgia-Pacific Corporation to assign the work described below to employees represented by our labor organization rather than to employees represented by Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers. The work consists of:

> The operation of bulldozers for the purpose of piling salt on a salt pad owned by the Employer and located on a pier leased to the Employer, during times when ships and barges containing salt to be deposited on that pad are being unloaded at the pier by employees of Bellingham Stevedoring Company who are represented by ILWU.

WE WILL NOT refuse to comply with the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute reported at 267 NLRB 26 (1983).

WE WILL withdraw and cease filing in-lieu-of claims for the above-described work performed by Local Union No. 194, Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers.

WE WILL reimburse Bellingham Stevedoring Company and the Pacific Maritime Association for any in-lieu-of claims paid to our labor organization pursuant to Washington Area Arbitrator Forrester's award of 10 February 1983, with interest.

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 3 August 1983 Administrative Law Judge Roger B. Holmes issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed a reply brief to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Jake McWhorter, d/b/a McWhorter Trucking, Lakewood, Colorado, his agents, successors, or assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following as paragraph 2(d).

"(d) Make whole the unit employees who have incurred losses of wages and benefits because of the Respondent's failure to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union. Such monetary amounts are to be computed in accordance with the Board's decision in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest as prescribed in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962); Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977); and Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980). In addition, the Respondent shall pay the contractually agreed-upon trust funds in the amounts of the contributions which the Respondent failed to make on behalf of the Respondent's unit employees in accordance with Fox Painting Co., 263 NLRB 437 (1982), and Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979), and reimburse unit employees for any expenses ensuing from the Respondent's unlawful failure to make such contributions, with interest."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

I WILL NOT tell employees to tell representatives of Teamsters Construction Workers Local Union No. 13 that the employees do not want to be represented by the Union any more and for the union representatives to leave the employees alone and stay off their jobs, and I WILL NOT tell employees that any employee who talks to a union representative will be discharged immediately.

I WILL NOT tell an employee that he would be discharged immediately if he rejoined the Union.

I WILL NOT terminate an employee from employment and fail and refuse to reinstate him because of the employee's union membership and activities.

I WILL NOT fail and refuse to meet and bargain in good faith with Teamsters Construction Workers Local Union No. 13 concerning the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the unit described below:

> All employees employed by Jake McWhorter d/b/a McWhorter Trucking or d/b/a J & B Trucking, at the Lakewood, Colorado, location, engaged in the performance of highway, heavy engineering, utility and building construction, but excluding office clerical employees, guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

I WILL NOT repudiate my contract with the Union and negotiate directly with my employees in the unit described above.

I WILL NOT unilaterally grant a wage increase to my employees in the unit described above. I will recognize and, on request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above, and I WILL abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

I WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce my employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by the Act.

[1] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's statements violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act, we rely on Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984).

[2] We expand the judge's recommended Order remedying the Respondent's failure to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement to include reimbursement of any losses directly attributable to its withholding of contributions under the parties' trust fund agreement, as set forth in Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981).

I WILL make whole Donald Lambuth for his monetary loss, including appropriate interest on such money, which has resulted from the termination of Lambuth from employment on 27 July 1982 and the failure and refusal to reinstate him.

I WILL expunge from my files any reference to the termination of Donald Lambuth on 27 July 1982, and I WILL notify him, in writing, that I have done so, and that evidence of his termination from employment will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

I WILL offer immediate and full reinstatement to Donald Lambuth to his former position of employment without the loss of his seniority or other benefits but, if his former position of employment no longer exists, then I WILL offer him a substantially equivalent position of employment without the loss of his seniority or other benefits.

I WILL make whole the unit employees who have incurred losses of wages and benefits because of the failure to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. Such monetary amounts, and appropriate interest thereon, will be computed in accordance with National Labor Relations Board decisions. In addition, I WILL pay the contractually agreed-upon trust funds in the amounts of the contributions which were not made on behalf of my employees and reimburse employees for any expenses ensuing from the unlawful failure to make such contributions, and interest thereon will be computed in accordance with NLRB decisions.

JAKE MCWHORTER, D/B/A MCWHORTER TRUCKING

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROGER B. HOLMES, Administrative Law Judge. The unfair labor practice charge in this case was filed and served on September 3, 1982, by Teamsters Construction Workers Local Union No. 13.

The General Counsel's complaint was issued on October 19, 1982, against Jake McWhorter, d/b/a McWhorter Trucking. The General Counsel alleges that the Respondent has engaged in conduct which violates Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. In the answer to the complaint allegations, the Respondent denied the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices and also raised certain affirmative defenses.

The trial in this proceeding was held on February 24 and 25, 1983, at Denver, Colorado. The time for the filing of posttrial briefs was set for April 1, 1983. Both the General Counsel and the attorney for the Respondent filed briefs. At footnote 3 on page 9 of the posttrial brief filed by for the General Counsel, a motion is made to correct the transcript of the trial proceedings in three respects. In the absence of any objection, the General Counsel's motion is hereby granted.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

From October 1978 through the end of 1981, Jake McWhorter was doing business as the sole proprietor of McWhorter Trucking. He was engaged in the business of hauling dirt, sand, and gravel. He maintained an office at Lakewood, Colorado.

According to McWhorter, he changed the name of his busines to J & B Trucking about the beginning of 1982. (See Tr. 26–27.) He remained the sole proprietor of his business and also the highest level supervisor. J & B Trucking was engaged in the business of hauling dirt, sand, and gravel. McWhorter employed at J & B Trucking most of the same employees that he had at McWhorter Trucking. McWhorter explained at transcript page 28, "I tried to retain all. There was two people that quit."

J & B Trucking used the same equipment as McWhorter Trucking had used in its business operations. The equipment consisted of five tandem dump trucks, a front end loader, and a trailer.

At the outset of the trial proceedings, the Respondent's answer to paragraphs II(c) and (d) of the General Counsel's complaint was amended to admit those allegations. (See Tr. 7.) They are:

> (c) The Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations annually performs services valued at in excess of $50,000 directly for other employers within the State of Colorado, each of which in turn annually purchases and receives goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points and places outside the State of Colorado.
> (d) The Respondent is now, and at all times material herein has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6) and (7) of the Act.

According to McWhorter's testimony at the trial, his business operations had ceased prior to the time of the trial, he had no employees, and he was unemployed. (See Tr. 26.)

In addition to the foregoing, the Respondent's answer to paragraph III of the General Counsel's complaint was amended at the trial to admit that allegation. (See Tr. 7 and 8.) Paragraph III of that document alleges:

> The Union is now, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE WITNESSES AND CREDIBILITY RESOLUTIONS

Five persons were called as witnesses at the trial of this proceeding. In alphabetical order by their last names, they are: Delbert Bixler, who is a business agent of the Charging Party Union; Robert C. Easdon, who is a vice president of the Charging Party Union; Donald Lambuth, who is the alleged discriminatee in this case;

Jake McWhorter, who is the owner of the Resoondent; and Frank Edward Scoles, who is a former truckdriver employee of the Respondent.

At the trial, the ruling was made to sequester the witnesses in accordance with the provisions of Rule 615 of the Federal Rules of Evidence and to apply the holding of the Board in its decision in Unga Painting Corp., 237 NLRB 1306 (1978). (See the discussion at Tr. 8–22.)

In setting forth the findings of fact in this decision, I will base those credited facts on portions of the testimony given by each one of the five witnesses. In addition, certain findings of fact will be based on documentary evidence introduced bv the parties at the trial. In making these findings, I have given consideration to the demeanor of the witnesses, the consistency or the inconsistency of portions of their testimony with the accounts given by other witnesses, the basis for the witnesses' knowledge of the matters about which he testified, and the probability of the testimony in light of other credited or undisputed facts.

The testimony given by McWhorter was relatively brief. (See Tr. 23–35.) Some of his testimony has been referred to in section I of this decision. Most of the testimony by the other four witnesses pertaining to statements made by McWhorter and other actions taken by McWhorter were not contradicted or disputed by McWhorter. There is a significant conflict between McWhorter and Lambuth as to whether Lambuth voluntarily quit his employment with McWhorter on July 27, 1982, or whether McWhorter terminated Lambuth. McWhorter stated that Lambuth quit his employment at that time. (See Tr. 33.) Lambuth's version is that McWhorter terminated him.

At the trial, Lambuth acknowledged that McWhorter had rehired him as an employee on earlier occasions after Lambuth had quit work voluntarily on two occasions; that he and McWhorter had always gotten along; that McWhorter had thought highly of Lambuth's work, and that McWhorter had been a witness for Lambuth at Lambuth's wedding ceremony. Notwithstanding the foregoing, Lambuth testified that McWhorter had fired him because Lambuth had rejoined the Union. (See Tr. 211.) Considering the criteria mentioned earlier in this section, I found that Lambuth's account is the credible one, and the findings of fact will be based on his version.

There is also a conflict between McWhorter and Scoles as to the month in which Whorter ceased his business operations. McWhorter indicated he had ceased business about 6 months prior to the time of the trial in February 1983. That estimate would place the cessation of the business to have occurred in August 1082. On the other hand, Scoles said he was not laid off from work by McWhorter until December 1982. For purposes of deciding the issues of whether unfair labor practices had occurred in the past, it seems unnecessary to resolve that conflict at this stage of the proceeding based solely on the recollections of those two witnesses. The time of the cessation of McWhorter's business and whether McWhorter's business operation has resumed since then are matters which could be resolved more appropriately during the compliance stage of this proceeding by the examination of the pertinent business records.

Unlike the foregoing question which may be resolved at the compliance stage, there is a necessity at this stage of the proceeding to make a determination on the issue of whether the Union ever achieved majority status in an appropriate unit of the Respondent's employees. Lambuth acknowledged that he had not looked at McWhorter's payroll records, or any other kind of records, to ascertain the dates of employment of the employees about which Lambuth testified at the trial. Lambuth explained, "No. That's why I wasn't sure. That's why I tried to give approximations." (See Tr. 220 and 221.) Lambuth said he was testifying from his best recollection. I have weighed the fact that Lambuth was testifying from memory, and that his testimony in that respect was not precise with regard to the exact dates of employment of the persons in question. Nevertheless, as will be shown in the findings of fact, he did recall the names of the employees in question, approximately when they worked for McWhorter, what jobs they performed, and other matters. In addition, Lambuth gave credible testimony on other subjects during the trial. The Company's records may have been able to provide more precise dates of employment and more exact information regarding the employees in question, but those records were not produced. That observation is not made in the sense of being critical, but in the sense of weighing and considering the oral evidence that was given by Lambuth and other witnesses, as distinguished from documentary evidence which was not presented. In these circumstances, I found that the oral evidence presented a reliable basis for making the findings of fact on this issue.

III. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Events in 1980

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 2 was a copy of the first collective-bargaining agreement between McWhorter and the Charging Party Union. (See Tr. 29–30.) The document indicates that it was executed on July 15, 1980. (See G.C. Exh. 2, p. 58.) The contract had effective dates from May 1, 1978, to May 1, 1981. (See G. C. Exh. 2, p. 57.)

Neither before nor after McWhorter signed General Counsel's Exhibit 2 was a representation election conducted by NLRB among McWhorter's employees to determine whether they desired the Union to represent them. (See Tr. 34.) Easdon acknowledged at the trial that no representation election had been held, nor had an NLRB order to bargain been issued, at any time with respect to the employees of McWhorter. (See Tr. 98.)

B. The Events in May, June, and July 1981

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 3 was a copy of the second collective-bargaining agreement between McWhorter and the Charging Party Union. (See Tr. 31–32.) The document indicates that it was executed on July 6, 1981. (See G.C. Exh. 3, p. 31.) The contract had effective dates from May 1, 1981, to May 1, 1984. (See G.C. Exh. 3, p. 30)

During the examination of McWhorter by the General Counsel under the provisions of Rule 611(c) of the Federal Rules of Evidence, the following took place as reflected at transcript pages 28 and 29:

> Q. When you were working both as McWhorter Trucking Company and subsequently as J & B Trucking Company, did you usually use the same drivers from job site to job site?
> A. Pretty much so.
> Q. In other words, you did not lay off drivers after each job and hire a whole new crew for each job, new job, did you?
> A. I did not.
> Q. So you had a stable work force except when the drivers quit or were fired or were laid off, possibly?
> A. Pretty much so.

Donald Lambuth had more than just one period of employment with McWhorter. During at least two of those periods of employment, Lambuth worked as a truckdriver for McWhorter. He acknowledged at the trial that he had voluntarily quit working for McWhorter on two occasions, but that McWhorter had always taken him back to work. Lambuth was certain at the trial that McWhorter thought highly of his work. (See Tr. 211.)

Some of the precise dates of Lambuth's employment by McWhorter are not clear, but Lambuth said he began working for McWhorter about September 1980 as a mechanic on a salary basis. Around May or June 1981, Lambuth became a truckdriver for McWhorter. At that time, he was paid the wage scale which was provided for in the union contract. Sometime later in the winter of 1981, Lambuth was dispatched by the Union to work for another company. He worked for that company for 2 or 3 weeks, and then Lambuth returned to work for McWhorter about the end of December 1981. (See Tr. 211.) He was married about March 10, 1982, but the wedding ceremony was not held until July 1982. McWhorter was a witness for Lambuth at the wedding. (See Tr. 210–211.)

At the point in time when Lambuth became a truckdriver for the Respondent in May or June 1981, there were six other truckdrivers working for the Respondent. Lambuth described those truckdrivers as ones who had worked for McWhorter for more than just a couple of months, and, instead, those truckdrivers were regularly employed by McWhorter for 6 months or longer. Thus, based on Lambuth's observation, there were a total of seven truckdrivers regularly working for McWhorter at the time that Lambuth moved up from the mechanic's job to being a truckdriver in May or June 1981.

The other six truckdrivers for McWhorter in May or June 1981 were identified by Lambuth as being: Kevin Bowers, Stacy Carpenter, Terry Gettman, Marc Hobbs, Mike Luman, and Ed Scoles.

Kevin Bowers was working for the Respondent prior to the time that Lambuth began working for the Respondent as a mechanic in September 1980. Bowers continued to work as a truckdriver for the Respondent, and he was working as a truckdriver in May or June 1981 when Lambuth became a truckdriver. Bowers continued as a truckdriver thereafter.

Stacy Carpenter began working for McWhorter as a truckdriver shortly after September 1980, and he continued to work for McWhorter as a truckdriver until about March 1982.

Terry Gettman worked for McWhorter from about September 1980 to November or December 1981 as a truckdriver.

Marc Hobbs worked as a truckdriver for McWhorter prior to September 1980, when Lambuth commenced working for the Respondent. Hobbs was still employed by McWhorter at the time that Lambuth's employment with McWhorter ended on July 27, 1982.

Mike Luman began working as a truckdriver for McWhorter a couple of months prior to May or June 1981, and he continued to work for McWhorter until about November or December 1981.

Ed Scoles began working on a full-time basis as a truckdriver for McWhorter in May 1981. Previously, Scoles had worked on a part-time basis for McWhorter, whenever he was needed, and when he was not working for Giles Hauling. After May 1981, Scoles continued to work for McWhorter until McWhorter ceased his business operations.

Lambuth described two other persons who drove trucks for McWhorter from time to time. They are Jerry McWhorter, who is the son of Jake McWhorter, and Jerry Crawford, who had the job of fueling the trucks, but who drove a truck "once in a while when he was needed." (See Tr. 220.)

Another employee named Al Denver became a mechanic for McWhorter at the time that Lambuth left the mechanic's job and became a truckdriver.

Another group of employees of McWhorter was identified by Lambuth as not being employed at the point in time when Lambuth became a truckdriver in May or June 1981. They are: Mike Barrows, Ed Hawkins, Gary Hobbs, Max Melendez, Don Overton, and Mike Wiedick.

Mike Barrows was working for McWhorter prior to the time that Lambuth began working for the Respondent in September 1980, but Barrows left the Respondent's employ about 2 months later, which would have been about November 1980.

Ed Hawkins came to work for the Respondent sometime after May 1981 and worked for McWhorter for a brief period of time. According to Lambuth, "He was in the landscaping business just filling in." (See Tr. 213.)

Gary Hobbs became an employee of the Respondent sometime after the May or June 1981 time period when Lambuth first became a truckdriver for the Respondent.

Max Melendez became a truckdriver for the Respondent after the May or June 1981 time period when Lambuth became a truck river for the Respondent. According to Lambuth, Melendez worked there less than 2 months as a "stand-in driver." (See Tr. 214.)

Don Overton was employed by McWhorter prior to time in September 1980 when Lambuth became an employee of McWhorter. However, Overton quit working for McWhorter about 2 or 3 months later, which would have been November or December 1980.

Mike Wiedick became an employee of McWhorter as a truckdriver about May 1982, and he worked for less than 2 months for the Respondent. According to Lambuth, Wiedick was terminated a day or two prior to the time he was terminated on July 27, 1982.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibits 8(a) through 8(g) were copies of the Charging Party Union's computer printouts of information pertaining to certain of its members. Among other things, the information includes the name, address, Social Security number, sex, insurance beneficiary, and the dates and amounts of union dues paid by the member. Suspension from union membership is also indicated, as well as whether an honorable withdrawal card had been issued to a member who was not currently employed.

General Counsel's Exhibit 8(a) pertains to Robert J. Burdolski. On December 15, 1980, he made a payment of $18 for the use of the Union's hiring hall. On November 30, 1981, he paid his initiation fee in full in the amount of $225. Burdolski continued as a union member, but on March 23, 1982, he was issued an honorable withdrawal card. According to Easdon, Burdolski still remained a union member, but he was not required to pay union dues until he resumed working.

General Counsel's Exhibit 8(b) pertains to Stacy R. Carpenter. On September 15, 1980, Carpenter paid in full his initiation fee in the amount of $225. He continued as a union member until August 6, 1982, when Carpenter was suspended from union membership for his failure to pay his union dues.

General Counsel's Exhibit 8(c) pertains to Terry L. Gettman. On October 20, 1977, Gettman was initiated into the Union. He continued to be a union menber at least through February 1983.

General Counsel's Exhibit 8(d) pertains to Marc Hobbs. On July 20, 1979, Hobbs made his first payment toward his initiation fee to join the Union. On August 2, 1979, Hobbs paid his initiation fee in full. He continued as a union member thereafter. On July 16, 1982, Hobbs was issued an honorable withdrawal card, which Easdon said meant that Hobbs remained a union member, but he did not have to pay union dues.

General Counsel's Exhibit 8(e) pertains to Donald J. Lambuth. On April 9, 1979, Lambuth made his first payment toward his initiation fee to join the Union. On June 27, 1979, he paid his initiation fee in full. Lambuth remained a union member until he was suspended from union membership on September 11, 1981. On July 28, 1982, Lambuth paid a reinitiation fee to the Union, and he continued his union membership at least through January 1983.

General Counsel's Exhibit 8(f) pertains to Michal K. Luman. On September 27, 1974, Luman was initiated into union membership. He continued thereafter as a union member, but on August 6, 1982, he was suspended from union membership.

General Counsel's Exhibit 8(g) pertains to Frank E. Scoles. On January 30, 1981, Scoles transferred his union membership from Local 537 of the Teamsters union to membership in the Charging Party Local Union. He continued his membership thereafter until May 6, 1982, when he was suspended from union membership.

C. The Events in November or December 1981

In either November or December 1981, McWhorter held a meeting of his employees in the Respondent's shop. Both Scoles and Lambuth were present at that meeting and gave similar accounts of what transpired. According to Scoles, "all the employees" were present, and he estimated that number of employees to be approximately six. The following took place during the direct examination of Scoles as reflected at transcript page 167:

> Q. Could you tell us what was said and by whom in that meeting?
> A. Jake notified us that McWhorter Trucking was ceasing and that he was changing his name to J & B Trucking. It would be strictly nonunion.
> Q. What else, if anything, can you recall from that meeting?
> A. Well, he told us that we are to withdraw from the union in order to continue working, and that if we didn't, there was the door, he would square up with us right then and there.
> Q. Was anything said—do you recall anything being said about a wage cut?
> A. Yes. He said that the pay would be $7.50 an hour, we would not get paid driving time or overtime.
> Q. Do you recall whether any employees replied to Mr. McWhorter?
> A. Well, there was something said; I don't recall exactly what was said. We all continued to work there.

During cross-examination, Scoles acknowledged that he did not withdraw from the union following that meeting, and that neither he nor anyone else was "shown the door." Lambuth also acknowledged that no one was fired by McWhorter following that meeting. (See Tr. 195, and see also his account at Tr. 184 and 185.)

Bixler said that he was told by Scoles that McWhorter had told the employees to take a withdrawal from the Union, or they could no longer be employed by him. (The foregoing testimony by Bixler was not received into evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted by the out-of-court declarant. See the discussion at Tr. 152–155 and Fed.R. Evid. 801.) Bixler said that one of his duties as a union business agent was "to police" the Union's contracts or, in other words, to ascertain whether the contract's terms are being fulfilled. According to Bixler, at one time all of McWhorter's employees were paying union dues, but subsequently they quit doing so. He acknowledged that he did not request McWhorter to terminate any employee after Bixler learned that the employee was no longer paying union dues. (See the union-security clause set forth in art. 4 of G.C. Exh. 3.)

D. The Events in January 1982

As indicated previously in section A of this decision, McWhorter changed the name of his business in January 1982 from McWhorter Trucking to J & B Trucking.

Shortly after January 1, 1982, there was a conversation between McWhorter and Lambuth in the shop one afternoon after working hours. Lambuth recalled that conversation as reflected in his testimony at transcript pages 185 and 186:

> Q. Could you tell us what was said and by whom in that conversation?
> A. Well, Jake McWhorter insisted that we take a withdrawal. At the time, that did not apply to me because I was under suspension. He had told me that we will have nothing to do with the union and we will not get above $7.50 an hour until times got better. And I presumed—he told me he was going to tell the rest of the drivers that. I presume he did, I don't know.

At the trial, Lambuth acknowledged during cross-examination that no one was fired by McWhorter at the time of his January 1982 conversation.

Also in January 1982, McWhorter telephoned Easdon. At the trial, Easdon recalled their telephone conversation as reflected at transcript page 39:

> Q. Could you tell us what was said and by whom in that conversation?
> A. Mr. McWhorter expressed to me that he could no longer live with the contract that he had signed, that he wanted the union to be informed that his intentions were that he was not going to live with that contract. I believe he said that he had changed the name of his company.
> My response was that we felt like the contract was binding through the expiration date of the contract and we expected him to live by it and that he had an obligation to do that.

E. The Events in February 1982

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 11 was a copy of a grievance which the Union filed against the Respondent. The document is dated February 22, 1982, and it was signed by union business agent Bixler. The Union alleged that the Respondent had violated the contract with the Union in several respects, and the Union sought full backpay and payment of wages and benefits for all employees.

On February 22, 1982, Bixler took the grievance form to McWhorter's business location, and he gave the grievance to McWhorter. According to Bixler, McWhorter told him that he was not going to pay the money; McWhorter wadded up the grievance form and threw it on the floor; and then McWhorter told Bixler, "If you don't get out of my shop, I will kick your [expletive deleted]." (See Tr. 132 and 133.) Bixler then left the facility.

According to Bixler, the allegations in the Union's grievance were based on information obtained on December 15, 1981, during a visit to a McWhorter jobsite. Bixler and Dean Kitterman, who is the Union's secretary-treasurer and business representative, went to a jobsite at Broadway and Colfax. Bixler spoke with Frank Scoles, Marc Hobbs, and Donald Lambuth, who were working there. According to Bixler, Scoles told him that he did not know for sure what McWhorter was paying the employees. Hobbs did not tell anything to Bixler at that time. Lambuth informed Bixler that McWhorter was paying $7.50 an hour, which was below the union wage scale.

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 12 was a copy of a letter dated February 25, 1982, from Bixler to McWhorter. In his letter, Bixler requested a meeting with McWhorter at 9 a.m. on March 2, 1982, at the Union's offices to resolve the issues raised by the Union's grievance.

F. The Events in March 1982

After the Union's grievance was filed, McWhorter engaged the services of Willie Anthony as a labor consultant, and McWhorter directed Anthony to meet with the Union about the grievance. (See Tr. 32.)

On March 9, 1982, Easdon and Jack Parker, who is the president of the Charging Party Union, met in the Union's offices with Anthony. According to Easdon, Anthony said, [H]e was there to attempt to settle the grievance which had been filed." (See Tr. 44.) According to Easdon, Anthony also "stated that the Company had had problens with us in the past, that they wanted to clear up those problems, that they would remain union, that they wanted to draw up a settlement that settled all matters of this grievance." (See Tr. 57.)

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 4(a) was a copy of a letter dated March 10, 1982, from Easdon to Anthony with regard to the agreement which was reached between the Company and the Union. Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 4(b) was a copy of the agreement which is dated March 10, 1982, and which bears the signatures of McWhorter for the Respondent and Easdon for the Charging Party Union.

The foregoing matters were not received into evidence to prove the liability of the Respondent for, or the validity of, the Union's claim or the amount of that claim. (See Fed.R.Evid. 408.) Instead, the General Counsel urged that the foregoing was offered to meet the Respondent's contention in the answer to the General Counsel's complaint that the Respondent had repudiated its contract with the Union on January 1, 1982, and its affirmative defense that the Union's unfair labor practice charge, which was filed on September 3, 1982, was barred by the 6-month statute of limitations provisions, which are set forth in Section 10(b) of the Act. (See par. XI and also the "First Defense" set forth in the Respondent's answer, which was introduced into evidence as G.C. Exh. 1(e).) The General Counsel urged, "I'm trying to offer this to show that Respondent engaged in conduct that was inconsistent with its position that it repudiated the contract on January 1, 1982." (See Tr. 45 and see also the discussions at Tr. 44–56; 58–59; 61–62; and 63–66.)

G. The Events in April 1982

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 5 was a copy of a letter dated April 13, 1982, from Easdon to McWhorter which, among other things, alleged that the unit employees had not received their money from the Company in accordance with the agreement which was introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 4(b).

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 6 was a copy of a letter dated April 19, 1982, from the Respondent and addressed "To Whom It May Concern." A copy of the letter was received by the Union on May 3, 1982. In part, General Counsel's Exhibit 6 states, "The following employees when working for McWhorter Trucking have been paid Union Scale & Benefits from the signing of the Union Contract until McWhorter Trucking ceased operations." (The spelling of certain words appear as corrected.) Thereafter, the typed names and the signatures of certain employees appeared. They are: Don Lambuth, Marc Hobbs, Ed Scoles and Bob Burdolski. The letter was signed by McWhorter.

Lambuth recalled at the trial the circumstances under which he had signed the document which was introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 6. Lambuth stated at transcript page 186, "I had just gotten off work. I came into the shop. Jake had asked me to read it and sign it. I had read it. I was not exactly willing to sign it. He had told me if I wanted my paycheck to sign it, so I did." Lambuth later testified, "I think shortly after that he left." (See Tr. 196.)

Scoles also recalled at the trial the circumstances under which he signed General Counsel's Exhibit 6. He said that McWhorter was not present in the shop at the time when he came in to get his paycheck. However, McWhorter had left a note on the desk for Marc Hobbs. Scoles recognized the handwriting on the note as being McWhorter's handwriting. Scoles said at transcript page 168, "He left a note for us, for Marc Hobbs to inform us that we are to sign this paper before he is to give us our checks." Scoles then signed General Counsel's Exhibit 6, and he received his paycheck.

According to Scoles, McWhorter had not been paying union scale and benefits either while McWhorter was doing business as McWhorter Trucking or while he was doing business as J & B Trucking. (See Tr. 173.) However, Scoles acknowledged that he had not made any complaints to the union or filed any grievance saying that he was not receiving union scale. (See Tr. 174.)

Easdon acknowledged at the trial that for policy reasons the Union decided not to pursue further the Union's grievance through arbitration or other legal action.

H. The Events in May 1982

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 7 was a copy of a letter dated May 6, 1982, from Easdon to McWhorter. Easdon wrote the letter in response to McWhorter's letter which was dated April 19, 1982, and which was introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 6. Among other things, Easdon asserted his belief in the letter that the Respondent was still in business and was still obligated to the contract with the Union.

I. The Events in July 1982

About 6 a.m. on July 23, 1982, union business agent Bixler and another Union Business Agent, George Del Monte, went to the area near the Respondent's shop. They watched the yard there until about 7 a.m. During that period of time, McWhorter's trucks remained in the yard. As a result of what Del Monte said he had seen earlier in the week, Bixler and Del Monte drove out Parker Road beyond Arapahoe Road South to a housing project. Bixler observed two trucks and a loader at that location. He said that McWhorter's name was on the trucks. Bixler got out of the car and went over to one of the trucks where he spoke with McWhorter's son and another person who was sitting in the truck. Bixler asked them if they were carrying union cards, and they replied, "no."

Bixler then returned to his car, and he and Del Monte drove around the jobsite. Bixler noted that there was only a truck there from a cement company. As Bixler and Del Monte were driving out, they went by the truck where McWhorter's son and another person had been sitting. McWhorter's son got out of the truck and came over to Bixler's car. McWhorter's son told Bixler that he had purchased the trucks and that they belonged to him. He referred to Bixler by a derogatory term, and he told Bixler that he did not want Bixler to stop his trucks and bother his drivers any more. (See Tr. 141.) Bixler replied that he would stop and check the trucks as long as there was a contract. Bixler and Del Monte then left the jobsite.

The foregoing conversations were not received into evidence to prove the truth of the matters asserted by the out-of-court declarants. See the discussion at transcript pages 139–141 and 142–146, and also Rule 801 of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

About a week prior to July 27, 1982, there was a meeting of employees with McWhorter in the middle of the afternoon during working hours at a jobsite across the street at Colfax and Havana. Lambuth recalled at the trial that McWhorter told the employees that they were going to get a raise to $9 an hour. Lambuth also testified at transcript page 187 that McWhorter further told the employees, "[H]e would never have anything to do with the union. Anyone talking to a business rep [expletive deleted] can go down the road and they're fired." Lambuth further testified regarding that meeting at transcript page 188, "He had said that he would like us to go down and tell the union, tell the business reps that we did not want to be represented by them anymore and to leave us alone and to stay off our jobs."

During cross-examination, Lambuth acknowledged that Bixler had come out to the jobs, that McWhorter was aware of that fact, and that McWhorter was concerned that people were talking to union representatives during working hours. (See Tr. 197.) However, he specifically denied that McWhorter asked the employees simply not to talk to the union representative during working hours. (See Tr. 198.) Lambuth acknowledged that he did not know of anyone being fired by McWhorter just for talking to union representatives.

During cross-examination, Scoles acknowledged that, at the time of the meeting described above, Scoles had already been suspended from the Union for his failure to pay his union dues. (See Tr. 174.) Scoles said that after he had ceased to pay his union dues, he did not care whether or not the union represented him. (See Tr. 175.) Scoles also acknowledged that McWhorter was aware of the fact that union representatives had attempted to talk with Scoles during his working hours by trying to stop his truck while Scoles was making a delivery. (See Tr. 176.) However, Scoles stated that McWhorter did not limit his statement to the employees at the meeting just to not talk with union representatives during working hours. Scoles testified at transcript page 176, "He told us he did not want us associating with them, talking to them, or anything, at all, period. He didn't say whether it was at home or at the job or at anywhere else. He never specified. He said period." In Scoles' opinion, the union representatives had the right to visit employees on the job. (See Tr. 176 and 177, and see also art. 12, entitled "Job Admission," on 14 of G.C. Exh. 3.)

Around lunchtime on Tuesday, July 27, 1982, McWhorter and Lambuth had a conversation in McWhorter's white Chevrolet pickup truck at a jobsite either on South Parker Road or at Colfax and Tower Road. Lambuth testified regarding their conversation as reflected at transcript page 188:

> Q. Could you tell us what was said and by whom in that conversation?
> A. Jake and I were alone in the pickup. We had discussed—I had told him that I was thinking about getting straight with the union. And he said he cannot use anyone that's in the union, that he will never go back into the union and if I did, he would no longer need my services.

During cross-examination, Lambuth recalled that McWhorter also told him during that conversation that McWhorter was nonunion, and that McWhorter could not afford to pay union scale. (See Tr. 200.) Lambuth acknowledged at the trial that McWhorter's statements to him in that conversation did not surprise Lambuth.

About 4:30 or 5 p.m. on July 27, 1982, Lambuth went to the offices of the Charging Party Union. Lambuth appeared before a union committee, and he sought reinstatement in the Union. During cross-examination, Lambuth acknowledged that he was told by the Union that if he was going to be a union member, he could not work for McWhorter anymore unless McWhorter paid the union wage scale. (See Tr. 202.) Lambuth told the union representatives that McWhorter "probably would" fire him if he joined the Union, and that McWhorter had said that "he needed no one that was union and anyone that was would be dismissed." (See Tr. 220.) The meeting with the union committee lasted for about an hour. Lambuth was to pay a fine of $100 and also all of his back union dues for a total of $337. Lambuth did not have that amount of money with him at that time, but he paid the full amount the following day.

At the trial, Lambuth explained his reasons for seeking reinstatement in the union at that time. First of all, he considered the years he had acquired in the union toward retirement. Secondly, he was of the opinion that he did more than the other truck drivers who worked for McWhorter, and that he deserved more than $9 an hour, which was the amount of money McWhorter was going to pay them. Lambuth said he had hopes that McWhorter would pay him the union wage scale. Lambuth also felt that he could go to work for another company and be paid the union wage scale. In fact, Lambuth did obtain such a job about a week and a half after July 27, 1982.

About 7 p.m. on July 27, 1982, Lambuth telephoned McWhorter. Lambuth explained at transcript page 190, "We do that regularly to find out what we do the next day." With regard to his telephone conversation on that particular occasion, Lambuth gave the following account at transcript page 190:

> Q. Could you tell us what was said and by whom in that conversation?
> A. Yes. I had called him, I had told him, "I have gotten straight with the union." He had told me, "Well, you remember what we talked about this afternoon?" I told him, "Yes." And he said, "Well, that's it, you're fired."
> Q. What, if anything, did you say in reply?
> A. I said, "If that's the way you feel, good-bye," and that was the end of the conversation.

During cross-examination, Lambuth further testified that McWhorter also told him that he was not paying union scale, and, "I don't need anybody that will join the union and I will fire him immediately, and you're no exception." (See Tr. 204.) Lambuth added that McWhorter also told him, "Pick up your check tomorrow at the shop." (See Tr. 205.)

Introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 1(b) was a copy of a grievance dated July 28, 1982, which was filed against the Respondent. Bixler was the one who wrote the language of the grievance. It was signed by Lambuth. The grievance alleges: "I was unjustly discharged for reinstating in the Union and demanding proper pay scale and further demanding back wages due as agreed to by Jake McWhorter in letter dated March 10, 1982." At the trial, Lambuth explained that Bixler had shown him a paper pertaining to McWhorter's paying back wages, but, previously, Lambuth had not made a demand on McWhorter for any kind of back wages. He explained at transcript page 209, "We couldn't get scale, much less back wages. We were trying to take one step at a time."

Bixler attempted to deliver the grievance, which was introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 1(b), on July 30, 1982. When Bixler went to the Respondent's shop, he discovered that the shop was locked, the trucks were gone, and no one was there.

J. The Events in August 1982

Introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 1(a) was a copy of a letter dated August 2, 1982, from Bixler to McWhorter. The letter requested that a meeting be held between the Company and the Union with regard to the grievance pertaining to Lambuth. (See sec. I. herein and R. Exh. 1(b).) Subsequently, the letter was returned to the Union unclaimed. (See R. Exh. 1(c).) Bixler also telephoned McWhorter's office on August 2, 1982, and he was told that McWhorter was on vacation.

On August 2, 1982, Scoles received a wage increase from $7.50 an hour to $9 an hour.

On August 21, 1982, Scoles went "dirt biking" with other employees and McWhorter. Scoles recalled at the trial that some of those employees were Robert Burdolski, Mark Hobbs, Steve Crawford, and Gary Hobbs. The group had lunch at the Twin Cedars Cafe in Deckers, Colorado. During their conversation at lunch that day, Lambuth's name was mentioned. Scoles testified at transcript page 171, "Well, I don't remember who had brought up the subject. The subject came up about why Don hadn't been working. Jake said it was because of him being with the union is why he's not working. That was it. That was all that was said about anything." During cross-examination, Scoles acknowledged that McWhorter had not told them that McWhorter had fired Lambuth because he had joined the Union. (See Tr. 176.)

K. The Events in November 1982

Introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 9 was a copy of a letter from McWhorter to Easdon, which was received in the Union's office on November 1, 1982.

In his letter, McWhorter expressed his surprise at the Union's filing of an unfair labor practice charge. McWhorter asserted that he had informed Easdon in January 1982 that "I had nothing further to do with the Union and that I was terminating the contract." McWhorter expressed his view that the Union had done nothing about the fact that McWhorter was not abiding by the terms of the contract, and, therefore, the Union had agreed to the repudiation and termination of the contract. McWhorter also asserted in his letter that since July 1981 the Union had not represented a majority of his employees.

In response to General Counsel's Exhibit 9, Easdon wrote a letter dated November 1, 1982, to McWhorter. A copy of Easdon's letter was introduced into evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 10.

In his letter, Easdon asserted that the Union had attempted to enforce the provisions of the contract, and he listed in his letter the dates and the actions taken by the Union in that respect. Easdon also expressed a desire to settle the grievance pertaining to Lambuth, and he requested a meeting with the Company to accomplish that.

IV. CONCLUSIONS

a. The Allegations of Conduct Independently Violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act

In paragraph V of his complaint, the General Counsel sets forth three allegations with regard to conduct which he urges independently violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Those three specific allegations are:

> (a) On or about July 20, 1982, Respondent, acting by and through Jake McWhorter, told Respondent's employees to tell the Union that the employees did not want the Union representatives bothering them.
> (b) On or about July 27, 1982, Respondent, acting by and through Jake McWhorter, told an employee that if he rejoined the Union he would be immediately discharged.
> (c) On or about July 27, 1982, Jake McWhorter told an employee that any employees caught talking to any Union representatives would be immediately discharged.

Without repeating here all of the findings of fact contained in section I of this decision, I conclude that a preponderance of the evidence supports the General Counsel's allegations. In this connection, I note the uncontradicted testimony given by Lambuth and the uncontradicted testimony given by Scoles with regard to the statements they attribute to McWhorter. With regard to the allegations in paragraph V(a) of the General Counsel's complaint, it will be remembered that the testimony reveals that no limitation, such as working time, was placed by McWhorter on his statement to the employees. Also, McWhorter's statement to the employees must be considered in the context of his telling employees at the meeting that anyone who talked with a union representative would be fired. That is the substance of the allegation of paragraph V(c) of the General Counsel's complaint, although paragraph V(c) alleges the date as "on or about July 27, 1982," whereas the evidence reveals it was said "on or about July 20, 1982." I conclude that the minor variance in the approximate date of the allegation does not preclude the finding of an unfair labor practice where the date is relatively close in point of time. In addition, paragraph V(c) alleges the singular term "employee," rather than the plural, but this variation also seems to be minor, particularly where there are only three allegations of 8(a)(1) conduct, and all three allegations are attributed to the same person who did not dispute the testimony. With regard to the allegations in paragraph V(b) of the General Counsel's complaint, I note the uncontradicted testimony of Lambuth, as set forth in section I herein, with regard to his conversations with McWhorter on July 27, 1982, in a pickup truck and later on the telephone.

In reaching the foregoing conclusions, I have been guided by the Board's holding with regard to allegations of 8(a)(1) conduct that "the test is whether the supervisor's conduct reasonably tended to interfere with the free exercise of the employee's rights under the Act. Florida Steel Corp., 224 NLRB 45 (1976), citing Hanes Hosiery, 219 NLRB 338 (1975). See also Saint Luke's Hospital, 258 NLRB 321 (1981). Thus, an objective standard, rather than the subjective reactions of the employees, has been utilized in determining whether such statements violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

b. The Allegations of Conduct in Violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act

In paragraphs VI and VII of his complaint, the General Counsel sets forth allegations with regard to the termination of Lambuth, which are urged to be in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Those allegations are:

VI

On or about July 27, 1982, Respondent discharged Donald Lambuth, an employee at its Lakewood, Colorado location, and at all times since has failed and refused, and continues to fail and refuse to reinstate this employee.

VII

The Respondent engaged in the acts and conduct described above in paragraph VI because of said employee's membership in and activities on behalf of the Union.

As set forth in section I herein, I conclude from those findings of fact that a preponderance of the evidence establishes the General Counsel's allegations with regard to the termination of Lambuth and the failure and refusal to reinstate him. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). See also NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 394 (1983).

The evidence, as described in section I herein, shows union activity on the part of Lambuth in rejoining the Charging Party Union; the Employer's knowledge of Lambuth's having done so, and the immediate termination of Lambuth by McWhorter because Lambuth rejoined the Union. In addition, there is other evidence set forth in the findings of fact which shows hostility toward the Union by McWhorter, and there is also concurrent conduct described above of violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Furthermore, as described in section I herein, based on the testimony of Scoles, McWhorter told the employees regarding Lambuth, "[I]t was because of him being with the union is why he's not working." While McWhorter did not admit to the employees that he had terminated Lambuth for that reason, McWhorter's statement has to be considered in light of the other findings of fact herein that McWhorter did discharge Lambuth from employment immediately on learning that Lambuth had rejoined the union, and that Lambuth did not voluntarily quit.

c. The Allegations of Conduct in Violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act

In paragraph XI of his complaint, the General Counsel sets forth three allegations with regard to the failure and refusal to bargain with the Union by McWhorter, which the General Counsel urges to be in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. Those three specific allegations are:

(a) Since on or about February 3, 1982, Respondent has failed and refused to meet and bargain with the Union concerning wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

(b) On or about July 20, 1982, Respondent repudiated its contract with the Union and negotiated directly with its employees.

(c) On or about July 20, 1982, Respondent unilaterally granted a wage increase to its employees.

The allegations in paragraph XI(a) of the General Counsel's complaint are the only ones which allege that unfair labor practices occurred beyond the 10(b) period. I calculate that the 10(b) date is March 3, 1982. That calculation is based on the filing of the unfair labor practice charge on September 3, 1982, by the Charging Party Union, and the service of the charge by mail on September 3, 1982. (See G.C. Exhs. 1(a) and 1(b); Sec. 102.113 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, and the stipulation at Tr. 7.)

I have considered certain findings of fact which occurred before March 3, 1982, insofar as those findings shed light on the conduct which occurred on and after March 3, 1982. For example, see the findings in sections C, D, and E, all of which occurred prior to the 10(b) date, but which shed light on the events which took place after the 10(b) date. In this connection, I have been guided by the Board's holding in Tri-City Electric Co., 264 NLRB 1407, 1408 (1982):

> We note at the outset that conduct which has occurred outside the 10(b) period cannot form the basis for unfair labor practice findings. However, pre-Section 10(b) evidence may be relied on for the purpose of throwing light on and evaluating conduct which occurred within the 10(b) period. The Motor Convoy, Inc., 252 NLRB 1253 (1980); Pandair Freight, Inc., 253 NLRB 973 (1980).

Notwithstanding McWhorter's statement to Easdon in January 1982, as set forth in section D herein, and McWhorter's statement to Bixler on February 22, 1982, as reflected in section E herein, the Respondent's agent thereafter did meet with the Union and reached an agreement with the Union which both parties signed on March 10, 1982. (See sec. F also.) The General Counsel and the attorney for the Respondent view the foregoing events from different perspectives. The General Counsel urges that the Respondent acted in bad faith and "This misconduct is tantamount to fraudulent concealment." (See pp. 20 and 21 of the posttrial brief filed on behalf of the General Counsel for a fuller argument on this point.) The Respondent urges, "In conclusion, Respondent's conduct from January 1, 1982, and thereafter, both expressed and implied, clearly evidences repudiation of the pre-hire agreement. Therefore, the record clearly supports that Jake McWhorter had repudiated the pre-hire agreement as early as January, 1982, or at the latest March, 1982. After that time, Respondent had no obligation to collectively bargain with the Union." (See pp. 7-9 of the posttrial brief filed on behalf of the Respondent for a fuller argument on this point.)

I conclude that the Respondent's failure to abide by all of the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement and the Respondent's statements to Easdon and Bixler prior to the 10(b) date show that there was no fraudulent concealment of the Respondent's action in this regard. On the other hand, such conduct does not preclude the finding of unfair labor practices based on conduct which occurred on and after the 10(b) date. See Ellis Tacke Co., 229 NLRB 1296, 1296 (1977), where the Board held:

Respondent disavowed the contract in October 1975. However, even prior to that date it refused to comply with some of the terms of the agreement. In a similar case, the Board in Nelson-Hershfield Electronics, 188 NLRB 26 (1971), required the respondent to honor its collective-bargaining agreement retroactively to the commencement of the 10(b) period. We find that a similar refusal-to-bargain violation exists in the circumstances of this case and we hold that the Administrative Law Judge erred in ordering that Respondent honor the collective-bargaining agreement only prospectively. Accordingly, we will require Respondent to honor the collective-bargaining agreement retroactive to the start of the 10(b) period.

In view of the foregoing, we also find that the Administrative Law Judge erred in not providing for any retroactive payments to the respective trust funds pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement. Such retroactive payments will prevent Respondent from reaping financial gain from its unlawful conduct.

After considering the foregoing, I conclude that the 10(b) date is the appropriate date for the finding of the commencement of the Respondent's failure and refusal to meet and to bargain in good faith with the Union. As indicated previously, I calculate that date as being March 3, 1982. The Union's actions in filing grievances, filing an unfair labor practice charge, and writing letters to the Respondent are indicative that the Union did not waive its right to bargain with the Respondent and did not acquiesce in the Respondent's actions.

With regard to the allegations in paragraphs XI(b) and XI(c) of the General Counsel's complaint, I conclude that the findings of fact as set forth in section I herein establish those allegations. It will be recalled that at a meeting of the employees about July 20, 1982, McWhorter announced a wage increase to $9 an hour for his employees, and McWhorter told them "he would never have anything to do with the union." (See sec. I herein.)

With regard to the 8(f) issues, I conclude that the findings of fact in section B herein establish that the Charging Party Union achieved majority status in an appropriate, permanent, and stable unit of McWhorter's employees during the period of May through June 1981 when Lambuth was promoted from the mechanic's job to the position of truckdriver. In Giordano Construction Co., 256 NLRB 47, 47 (1981), the Board held:

> It is well established that a union, originally recognized under Section 8(f), can achieve Section 9(a) status in one of two ways. The first means is for the union to demonstrate that it has achieved majority status "among employees who make up a permanent and stable work force of the employer." Precision Stripping, Inc., 245 NLRB 169 (1979). Where a permanent and stable work force is not employed by the employer, however, the union can attain Section 9(a) status only by demonstrating majority status of the employees employed at a particular jobsite. Davis Industries, Inc.; Stag Construction, Inc.; and Add Miles, Inc., 232 NLRB 946 (1977); see, generally, Hageman Underground Construction, et al., 253 NLRB 60 (1980).

In this connection, note the testimony of Lambuth regarding the length of time worked for McWhorter by the truckdrivers who were employed during the May thru June 1981 time period. Note also McWhorter's testimony regarding the stability of his work force in the sense that he did not hire truckdrivers just for one project and then lay them off from work when that project was completed. He "pretty much" used the same truckdrivers from jobsite to jobsite. See the Board's decision in Construction Erectors, 265 NLRB 786 (1982).

Six out of the seven employees who were regularly employed by McWhorter as truckdrivers in the May thru June 1981 time period were members of the Charging Party Union at that point in time. They were: Stacy Carpenter, Terry Gettman, Marc Hobbs, Donald Lambuth, Mike Luman, and Ed Scoles. By including in the unit Al Denver, who became a mechanic at that time, and also Jerry Crawford, who primarily fueled trucks, but who occasionally drove trucks, the Union still had a majority in the unit of six out of nine employees at that point in time.

With regard to the status of Jerry McWhorter, he comes within the definition of an individual who is employed by his parent, as set forth in Section 2(3) of the Act. That is so because the Respondent is a sole proprietorship of Jerry McWhorter's father. In Scandia, 167 NLRB 623 (1967), the Board stated:

> Section 2(3) of the Act provides that "the term 'employee' . . . shall not include . . . any individual employed by his parent . . . ." Where an employer does business as a sole proprietorship, it is clear that his children are statutorily excluded as individuals employed by a parent.

In accordance with the Board's decision quoted above, I conclude that Jerry McWhorter may not be included in the unit in question here.

After considering the foregoing matters, I further conclude that the bargaining relationship between McWhorter and the Charging Party Union ripened from a prehire relationship, which is permissible under Section 8(f) of the Act, into a 9(a) bargaining relationship when the Union achieved majority status in an appropriate, permanent, and stable unit of McWhorter's employees. Once the Union's majority status was achieved, the Respondent was no longer free to withdraw recognition from the Union and to repudiate the collective-bargaining agreement in these circumstances. As the Board held in Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB 60, 63 (1980):

> Under the Board law discussed above, from that time forward Respondent was under a statutory duty to recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees working at existing and future jobsites. And, in view of the collective-bargaining agreement in existence, the Union was entitled to an irrebuttable presumption of majority status for the duration of the contract. Accordingly, Respondent was not free to withdraw recognition from the Union or to repudiate the collective-bargaining agreement in midterm. By doing so, we conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Under the circumstances presented in this case, I conclude that McWhorter's decision to change the name of his business from McWhorter Trucking to J & B Trucking does not preclude the finding of unfair labor practices as alleged in the General Counsel's complaint, which was issued against "Jake McWhorter, d/b/a McWhorter Trucking." As indicated in the findings of fact, McWhorter's action merely involved a change in the name of his ongoing business enterprise at that time. He was still the sole proprietor, and he was still engaged in the same type of business activity. He had the same office as before, and he utilized the same equipment as J & B Trucking as he had used as McWhorter Trucking. He retained the same employees under the business' new name, except for two employees who quit. As described by Scoles in section C herein, McWhorter told the employees "he was changing his name to J & B Trucking. It would be strictly nonunion." Thus, I conclude that this situation truly was a mere change in the name of the business enterprise.

Finally, I have considered the fact that McWhorter testified that he had ceased business prior to the time of the trial, that he had no employees, and that he was unemployed at that time. (See section I herein.) As indicated previously in section II herein, Scoles said he was not laid off from work by McWhorter until December 1982. Under either version, it appears that McWhorter was not actively engaged in business at the time he testified at the trial. I conclude that the foregoing does not render moot the issues raised by the pleadings in this case. Those issues pertained to whether the past actions and past conduct alleged in the General Counsel's complaint constituted unfair labor practices. Thus, up to this stage of the proceeding, the evidence has focused on past events when McWhorter was actively engaged in business. However, issues regarding the time and circumstances of his cessation of business, and whether McWhorter's business operation has resumed since then, are matters pertaining to compliance with the Board's remedial Order, and such matters may be raised more appropriately and more fully in the compliance stage of this case.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent has been an employer engaged in commerce, at the times material herein, within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Charging Party Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At the times material herein, and more particularly since May through June 1981, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

All employees employed by the Respondent at the Lakewood, Colorado, location, engaged in the peformance of highway, heavy engineering, utility and building construction, but excluding office clerical employees, guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in the following manner:

(a) About July 20, 1982, by telling employees to tell the union representatives that the employees did not want to be represented by the Union anymore and for the union representatives to leave the employees alone and stay off their jobs, and by telling employees that any employee who talked to a union representative would be discharged immediately.

(b) About July 27, 1982, by telling an employee that he would be discharged immediately if he rejoined the Union.

5. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by about July 27, 1982, terminating Donald Lambuth from employment, and failing and refusing to reinstate him, because of Lambuth's union membership and activities.

6. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act in the following manner:

(a) since about March 3, 1982, by failing and refusing to meet and bargain in good faith with the Union concerning the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the unit described herein.

(b) About July 20, 1982, by repudiating his contract with the Union and negotiating directly with his employees in the unit described herein.

(c) About July 20, 1982, by unilaterally granting a wage increase to his employees in the unit described herein.

7. The unfair labor practices described above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Since I have found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from engaging in such unfair labor practices. I shall also recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act. Such recommendations will be set forth in the recommended Order herein.

In addition, I shall also recommend to the Board that an expunction remedy be included in the remedial Order. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

Pursuant to the Board's decision in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), I shall recommend to the Board that a narrowly worded cease-and-desist Order, as distinguished from a broadly worded one, be imposed in this case.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[1]

ORDER

The Respondent, Jake McWhorter, d/b/a McWhorter Trucking and d/b/a J & B Trucking, Lakewood, Colorado, his agents, successors, or assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Telling employees to tell the union representatives that the employees do not want to be represented by the union anymore and for the union representatives to leave the employees alone and stay off their jobs, and telling employees that any employee who talks to a union representative would be discharged immediately.

(b) Telling an employee that he would be discharged immediately if he rejoined the Union.

(c) Terminating an employee from employment, and failing and refusing to reinstate him, because of the employee's union membership and activities.

(d) Failing and refusing to meet and bargain in good faith with the Union concerning the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the unit described herein.

(e) Repudiating his contract with the Union and negotiating directly with his employees in the unit described herein.

(f) Unilaterally granting a wage increase to his employees in the unit described herein.

(g) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing his employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed to them by the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which will effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole Donald Lambuth for his monetary loss, including appropriate interest on such money, which has resulted from the Respondent's termination of him from employment, and the Respondent's failure and refusal to reinstate him. Such monetary amount is to be computed in accordance with the Board's decision in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in accordance with the Board's decisions in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962); Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977); and Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980).

(b) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to Donald Lambuth to his former position of employment with the Respondent, without the loss of his seniority or other benefits but, if his former position of employment no longer exists, then offer him a substantially equivalent position of employment with the Respondent, without the loss of his seniority or other benefits.

(c) Recognize and, on request, bargain collectively with the union as the exclusive collective bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described herein, and abide by the terms of the collective bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union.

(d) Make whole the unit employees who have incurred losses of wages and benefits because of the Respondent's failure to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union. Such monetary amounts are to be computed in accordance with the Board's decision in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest thereon as prescribed in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962); Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980). In addition, the Respondent shall pay the contractually agreed-on trust funds in the amounts of the contributions which the Respondent failed to make on behalf of the Respondent's unit employees in accordance with the Board's decision in Fox Painting Co., 263 NLRB 437 (1982), with any interest applicable to such payments to be computed in accordance with the Board's decision in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Expunge from the Respondent's files any reference to the termination of Donald Lambuth on July 27, 1982, and notify him, in writing, that this has been done, and that evidence of his termination from employment will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

(g) Post at its Lakewood, Colorado facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 27, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) In the event that the Respondent has not resumed his business operation by the time of the commencement of compliance with the terms of the Board's Order, then, in lieu of posting the notice to employees as described in paragraph (g) above, the Respondent shall mail a copy of the notice to the last known address of each unit employee who was employed by the Respondent at the time of the cessation of the Respondent's business operation.

(i) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[1] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[2] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 30 March 1984 Administrative Law Judge Harold Bernard Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating, threatening, and promising benefits to employees, and by publishing a plant rule restricting notice posting because of its employees' union activities, and violated Section 8(a)(3) by discriminatorily laying off Carol Ann Kustosz and Howard Churchwell on 30 July 1982 and David Lincoln on 17 September 1982.[4] We disagree only with the judge's finding that Lincoln's layoff violated Section 8(a)(3).[5]

The Respondent hired Lincoln in early 1982 primarily to perform work on turnover dies at the Respondent's small manufacturing shop. Carol Ann Kustosz triggered an organizational campaign on 29 July when she discussed the need for a union with Lincoln and other employees at lunch. Lincoln was an open union supporter.[6]

During his employment, Lincoln spent about a quarter of his time on turnover dies because turnover die orders were not consistent. The rest of his time he did machine work that other employees also performed. From early August until his layoff in mid-September there was no turnover die work.

The Respondent's business experienced a general decline in the fall of 1982. Although sales income due to labor work at the shop tripled from June to July and remained high through September, orders began to slow down in September; labor sales dropped sharply in October and remained depressed for several months.[7] On 17 September, 2 weeks before the representation election, the Respondent laid off Lincoln, the most junior employee in the shop, along with the three other employees who had the next lowest seniority rankings, Gerald Schornack, Dennis Demers, and John Zielinski.

At the time of the layoffs the Respondent had been notified it would receive an order of turnover dies on 1 October. When the order arrived Lincoln's supervisor was able to perform the work. The Respondent hired no one to replace the four employees for at least a year.

Lincoln, Schornack, Demers, and Zielinski filed a charge with the Board on 29 September alleging that their layoffs were unlawful. On 10 November the Board's Regional Director for Region 7 dismissed the portions of the charge relating to the layoffs of Schornack, Demers, and Zielinski, and amended the General Counsel's complaint against the Respondent concerning the 30 July layoffs to include Lincoln's layoff. On appeal, the General Counsel upheld the dismissals for lack of evidence establishing discriminatory motive in light of the Respondent's apparent business decline and the three employees' low seniority.

The judge found that the Respondent's knowledge of Lincoln's role as a union supporter and

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and brief adequately present the issues and the parties' positions.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The judge recommended a broad cease-and-desist order. In Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), we held that such broad injunctive language is warranted only when a respondent has been shown to have a proclivity to violate the Act, or has engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights. We do not find that the instant violations meet such a test. Consequently, we modify the recommended Order to require the Respondent to cease and desist from violating the Act in any like or related manner.

We decline to address the Respondent's contention that the Board should not award backpay to any reinstated employees for certain periods when they would have been laid off regardless of their union activities because of economic difficulties in late 1982. The issue may, of course, be raised in compliance proceedings.

[4] All dates refer to 1982 unless otherwise indicated.

[5] In affirming the judge's finding that Kustosz and Churchwell were discriminatorily laid off, we find it unnecessary to rely on the lack of notice given before the layoffs, or the fact that employees continued to work overtime after the layoffs.

[6] When management called Kustosz to the front office on 29 July to talk about the organizing, Kustosz requested that Lincoln accompany her. Management refused to allow Lincoln to be present. On 2 August the Union informed the Respondent that Lincoln was an organizing committee member.

[7] The Respondent's monthly labor sales, representing dollars earned for work performed on the products it shipped, were as follows: June—$30,989; July—$85,793; August—$89,020; September—$74,818, October—$31,689. The judge did not state that the figures are in dollars. Also, the judge's September shipment figure incorrectly includes costs for materials that were passed on to the buyers.

Kustosz' ally, coupled with the timing of the layoff and the Respondent's demonstrated union animus, made out a prima facie case of unlawful discrimination. The judge dismissed the Respondent's economic defense, finding that Lincoln should have been retained despite the layoff of more senior employees.[8] Noting that at the time of the layoffs a turnover die order was expected to arrive within a couple of weeks, the judge found that Lincoln should have been retained even if there had been a shortage of turnover die work because the need for his special skill might recur in the future.

We disagree with the judge's finding on the Respondent's economic defense. The Respondent's economic decline in the fall of 1982 justified layoffs. Four employees were laid off in September and they were not replaced. At the time of the layoffs, Lincoln had the lowest seniority in the plant. He possessed a special skill, but the Respondent's need for that skill had declined sharply, and Lincoln's supervisor was able to meet that need without assistance after Lincoln was laid off. Thus, the record does not support the judge's suggestion that Lincoln was indispensable.

We conclude that the Respondent would have laid off Lincoln absent his union activities and therefore Lincoln's layoff did not violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.[9]

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 5.

"5. Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by terminating Carol Kustosz and Howard Churchwell because of employees' union activities."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified and set out in full below and orders that the Respondent, Dawson Carbide Industries, Inc., Warren, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Coercively interrogating any employee concerning the employee's union activity.

(b) Threatening any employee with unspecified reprisals for engaging in union activities.

(c) Threatening employees with plant closing and termination if employees select union representation.

(d) Promising any employee a wage increase in order to persuade such employee to back off from efforts to secure union representation.

(e) Publishing any plant rule prohibiting the posting of notices anywhere in the plant without prior consent of Respondent because of employee union activities.

(f) Threatening any employee with strict rules and regulations if employees select union representation.

(g) Terminating or laying off any employees because of employee union activities.

(h) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Carol Kustosz and Howard Churchwell immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful layoffs and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the layoffs will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Rescind the no-posting rule it unlawfully promulgated so as to permit the posting of union-related material on company bulletin boards or other appropriate locations without prior approval.

(e) Post at its facility in Warren, Michigan, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[8] See Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1981), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982).

[9] Our analysis of Lincoln's layoff does not affect the judge's finding that the 30 July layoffs of Kustosz and Churchwell violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. Although the Respondent proved a business decline in the fall of 1982, there was no demonstrated decline in July or August.

[10] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate any employee concerning the employee's union activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten any employee with unspecified reprisals for engaging in union activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with plant closing and termination if employees select union representation.

WE WILL NOT promise any employee a wage increase in order to persuade such employee to back off from efforts to secure union representation.

WE WILL NOT post or maintain any plant rule prohibiting posting on bulletin boards or anywhere in the plant without prior permission because of employee union activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten any employee with strict rules and regulations if employees select union representation.

WE WILL NOT terminate or lay off our employees because of their support for International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW, and its Local 157, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Carol Kustosz and Howard Churchwell immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify each of them that we have removed from our files any reference to the unlawful layoff and that the layoff will not be used against them in any way.

WE WILL rescind the no-posting rule that we unlawfully promulgated so as to permit the posting of union-related material on company bulletin boards or other appropriate locations without prior approval.

DAWSON CARBIDE INDUSTRIES, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD BERNARD, JR., Administrative Law Judge. I heard these consolidated cases on January 11 and 12, 1983, in Detroit, Michigan, pursuant to consolidated complaint issued November 10, 1982, and order consolidating the representation and unfair labor practice cases on January 4, 1983. The issues are whether the Respondent terminated employees Carol Ann Kustosz, Howard Churchwell, and David Lincoln due to employees' support for the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act in consequence of which, inter alia, their challenged ballots in Case 7–RC–16764 should be opened and counted and, further, whether the Respondent engaged in various conduct alleged to violate employees' rights under Section 7 of the Act during the period surrounding the July and September 1982 employee terminations.[1]

On consideration of the entire record, including the witnesses' demeanor and briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel and counsel for Respondent, I make the following

[1] The tally of ballots for the election held on September 30, 1982, shows the following ballots were cast: two yes, three no, and six challenges, of which three challenges were later sustained, leaving the status of ballots cast by Kustosz, Churchwell, and Lincoln for determination herein.

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Michigan corporation engaged in manufacture and sale of tool components at its plant in Warren, Michigan, annually ships products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside Michigan. As admitted, I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act. The Union is the Petitioner in the companion representation case, and its status as a labor organization within the meaning of the Act is established.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Layoff of Carol Kustosz

Carol Kustosz was hired in October 1981 as a machine operator and also to perform inspection work, then being performed by Kenneth Bratt, general manager in Respondent's tool component grinding and production shop where up to 14 employees were assigned to machine operating tasks.

Kustosz inspected studs under a shadow graph checking for correct tolerances, then cleaned and packaged them for shipment. She also did chamfering production work, deburred burrs on studs, used the grinding machine, and when such jobs were completed returned to inspection work. A month after Kustosz was hired Respondent's owner, Oscar Guensche, openly and warmly praised Kustosz on the shop floor to Edward Bernacki, vice president, for her fine work performance. Shortly afterward, Kustosz received a wage increase although she had only been working 5 weeks and the established waiting period was 90 days. Within a few weeks Kustosz received a second wage increase after devising a time saver on the chamfering machine. She received yet a third raise only a few weeks later, being informed by her floor manager, the owner's son, Clayton Guensche, that the reason for the raise was because she deserved it. Respondent General Manager Kenneth Bratt testified that during his interview of Kustosz he only promised her an increase after 90 days, and that her wage increases were unusual in the shop. By the time of later events described below, Kustosz, who had taken training at the Chrysler Learning Training Center before being hired by Respondent, and who sought college training for a journeyman's card as a general machinist during her tenure, had performed numerous tasks in the shop, including operation of grinders, Harding lathe, larger lathe, speed lathe, and a centerless grinder, all in addition to inspection work.

The events directly preceding Kustosz' layoff occurred on July 29 and during the morning of July 30, 1982.

Kustosz spoke with Clayton Guensche at 7 a.m. Thursday, July 29, in the front inspection room, reminding him about earlier assurances concerning a pay raise and asking what her chances were. When Guensche responded negatively, Kustosz described how she would be better off given family problems at home and the only slight difference between her present pay and the amount she would receive on layoff if Respondent would simply put her on such status noting, in addition, that work looked slow to her anyway. Guensche told her he could not do that, explaining that the shop had a lot of work, a large order of studs was coming in and there was a lot of work she did not know about.

Later in the same morning, Kustosz explained her family problems to Bratt, again asking if there was any chance for a promised raise and, when told no, asked about a layoff. Bratt responded no to this request as well. About a half hour later Bratt went to Kustosz and asked her who she thought she was "to say when she deserved a raise." Kustosz asked if he was so upset then why not give her a layoff, and Bratt replied because the Company did not lay off people for no reason.

During the lunch break, Kustosz told other employees that the employees needed a union, and phoned Attorney Webb to whom she described the situation at the shop and how employees were seriously considering a union for representation.

Kustosz then returned to her work station and prepared three signs which she then wore on her person, one on each shoulder, and one on her back. One contained the handprinted words, "THIS PLACE NEEDS A UNION," a second, "I don't want to be layed [sic] off! Carolann," and the third, also handprinted, "DAWSON INC. NEEDS A UNION." Kustosz stated that she signed the second one because she did not want anyone to think she wanted to be permanently laid off.

It did not take very long before Kustosz' actions caused a considerable stir. Respondent Vice President Edward Bernacki walked by, stopped to talk to Oscar Guensche's nephew, and the two looked over at Kustosz. Moments later, Respondent Owner Oscar Guensche came by and noticed the signs. Kustosz testified: "He stood directly in front of me and just leaned forward and had a pouting expression on his face, and then he walked up front, and all of them [Guensche, Bernacki, and Guensche's nephew, a shop employee] were just talking."

Employee Timothy Ray then told Kustosz he was ordered by Clayton Guensche not to come and speak to her, and employee David Lincoln told her that Kenneth Bratt had just approached him and told him, "Carol's crazy." Lincoln, who testified that Bratt added, "that's all this place needs is a union," also advised Kustosz not to talk to management alone as she was in trouble and would need witnesses.

An hour later, around 2:30 p.m., both the plant manager and Clayton Guensche went to Kustosz at her work station. According to Kustosz, Guensche pointed his finger at her and screamed, "Are you doing this to me?" and when Kustosz asked, "doing what to you," Guensche said, "Bringing this union thing in here." She replied she had discussed her raise with him that morning, that it was not him, it was the Company. Guensche then said, "I am taking this on a personal note" and that he was very disappointed in Kustosz after all he had taught her. At one point Kustosz was told there would be more conversation in the office with her concerning the matter and she indicated she wanted employee Lincoln to be with her. When told Lincoln was not going to be present, Kustosz replied that she then had nothing to say.

I find, based on the foregoing, that Respondent, through admitted Supervisor Clayton Guensche, unlawfully interrogated Kustosz concerning her union activities as his questioning accusation, whether rhetorical, as contended by Respondent on brief, or not, was calculated to instill fear in the employee in connection with the exercise of Section 7 rights. Detroit Tubing Mill, 268 NLRB 1104 (1984); K-C Machine & Tool Co., 268 NLRB 1474 (1984). Further, I find that by pointing and screaming at Kustosz concerning her sign-wearing and intentions to bring in a union coupled with the admitted statement, sinister in this context, that he was "taking this on a personal note" after all he had taught her, Guensche, and thereby Respondent, unlawfully threatened Kustosz with unspecified reprisals because she engaged in activities in support of union representation thereby further violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Montgomery Ward & Co., 234 NLRB 13, 53 (1978), and Misericordia Hospital Medical Center, 246 NLRB 351 (1979).

Kustosz, after the above, had another conversation with Guensche that day wherein she attributes the following comments to Guensche, who did not deny the attributions but merely could not recall his statements, wherefore Kustosz, whose demeanor and testimonial performance warrant such, is credited.

She testified that during this second conversation Guensche remarked that "Well, you're drowning . . . why are you taking me down with you," explaining that "If you bring a union in here, I'm going to lose my job." Kustosz testified further that Guensche then said, "If a union comes in that his father [Oscar Guensche] would lay everyone off and close the place down." This undenied statement by Supervisor Clayton Guensche, son of Respondent Owner Oscar Guensche, is found to be an unlawful threat of plant closing and employee termination should employees secure union representation, a further violation of the Act. Purolator Armored, Inc., 268 NLRB 1268 (1984), and K-C Machine & Tool Co., supra. Guensche accused Kustosz of screaming union because she did not get her way and asked, "Why don't you just leave."

When Kustosz sought a compromise with Guensche the latter told her the whole front office was against her but made it clear if she backed out he could keep her on, stating, "I can do anything." Guensche then asked Kustosz what she wanted, offering her $8 an hour to back out.[2] Kustosz declined the offer, expressing concern that if she backed down she would be out on the street. She informed Guensche she expected a call from a lawyer that evening explaining what employee rights were for a union. Based on the foregoing, it is concluded that by offering Kustosz a wage increase to drop the union efforts, Respondent unlawfully promised a benefit to discourage employee exercise of rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, thereby further violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Telegram-Tribune Co., 268 NLRB 1114 (1984); and Haddon House Food Products, 242 NLRB 1057 (1979). As their conversation drew to a close Kustosz asked why it was not possible to compromise and make arrangements in regard to even a layoff. She was told it could not be done because this would be illegal as, "we have a lot of work here" and a large order of studs was coming in.

Respondent's reaction to the conduct of Carol Kustosz on July 29 picked up even further momentum the next morning, when employees arrived to see posted what was to them a brand new rule which stated, "Employees shall not post any notices anywhere in the plant or on bulletin boards without the prior consent of the General Manager." The notice was signed by Kenneth Bratt, general manager. Respondent, on brief, argues that this was merely "republication" of an existing rule hence valid, but there is no merit in such contention. Employees were unaware of any such rule being in existence in the past. Further, although Respondent proffered an extract from alleged plant work rules, Respondent's own general manager admitted that there was no employee manual for this shop, that to his knowledge rules have not been printed up or distributed to Respondent's employees, and that there was no personnel manual. Bratt admitted further on cross-examination that the work rules had been posted on a neighboring company's (Harboe Company) side of the plant property where Respondent's employees are not employed. Moreover, given its unexplained appearance otherwise out of the blue it can only be concluded that such rule was discriminatorily motivated by Kustosz' conduct the day before. Such being its purpose and content requiring prior approval for any posting, the rule can only be considered yet another Respondent interference with its employees' exercise of Section 7 rights violative of the Act. Liberty House Nursing Home, 236 NLRB 456, 461 (1978).

When Kustosz saw the rule that morning, she made a placard containing the picture of her two children, wrote the word "United" under it, and wore it on her shoulder.

At 9:30 a.m. Kustosz telephoned her mother and told her the fellows were coming over for a meeting that night and to be sure the coffeepot was ready. When she turned around she saw Kenneth Bratt close behind her listening to her talk on the phone. Kustosz noticed Bratt leave and go to Clayton Guensche's area and that the latter, together with Bratt and Comapny Vice President Edward Bernacki seemed to be in a huddle. After morning breaktime, without warning, Bratt handed Kustosz a termination slip, citing lack of work as the reason.

Analysis of Kustosz' Termination

There are numerous factors which militate towards a conclusion that Kustosz' termination was an unlawful act. A preponderance of the evidence discloses that Kustosz was an unusual, highly prized employee until her sudden termination only 1 day after angering Respondent by her open union advocacy. The record plainly established her high fitness for the many and varied tasks assigned to her for which she was rewarded with early wage increases and praise by high management officials, including Respondent owner Oscar Guensche, who personally singled her out on the plant floor for special praise. Her union activities were open, substantial, and well known to management and the record is clear that those activities stirred immediate and considerable Respondent animus towards her, including coercive questioning and accusation, unlawful promise of benefit, unlawful curtailment of employee expression concerning union representation in the plant, threats of unspecified reprisals, and threats of termination and plant closing should employees secure union representation. These indicia of unlawful motivation behind the termination are augmented by the fact that Respondent gave no notice whatsoever to Kustosz concerning her layoff, when it is reasonable to suppose that such notice would normally have been extended to an employee with her record.

[2] Respondent's counsel on brief points to variances in this conversation as reported by employee Lincoln, who overheard it, and Kustosz, who participated in it. Those variances are not unusual however, when two witnesses describe the same conversation, and in this instance the gist in the incident emerges unchanged; more significantly, Guensche, who failed to remember numerous events and conversations, could not recall his remarks during this one as well, but did not deny the attributions.

Respondent claims however, based on Bratt's testimony, that there was a policy against giving an employee advance notice of layoffs because of possible employee reprisal while the employee was on the job between the time of such notice and the employee's actual last day of employment. In this connection, Bratt testified that the decision concerning Kustosz was made in June due to a shortage of work.

The obvious fallacy in Bratt's defense is that if, in fact, the decision to lay off Kustosz had been made in June, then there was no reason Bratt and Clayton Guensche should deny her initial requests for a layoff on July 29 if indeed Bratt had scheduled her for a layoff the very day following her request—especially since Kustosz had pressed her inquiry so steadfastly. It is strongly worthy of note that Respondent's policy of avoiding reprisal by not giving advance notice of layoffs would hardly be applicable to a case where the employee herself had sought the layoff, for in such instance, it would not reasonsbly be expected that there would be any reprisal—nor is it reasonable to suppose the 1-day notice involved in this layoff, involving so valuable an employee, would likely occasion harm to Respondent's property. I conclude that the failure to give notice to Kustosz arose from Respondent's animus-fueled decision to rid itself of a prounion employee activist rather than any valid "policy." Autoglass & Upholstery Co., 264 NLRB 149 (1982); Class Watch Straps Co., 267 NLRB (1983).

If these considerations did not already suffice to establish the unlawful discharge, other factors serve to confirm such a finding. Respondent's first witness to support its defense that lack of work led to an earlier decision to lay off employees was Vice President Edward Bernacki, who was mainly fed leading questions and therefore his testimony is really the testimony of Respondent counsel, who was not on the witness stand. Bernacki merely "assumed" he had spoken with Guensche and Bratt earlier about the subject of layoffs and concurred. He testified, "I may have made the recommendations," and that, after leading by counsel, to wit, "June or July?" he answered, "It is very possible, yes."

But if he was vague in responding to leading questions, Respondent's next witness on its shortage of work defense engaged in exaggeration. Thus, Bratt testified that in early May he knew "we had far too many people and if we could not develop other business there would have to be drastic layoffs." Bratt stated (in June), "We were very short of work. Many other small parts were put on hold or delayed and canceled and all kinds of things had happened" to him. It turned out that only two employees were laid off at that time. This testimonial overkill arose in the context of an operation which clearly and admittedly had its ups and downs and the references to being very short of work and all kinds of things having happened to him [Oscar Guensche, the owner] are simply not tied in clearly to any rationale for terminating Kustosz and they detract from Respondent's defense. Telegram-Tribune Co., supra at 39. Nor was Oscar Guensche, owner of this relatively small shop and assumedly an authoritative and knowledgeable figure who could explain such matters, called upon by Respondent to testify at all.

Respondent's economic defense is rendered further dubious by its own exhibit, introduced by the Charging Party, which shows an improved record in shipments for July 1982—85,793 as against 30,989 for the previous June 1982—nor was this a mere flash in the pan, as August showed still more improvement to 89,020, and September 109,450.

It is undenied that the employees remaining after the layoff worked overtime for substantial periods, which indicates there were other options to losing Kustosz open to Respondent were this action against her merely caused by work shortage, that is, a redistribution of the work, and no valid reason was tendered for not avoiding the layoff of a valued employee. It defies belief that Respondent would reject such an alternative because it believed it would lose employees, who would allegedly quit their work in a well-known job-depressed Detroit, Michigan area rather than lose overtime.[3]

With respect to Respondent's contention that Kustosz was laid off in seniority the record supports the view that there was no uniformly followed policy according seniority rights to employees in times of layoff. In fact Respondent had passed over Kustosz and another employee, as well, to lay off a more senior employee (W. Darlak) because of comparatively better work performance (skill in Lincoln's case) in the junior employees (Kustosz and Lincoln). No reason was advanced why, in this case, especially since there was inspection work left to be down by Bratt, and she had been told only 1 day before (as later confirmed by employee Lincoln below) that there was plenty of work to be done, Kustosz was not retained to do such work but instead was terminated the very next day. Based on all the foregoing, I find that counsel for the General Counsel has established by a strong preponderance in the evidence, including allowable and compelling inferences therefrom, that Respondent discriminatorily terminated Carol Kustosz in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act because she engaged in activities in support of union representation. Purolator Armored, Inc., 268 NLRB 1268 (1984), and cases cited therein; Universidad Interamericana de Puerto Rico, 268 NLRB 1171 (1984); Class Watch Straps Co., supra, 267 NLRB 276 (1983), and Autoglass & Upholstery Co., supra, 264 NLRB 149 (1982).

The Layoff of David Lincoln and Related Events

Respondent General Manager Bratt was surprised, on Monday, August 2, following Kustosz' layoff, when he confronted a stranger in the plant, one Peter Bernert, a former fiance of Kustosz, who was delivering a letter from Charging Party Counsel L. Rodger Webb. The letter informed Respondent that the Union was organizing its employees and identified members on the organizing committee, including employee David Lincoln. Bratt insisted that Bernert enter via the front door and announce himself to the receptionist. In an ensuing commotion, I find that Bratt, in the presence of an office clerical employee and others, and in a voice loud enough with others shouting to be heard but not then understood by plant employees, twice exclaimed while trying to oust Bernert and while throwing the letter on the floor that, "We don't need a union in here. If a union comes in here we'll close this place down." I find that Respondent, through General Manager Bratt, as undenied, threatened employees with plant closing if employees selected union representation thereby further violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

By letter to Respondent dated August 3, 1982, the Union's Local vice president sent Respondent a letter similar to Webb's, again naming Lincoln as a member on the organizing committee.

About 5 weeks after Respondent laid off Kustosz, Lincoln testified that Bratt came to his machine and told him he was going to explain unions to employees, about procedures, and "how that if you get a union in, there's going to be strict rules and regulations," and that unions were bad because they made companies noncompetitive. I find that Bratt made this statement with no valid prefatory context or explanation leaving a sinister impact and thereby threatened an employee with strict rules and regulations, in effect, less desirable working conditions, if employees selected union representation, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969), and in relevant part Mark I Tune-Up Centers, 256 NLRB 898, 906 (1981). Lincoln, who in an earlier discussion with Bratt had informed him that he did not think that unions were all that bad, countered that there was an employee, Tim Ray, who was among the highest in seniority but the lowest paid. Bratt replied that "if the union came in here, that man would probably be out the door," thereby further threatening employee termination if employees selected a union, again violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. When Lincoln continued to express his views by asking Bratt about Carol Kustosz, Bratt said, "Well, she was laid off primarily because of her attitude," a comment lending further support, in my view, for the finding that Kustosz was discriminatorily discharged.

Revealingly, when Lincoln asked if there would be any more layoffs after Kustosz and Churchwell, Bratt told him no. This was the same answer Lincoln had been given by Bratt just after the layoffs of Barlak and Jakel on May 21, 1982, at which time Bratt had answered him "we were going to be able to ride out the storm." In any event, this assurance was also to prove inaccurate.

Early in September 1982, after he had signed a union card, Lincoln notified Bratt he was receiving or had received an NLRB subpoena and was to appear before the NLRB to make an affidavit. Shortly after lunch, Lincoln testified that Oscar Guensche walked by his work station and gave him a dirty look while on the way to his office, "a scowling look." On September 17, 1982, Respondent terminated Lincoln indefinitely. Lincoln testified that same morning he went into the inspection room as usual to see if there were any more dies and saw an order on the table for 30 dies, scheduled to come in on October 1, 1982. In addition, Bratt had told Lincoln 6 weeks earlier that three orders were coming in, and offered no reason why, as in the earlier May terminations, Lincoln, a speciality skilled machinist, was not retained because of such special skill even if he had to do run-of-the-mill shopwork thereby wisely having him on hand to do the special turnover die work for which he possessed such valuable skill and experience when such need were to recur, even assuming, without accepting the assertion, that there was a shortage in that type work. Charging Party's Exhibit 1, in this regard, shows more than a four fold increase in shipments in September, the month of Lincoln's discharge and the previous February.

In assessing the allegation that Respondent discriminatorily terminated Lincoln, certain relevant factors are governing. Lincoln was a known ally to Carol Kustosz, who requested he be allowed to accompany her to the front office in the very midst of her most irritating prounion behavior. Lincoln defended the idea of a union to management, specifying an employee who might thereby be helped. He was expressly identified in two letters from the Union to Respondent as a member on the organizing committee, signed a union card and told Respondent he was complying with a subpoena to make an affidavit before the NLRB's Regional Office soon after which he was, in the face of earlier reassurances to the contrary, laid off indefinitely less than 2 weeks before a Board-conducted representation election in circumstances which fail to provide economic justification for such action. Given Respondent's knowledge of Lincoln's activities and support for the Union, its animus as demonstrated by its numerous unlawful actions against employee statutory rights, the timing, and unjustified, or pretextual, nature of the advanced reasons for its action, I find on the bases of the above-cited authorities that Respondent discriminatorily terminated employee David Lincoln in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. McCarty & Son, Inc., 268 NLRB 1136 (1984).

The Layoff of Howard Churchwell

Howard Churchwell was hired April 13, 1982, as a machinist, and ran several different types. He received, on request, a wage increase on the Monday before his layoff on July 30 with Kustosz. It is, at the outset, a further basis to those explained above, to question whether Respondent would bother giving employee Churchwell a raise on Monday if, as alleged, Respondent had already decided a month beforehand to terminate him 4 days later. It seems further proof that Respondent actually reached its decision regarding the July 30 terminations on July 29 or 30 on the heels of the above-described union activities. In any event, Churchwell testified without contradiction that there were substantial orders in the plant, and that employees were taken off them to work on another order about 2 weeks prior to his termination. He testified that while departing the plant on July 30, after being terminated, Clayton Guensche advised him to return in a couple weeks, as "we might have some work for you."

Counsel for the General Counsel contends that Respondent, in order to shore up its defense that it terminated Kustosz according to seniority, had to terminate Churchwell, who was junior to Kustosz, in order to get to her and thus his termination was unlawful, as part of an unlawful design to terminate Kustosz.

The fact that Respondent failed to clearly support a pre-July 29 or 30 decision for layoffs makes the July 30 layoffs suspicious in origin, since this action seems to have arisen only from Kustosz' conduct in support of union representation for employees. The suspicion deepens when Respondent's reasons for any layoff are not persuasively tendered in testimony or other evidence. The undenied fact that Respondent told Churchwell, or invited him, to return for possible work in a couple of weeks belies a drastic need for any layoffs rather than, for example, reduction in overtime, with a redistribution of work, and raises the question why the offer was tendered to Churchwell and not Kustosz, the senior in terms of plant seniority. A reasonable inference is that Respondent desired him to return, and not her, and also that all along there was available work to keep them both busy. Laying them both off while extending an invitation only to him to return served the dual purpose of "following seniroity" in Kustosz' termination while designedly resecuring the services of Churchwell a short time later. The Board has held in the context of a union organizing drive that an employer's discharge of uncommitted, neutral, or inactive employees in order to "cover" or to facilitate discriminatory conduct against a targeted union-supporting employee or to discourage employee support for the union is violative of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Stratford Lithographers, 168 NLRB 469, 476, 477 (1967); and Majestic Molded Product, 143 NLRB 71 (1963), enfd. 330 F.2d 603, 606 (2d Cir. 1964). See also NLRB v. Rich's Precision Foundry, 667 F.2d 613 (7th Cir. 1981). Necessarily, such findings depend on inferences arising from the surrounding circumstances as such employees, like Churchweli, are pawns in an unlawful design, rather than direct targets. Stratford Lithographers Inc., supra at 477. I draw the inference here that in Respondent's angry resolve to terminate Kustosz it unlawfully removed Churchwell to validate such action, thereby violating Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. In doing so, I note Respondent's failed attempts to establish an economic defense before me as to matters which, had the contentions been based on fact, would have easily lent themselves to demonstration—for example, records showing hours worked per part number or type, or orders on hand translated into the hours of employee work necessary to fill such orders. Instead, the vagueness and contrasting overkill in testimonial deliveries on such matter, and the unspecific, nondeterminative nature of Respondent's proffered exhibits, coupled with the inherent improbability in its witnesses' explanations, left Respondent's assertion of an economic defense unsupported. By contrast, Charging Party's Exhibit 1 established, to the contrary, that work was high at critical points. At best, the operation was one with ups and downs and, as noted in Respondent's brief, a long-delayed order did come in after layoffs, a common enough expectation to have forestalled any determination by Respondent that drastic layoffs were necessary, unless, as I conclude herein, the advent of its employees' union activities and the soon-to-arrive Board election to determine union representation provided such need in Respondent. I conclude this was the case.[4]

Representation Case 7–RC–16764

In view of the foregoing it shall be recommended that the challenges to the ballots cast by Kustosz, Churchwell and Lincoln be overruled and their ballots be opened and counted, and that a revised tally of ballots issue, all to follow the recommended remand of said case to the Regional Director of Region 7 for said purposes.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth in section II, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices occurring in connection with the operations of Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent officials Oscar Guensche, Kenneth Bratt, and Clayton Guensche at all times material herein were supervisors and agents for Respondent acting on its behalf within the meaning of the Act.

4. Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by:

(a) Coercively interrogating an employee concerning the employee's union activity.

(b) Threatening an employee with unspecified reprisals for engaging in union activities.

[4] Counsel for Respondent makes the cogent observation on brief that the Regional Office "found" declining orders in Respondent's operations to buttress its position or economic defense in the present proceeding. The Region's report, GC–1k, reads, in the context of evaluating whether certain employees (whose ballots were challenged) had a reasonable expectancy of recall, that "there is no evidence to rebut the Employer's projection of declining business volume . . . at the time of September 17, 1982." At this hearing, however, the issue was business activity at the time of the layoffs and CP–1 rebuts the defense.

(c) Threatening employees with plant closing and terminations if employees selected union representation.

(d) Promising an employee a wage increase in order to persuade the employee to back off from efforts to secure union representation.

(e) Publishing a plant rule prohibiting the posting of notices anywhere in the plant without prior consent of Respondent because of employee union activities.

(f) Threatening an employee with strict rules and regulations if employees selected union representation.

5. Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by terminating Carol Kustosz, David Lincoln, and Howard Churchwell because of employees' union activities.

6. Respondent did not engage in conduct creating the impression that employees' union activities were being kept under surveillance.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in the unfair labor practices set forth above, I will recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully terminated Carol Kustosz, David Lincoln, and Howard Churchwell, I will recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former or substantially similar position, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and that Respondent make them whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discriminatory actions by payment to them of a sum equal to that which they would have normally received as wages from the date of their termination until Respondent offers them reinstatement, less any net earnings in the interim. Backpay, with interest, is to be computed on a quarterly basis in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[5]

I further will recommend that Respondent make available to the Board, on request, payroll and other records in order to facilitate checking the amount of backpay due them and other rights they may be entitled to receive.

As Respondent's conduct found unlawful herein goes "to the very heart of the Act," a broad remedy is warranted.[6]

The Washington Star Company and Columbia Typographical Union No. 101. Case 5–CA–13812–2

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 21 March 1983 Administrative Law Judge Sidney J. Barban issued the attached decision. Exceptions to the judge's decision were due 29 April 1983. The Respondent's exceptions and supporting brief postmarked 29 April 1983 were received 2 May 1983. The Respondent's exceptions were rejected by the Board as untimely. On 1 June 1983 by telegraphic order, the Board denied the Respondent's "Motion for Reconsideration" and on 7 June 1983 the Board issued an order adopting the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions.

On 24 April 1984 the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit denied enforcement of the Board's order and remanded the case to the Board for consideration of the Respondent's exceptions. By an order dated 12 June 1984 the Board rescinded its order of 7 June 1983. The Respondent has filed exceptions to the judge's decision and a supporting brief. The General Counsel has filed an answering brief to the Respondent's exceptions and brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, the Washington Star, Washington, D.C., its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

SIDNEY J. BARBAN, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard at Washington, D.C., on August 23 and October 15, 1982, on a complaint issued on December 21, 1981 (all dates are in 1981, unless otherwise noted), pursuant to a charge filed by the above-named Charging Party (the Union) on October 20. The complaint alleges that the above-named Respondent[1] violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by declining to furnish the Union, as requested, with a copy of the contract between Respondent and the Washington Post Company (The Post) regarding the purchase by the Post of certain equipment and Respondent's Washington facility, which information, it is alleged, is necessary for and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the alleged appropriate bargaining unit.[2] The answer denies the unfair labor practices alleged.

On the entire record in this case, from observation of the witnesses, and their demeanor, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

For several years prior to August 7, 1981, Respondent published in the District of Columbia an evening newspaper of general circulation (The Evening Star). During the annual period prior to that date, similar to its operations in previous years, Respondent subscribed to interstate news services, published nationally syndicated features, and had a gross annual volume of business exceeding $200,000. The Evening Star ceased publication on August 7, 1981. However, it was stipulated that Respondent at the time of the hearing continued to be an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, and I so find.

The answer to the complaint admits and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. SUMMARY OF FACTS AND ISSUES

For a number of years, Respondent recognized the Union and several other labor organizations as the bargaining representatives of various separate bargaining units of Respondent's employees. As has been noted, Respondent's bargaining contract with the Union, by its terms runs to December 31, 1983. Among the provisions of that contract are clauses (considered in more detail hereinafter) referred to as "lifetime job guarantee" and "successorship" clauses, which are significant to the issues in this matter.

[1] Respondent's name as corrected at the hearing.

[2] The complaint alleges, and I find, that an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of the Act consists of Respondent's employees performing work in the composing room, as set forth in Sec. 7 of the bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union effective from January 1, 1979, to December 31, 1983, which unit was described by William J. Boarman, president of the Union, as "the composing room unit which consists of operators at typesetting machines, makeup persons who would make up and assemble the newspaper, proofreaders, ad makeup people, and machinists who perform maintenance [on] the equipment which the [unit] employees operate."

After the owners of Respondent, apparently in July 1981, decided to cease publication of the Evening Star, for reasons not disclosed on this record, the various labor organizations involved, including the Union, were notified, and Respondent met jointly, at first, with all these Unions to answer questions and deal with problems of common interest. Thereafter, Respondent met with these Unions separately. During these separate meetings, the Union advised that it would continue to assert the continued viability of the lifetime job guarantee in its bargaining agreement.

On August 7, as has been noted, Respondent ceased publication of the Evening Star.

On September 2, The Post, publisher of the morning newspaper in the District of Columbia (The Washington Post) put out a news release to the effect that the owners of The Evening Star had agreed to sell the plant formerly used by Respondent in the District and most of its equipment to The Post. A lengthy news article to this effect also appeared in The Washington Post. By letter dated September 4, the Union requested that Respondent furnish the Union with a copy of "the purchase and sale agreement" between the Post and Respondent referred to, though stating no specific reason for the request. However, at a meeting with Respondent on September 30, the Union contends that it specifically informed Respondent that it needed the sales agreement in order to determine whether there had been a violation of the lifetime job guarantee and the successorship clauses of the bargaining contract. Respondent denies this, and claims that the failure of the Union to demonstrate that the information requested was reasonably necessary and relevant to the administration of its bargaining contract with the Union and the asserted confidential nature of the document, relieves Respondent of any obligation to provide that information. It is further contended, as discussed, that certain alleged procedural errors at the hearing prevented Respondent from fully attacking the credibility of union representatives' testimony as to statements assertedly made at the September 30 meeting.

During this same period, the Union, which apparently had a bargaining agreement with the Post similar to that with Respondent, was attempting to secure a copy of the sales agreement from the Post. The Union also apparently filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Post when that publisher refused to provide the Union with a copy of the sales agreement, but seems to have withdrawn the charge.[3] Respondent contends, quite vigorously (on the record Respondent stated that this "goes to the essence of the case"), that the Union's real purpose in seeking the sales agreement from Respondent was not to administer its contract with the Respondent, but to attempt to have the Post comply with the lifetime job guarantee in the Post's bargaining agreement, and thus the Union's request of Respondent had no relevance to Respondent's bargaining agreement.

Respondent further contends that the sales agreement contains "sensitive" and "confidential" material, and that it had an understanding with the Post not to disclose the document. In a somewhat related argument in its brief (p. 14), Respondent asserts that the sales agreement relates to Respondent's "business decision to terminate its operations," and, arguing that Respondent would not be required to bargain over its decision to close, "[Respondent] does not have the attendant duty to disclose information, such as the sale agreement, that is relevant only to that decision."

III. THE COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING AGREEMENT

The significant clauses in the bargaining contract (G.C. Exh. 3) are contained in the Memorandum of Agreement attached to and made a part of the contract. These clauses, in relevant part, are the following (particular provisions have been italicized for emphasis):

(1) Job Guarantee

> (a) Each employee whose name appears on the list of employees to be known as the Job Guarantee Roster will be entitled to the benefits set forth in paragraph (b).
> (b) The publisher agrees that all of its composing room employees whose names appear on the Job Guarantee Roster wil be guaranteed a regular full-time situation . . . with the publisher in accordance with the provisions of the latest Collective-Bargaining Agreement for the remainder of their working lives until they vacate same through retirement, resignation, death, or discharge for cause; provided, however, in the event the Publisher permanently ceases publication such guarantee will thereupon cease. . . .
> (e) In the event the Publisher merges with any other publisher or acquires or consolidates its business in any manner or changes its operation in any manner, such change of circumstances will in no manner abrogate or alter this job Guarantee, and any successor employer, publishing company, or enterprise will be fully bound by the terms of this Job Guarantee as if such change or successor enterprise had been an original party thereto.
> . . . .
> (g) The Job Guarantee will not be subject to amendment or revision in future collective-bargaining negotiations.

[3] During the hearing there was considerable dispute as to whether the filing of such a charge against the Post was relevant. It was held that the filing of a charge against the Post was not relevant to this proceeding and I adhere to that view. However, for the purpose of this decision I have assumed that such a charge was filed. The numbering of this case indicates that a closely related charge was filed. The president of the Union testified that though the Union is not currently pursuing anything against the Post it had done so at one time.

IV. THE REQUESTS FOR INFORMATION

A. The Written Request

By letter dated September 4, William J. Boarman, president of the Union, wrote John Dawson, then director of human resources of Respondent, as follows:

> The recent news stories about the purchase of the Washington Star Building and equipment by the Washington Post has necessitated this letter.
> This is an official request by this organization for a copy of the purchase and sale agreement entered into by the Washington Star Company or Time Inc. and the Washington Post Company covering the above-referred to transaction.

Boarman received no written reply to this request.

B. The September 30 meeting

At a meeting on September 30 with Dawson to discuss other matters, Boarman brought up his request for the sales agreement and reaffirmed it. There is some conflict among the witnesses as to what then occurred, as discussed in some detail below.

Boarman testified that at this meeting "[Dawson] said that if I could tell him what part of the document I was interested in, he could perhaps get that for me. But if I was asking him for the whole document, he thought the answer would be 'no' . . . I told John that I didn't know what part of the document I wanted because I didn't know what it contained. And that we would have to have the whole document. . . . I explained to him about the successorship clause in the contract and the lifetime job guarantees which were part of great importance to the Union and its members, and that we needed that purchase and sale agreement to properly administer our contract and see if there had in fact been a violation of those clauses." Boarman asserts that after this explanation, Dawson "just reiterated his position that if we could tell him what portion it was [that we wanted] . . . perhaps he could give it to us. But if it was the whole document, he thought the answer would be 'no,' and that's where we left it."[4]

The secretary-treasurer of the Union, Robert Petersen, who also attended this meeting, testified that Boarman asked Dawson for a copy of the sales agreement "to ascertain whether or not [Respondent] had violated at least two provisions of our negotiated agreement, one dealing, of course, with the successorship and one pertaining to the lifetime job guarantee provision of the contract." Petersen recalled that Dawson said that "he didn't think" he could secure a copy of the sales agreement, to which the union representatives replied that "it was absolutely essential that we have a copy of it to ascertain whether or not a violation [of the collective-bargaining] had occurred." According to Petersen, Dawson "then said something to the effect that if we could be specific about some provision of the agreement; and we said we thought we were being specific, we had come to ascertain if a violation had occurred in those provisions we have indicated." Petersen's recollection is that Dawson ended the discussion by saying that he would see what he could do, but that Respondent never provided the Union with the sales agreement.

Dawson, on the other hand, denies that "at any time during this meeting, the Union "ever provide[d] . . . a reason for requesting" the sales agreement, testifying that he does "not recall" Boarman raising the subject of the successorship clause with him during that meeting. Dawson testified that when Boarman, at this meeting, asked about the sales agreement, he (Dawson) told Boarman that "I thought that turning over the entire document would be inappropriate, particularly since he had not given me any reasons as to why he wanted the document. I further told him that if he could give me some specific reasons as to why he wanted the document or parts of the document that I would pursue his request."[5] Dawson states that Boarman said he wanted the entire document.

Though Dawson avers that he indicated to Boarman at this meeting that some parts of the document might be disclosed if the Union were more specific, he admits that he did not indicate what parts he felt could not be disclosed. Further, in seeming contradiction to his testimony on direct examination, Dawson, on cross-examination stated that he did not tell the Union that if they gave a specific reason for their request, he would seek to obtain the agreement for them, because, he says, at that time the Union was seeking the entire document. Dawson says, "[w]hile I never argued with the fact that there may be specific provisions of that purchase and sale agreement that might have relevance to the Union's interest, I had to know what those were before I could take a request to [Respondent's management] to find out whether we could get it or not."

Finally, Zachery Fasman, one of Respondent's attorneys, who was present at the meeting on September 30, recalls that Boarman asked if Respondent were going to provide the Union with a copy of the sales agreement as he had previously requested; that Dawson asked "why he wanted it"; and that, though Fasman does not recall the specific words used, Boarman replied that he wanted to examine the document "an see if it was relevant to the [4] At the hearing, Boarman testified that the sales agreement was necessary so that the Union could determine whether a grievance should be filed alleging that Respondent had violated the bargaining agreement. He also stated that the Union was not interested in the dollar amounts involved, and that if the document merely showed a sale of assets and equipment, the Union would probably do nothing. It is not indicated that this was stated at the September 30 meeting however.

[5] Dawson testified during the hearing that in the absence of "any specific reason or reference why the Union wanted [the document], I was unable to go back to management [of Respondent] and give them some coherent reason why it was necessary [to honor the Union's request]"; also that since parts of the sales agreement were "highly sensitive," it could not be released "unless we had some reason for their request." Later, however, Dawson admitted that he had cause to believe, and did assume, that the Union's request was based on the successorship and lifetime job guarantee provisions in the bargaining agreement and, in fact, he had discussed this with Respondent's management in connection with the Union's request for the sales agreement.

Finally, contrary to the testimony set forth in the text, Dawson also testified that he did not ask Boarman at this meeting to specify the reasons the Union wanted the sales agreement.

contract between the [Union] and the [Respondent]: "but he says Boarman did not specify the provision in the bargaining agreement to which he had reference.[6]

From my observation of the witnesses, the nature of their testimony, and the record as a whole, I credit Boarman and Petersen as to what Boarman told Dawson at the September 30 meeting. It is clear from Dawson's testimony that it was fairly obvious that the Union's reason for requesting the sales agreement was rooted in the lifetime job guarantee and successorship clauses of the bargaining agreement, and it was reasonable to assume that was the case. Indeed, he did so. If Dawson, in fact asked Boarman for the reasons for his request, as both Dawson (at one time) and Fasman testified, it is difficult to believe that Boarman would have failed to give these reasons, which were so self-evident that Dawson says he inferred them. I do not find persuasive Respondent's argument that Boarman was so preoccupied with securing the document to assist the Union in bargaining with the Post that he refused or failed to give reasons for seeking the document from Respondent.[7]

I was not favorably impressed with Dawson's testimony, which as I have noted herein, tended to be inconsistent, and something less than candid, as when he insisted that he was hindered in discussing with management the Union's request for the sales agreement because he did not know the reasons for the Union's request, though he concedes that he had readily inferred those reasons, and had discussed them with Respondent's management. I have given consideration to the fact that at the time he testified Lawson had not been employed by Respondent for nearly a year. Perhaps his memory was not as clear as it might have been. I have also considered Respondent's argument that it was hindered in cross-examining Boarman by procedural rulings. These are discussed hereinafter.

C. Respondent's Asserted Reasons for Refusing the Union's Request

Dawson was the only witness to testify concerning Respondent's reasons for refusing to give the Union the sales agreement. However, it is clear that he did not participate in that decision,[8] nor was he engaged in the negotiations between Respondent and the Post which led to the sales agreement, which he did not see until after he had left Respondent's employ. Thus, Dawson's testimony on this point appears to be what he says Hoyt told him were the reasons for not complying with the Union's request.

Originally, Dawson says, Respondent did not give the Union the sales agreement because, when the Union made its request, the sales agreement had not actually been signed but, as he recalls, the agreement was signed before September 30.[9] He also avers that at the outset it was Respondent's position that the document was not relevant to the Union's interest, since Respondent considered it to be a sale of assets.

At another point, Dawson testified that the reasons for Respondent's refusal were that the Union failed to give specific reasons for requesting the document and, "additionally, the contents of that document, or at least parts of that document were highly sensitive." When asked what he meant by the term "sensitive," Dawson explained that (1) the document contained the sale price and "the understandings and agreements" between the parties (not otherwise detailed), and (2) that other negotiations were going on simultaneous with Dawson's discussions with Boarman concerning the sale of an editorial computer system and Respondent's fleet of trucks, and "to permit the document . . . to go public or where the people who were negotiating with the [Respondent] at the point in time would have been damaging to our interests."[10] Dawson added that Respondent also "took into consideration" the wishes of the Post that the document be kept confidential. Dawson says that the Post "felt it was to their disadvantage if the purchase price, the conditions under which the transfer of assets was made public."

On cross-examination, when asked what reasons he was given by Hoyt for refusing the Union's request, Dawson testified only that originally he was told that the sales agreement was in draft form and had not been executed, and later that there was an understanding between the Post and Respondent "with respect to confidentiality," and that "there was a great deal of information in that document that would be of no interest, value, to the [Union]."

Finally, testifying as to what he told the Union with respect to Respondent's reasons for refusing the Union's request, Dawson stated, "I believe we talked about it generally. I told [Boarman] there was some sensitive information in that document that I felt was inappropriate to release . . . and that, as importantly, there was an understanding between [Respondent] and The Post that the document would remain confidential."

To summarize, Respondent's asserted reasons for refusing the Union's request for the sales agreement are the following: First, the document had not been executed. This, of course, was no longer true as of September 30, when Respondent first answered the Union's request. Second, the Union failed to give specific reasons for the request. This also, was no longer true after September 30. Third, the Post did not want the agreement disclosed

[6] However, Fasman also testified that during this meeting the Union never offered a reason for requesting the document.

[7] Though Dawson testified that Boarman never gave any reason for seeking the sales agreement, it would appear from Fasman's testimony that Boarman did say he wanted to enforce the bargaining agreement. Fasman, nevertheless, also asserts that Boarman gave no reason for his request.

[8] Dawson, at one point, testified that the publisher of the Evening Star, George Hoyt, made the decision to refuse the union request, after consultation with Dawson. Elsewhere, Dawson asserted that he did not know who actually made that decision.

[9] Respondent's brief (p. 5) says that the "formal agreement" was executed September 25.

[10] I find this reference to asserted ongoing negotiations with Respondent vague and confusing. At the hearing it was my impression that, at this point, Dawson was referring to negotiations between Respondent and the Post. But, by September 30, the sales agreement between the Post and Respondent was complete. And, of course, "the people" who Dawson says were negotiating with Respondent would not have been the Post, since their management knew the terms of the sales agreement. On the face of it, I am inclined to think that this was a make-weight thrown in by Dawson on the spur of the moment.

because it contained the sales price and the terms and conditions of the transaction. These are terms which Dawson characterized as "highly sensitive." However, Respondent did not, so far as the record shows, indicate any intention to discuss these matters in any constructive detail.[11] Fourth, disclosure would interfere with Respondent's interests in certain unspecified negotiations with some unidentified people, and lastly, Respondent did not think that a great deal of the information in the document would be of interest or value to the Union.

V. THE ASSERTED PROCEDURAL ERRORS

Respondent complains that the rejection of Boarman's affidavit, offered by Respondent, deprived Respondent of its "right to impeach the credibility of Mr. Boarman's hearing testimony" that he explained at the September 30 meeting that the Union sought the sales agreement "to assess the applicability of the successorship clause of the collective bargaining agreement." (Br. 21.)

Respondent also complains that revocation of its subpoenas to the Regional Director for Region 5 and to the Union for information concerning the Union's dealings with The Post, "severely handicap[ped] Respondent's ability to present relevant evidence in defense against [the complaint]" (Br. 11), asserting that "the subpoenae were designed to secure information that would enable [Respondent] to prove that the [Union], in fact, was attempting to secure the agreement from [Respondent] for use in bargaining with the Post."

1. The subpoenas. From the outset of the hearing, as has been noted, Respondent insisted that the Union, in seeking the sales agreement from Respondent, desired to use the document in administering its bargaining agreement with The Post. After much argument, it was ruled that whether or not the sales agreement would assist the Union in administering its contract with the Post was not relevant or material to the resolution of the issue in this case, which is whether the document would assist the union in administering its contract with Respondent. Thus, if it is shown that the sales agreement would likely assist the Union in determining whether its contract with Respondent had been violated, it is of no consequence that the information sought might be of use to the Union for other legitimate purposes as well. As the Board stated in Associated General Contractors of California, 242 NLRB 891, 894 (1979):

> [I]t is well established that, where a union's request for information is for a proper and legitimate purpose, it cannot make any difference that there may be other reasons for the request or that the data may be but to other uses. Utica Observer-Dispatch, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 229 F.2d 575 (2d Cir. 1956).

See also East Dayton Tool & Die Co., 239 NLRB 141, 142 fn. 6 (1978).

On the other hand, of course, if it were shown that the Union's request was relevant and necessary to the Union's obligation to represent the unit employees, it would also not make any difference whether the Union may have had any other purpose in mind, for in such case no obligation on Respondent's part would arise.

For these reasons, and others set forth in the orders issued on the Motions to Revoke Subpoenas, the motions to revoke were granted and both subpoenas were revoked.

2. The affidavit. Respondent contends that it was prevented from placing in evidence Boarman's pretrial affidavit with attachments, which, it is asserted, contain prior statements inconsistent with his testimony in this proceeding. As was pointed out to counsel at the hearing (Tr. 78, 86), the Federal Rules of Evidence (Rule 613(b)) provide that "Extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is given an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate him thereon." See also NLRB v. Tahoe Vangas, 517 F.2d 747 (9th Cir. 1975).

So far as I have been able to determine, Respondent does not claim that there are any specific statements in Boarman's affidavit which are inconsistent with his testimony. Indeed, Respondent's counsel stated at the hearing that he was "not concerned about the affidavit. What I want to do is examine the witness about documents attached [to the affidavit as] exhibits." (Tr. 78, see also Tr. 52.) These exhibits were identified at the hearing as correspondence between the Union and The Post. From the record I assume, and assumed in ruling on the offer of the affidavit, that these exhibits would show, in some detail, that Boarman sought to secure from the Post a copy of the sales agreement between The Post and Respondent in order to administer the Union's separate bargaining agreement with the Post. Boarman testified to this effect at the hearing.

In essence, Respondent argues, not that the affidavit contains any statements which are inconsistent with Boarman's testimony, but that the documents attached thereto, if admitted, would show that the Union vigorously sought to obtain the sales agreement from the Post "for purposes having to do with the [Post]," which Respondent asserts is inconsistent with Boarman's testimony that he sought the sales agreement from Respondent for purposes having to do with Respondent. (Tr. 85–86.)

On consideration of the above, and the record as a whole, I reaffirm the ruling rejecting Boarman's affidavit and attachments, on the basis that Respondent has not shown a sufficient basis for their admission within Rule 613(b) set forth above, as interpreted in Vangas, supra.

As stated by the Board in Westinghouse Electric Corp., 239 NLRB 106 at 107 (1978) (footnotes omitted):

> It is well established that a labor organization, obligated to represent employees in a bargaining unit > with respect to their terms and conditions of employment, is entitled to such information from the employer as may be relevant and reasonably necessary to the proper execution of that obligation. The right to such information exists not only for the purpose of negotiating a contract, but also for the purpose of administering a collective-bargaining agreement. The employer's obligation, in either instance, is predicated upon the need of the union for such information in order to provide intelligent representation of the employees. The test of the union's need for such information is simply a showing of probability that the desired information was relevant, and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities. The union need not demonstrate that the information sought is certainly relevant or clearly dispositive of the basic negotiating or arbitration issues between the parties. The fact that the information is of probable or potential relevance is sufficient to give rise to an obligation on the part of the employer to provide it. The appropriate standard in determining the potential relevance of information sought in aid of the bargaining agent's responsibility is a liberal discovery-type standard.

[11] It appears that Dawson offered to "pursue" the Union's request if they would tell him what parts of the agreement they wanted. Boarman replied that since he did not know what was in the document, he could not tell what parts he wanted and, therefore, insisted on the entire document. As the Supreme Court once observed, Respondent was, in essence, requiring the Union "to play a game of blind man's bluff." See NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 438 fn. 8 (1967).

See also Boeing Co., 182 NLRB 421 (1970), and cases cited in both decisions.

Respondent does not dispute these principles, but argues that in the circumstances of this case, the Union's request for information was not sufficiently specific to raise an obligation on Respondent's part to provide the information sought. This is based on its contention that the Union failed, or refused, to tell Respondent the purpose for which the Union needed the information, that is, that the Union needed the information in order to intelligently enforce its bargaining agreement, or specific portions of that agreement. It is not necessary here to consider whether, in the situation here presented, such specificity was required. The facts show that Respondent could reasonably conclude from the facts at its disposal that the Union wanted the information sought in order to administer the "life-time job guarantee" and the "successorship" provisions in the current bargaining agreement and, indeed, that Respondent, in fact, did assume that was the Union's purpose. The Board has on several occasions held that such constructive notice is sufficient, in these circumstances, to raise an obligation on a respondent to provide the relevant information sought, see, e.g., Brazos Electric Power Cooperative, 241 NLRB 1016, 1018–19 (1979); Westwood Import Co., 251 NLRB 1213 (1980), as is the notice of the Union's purposes which Respondent received at the hearing. See Brazos, supra. In any event, as has been found, contrary to Respondent's position, the Union, in fact, did advise Respondent of its purposes in requesting the information sought.

Nevertheless, Respondent argues that the sales-purchase agreement between Respondent and The Post sought by the Union is not relevant to the Union's enforcement of the contract clauses set forth. Respondent initially asserts that the sales agreement merely involves liquidation of Respondent's assets pursuant to its decision to terminate Respondent's operations, and has no bearing on the wages, hours, or working conditions of employees in the bargaining unit who were displaced when Respondent ceased publication. Respondent argues that since it had no obligation to bargain with the Union concerning the decision to go out of business, it had no obligation to furnish the sales agreement which, it argues, "is relevant only to that decision."[12] A major difficulty with this argument and several like arguments asserted by Respondent is that it assumes a fact that may be critical to the proceeding, i.e., whether the sales agreement is solely a sale of assets or may be, in whole or in part, a transaction within the successorship provision of the bargaining agreement. The Union says that if the sales agreement involves merely a transfer of assets, it probably will not pursue the matter. Respondent has so far refused to disclose the agreement or any part of it. Thus, in absence of disclosure, the document appears to have a potential relevance to the enforcement of the bargaining agreement and is, therefore, relevant to the working conditions of the employees whose rights were established by that agreement. As the Board stated in Westinghouse, supra, it is not necessary to find here that "the information sought is certainly relevant or clearly dispositive of the basic . . . issues between the parties," "[t]he fact that the information is of probable or potential relevance is sufficent."

The Board has on a number of occasions held that where the union bargaining representative has received information that the employer may be subcontracting unit work or has or may be transferring its business to another, the union is entitled, on appropriate request, to information bearing on that issue, so that the union may properly represent the unit employees. See, e.g., Westwood, supra; Air Express International Corp., 245 NLRB 478 (1979). Respondent, however, asserts that those cases involved transfer of "going concerns" (Br. 15–16), which, it is argued, distinguishes those cases from the present matter. However, as Respondent has noted, each of these cases must be determined on its own circumstances (Br. 11). Here, the bargaining agreement provides that in the case Respondent merges with another, or is acquired, "or consolidates its business . . . or changes its operation in any manner," the resulting publisher shall be bound by the lifetime job guarantee in the bargaining agreement. Two facts are self-evident: unit employers who were guaranteed lifetime jobs by the bargaining agreement have been dismissed from their employment by Respondent and, as part of the circumstances involved, Respondent has transferred the building in which these employees were employed and apparently a major part of its equipment to another publisher by terms of a written document which Respondent refuses to disclose. In the circumstances there is not only a probability that the sales agreement would be useful to the Union in deciding whether to file a grievance on behalf of the unit employees or take other action against Respondent for failing to comply with the bargaining agreement, but the document is probably essential to that purpose.[13]

Respondent's reasons for refusing to disclose the agreement, considered at some length hereinabove, seems to boil down to one point, that Respondent and The Post did not want to disclose the sales prices and "the understandings and agreements" between the parties. In other words, Respondent says that the sales agreement was "confidential" and need not be disclosed, citing Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979). In that case, the employer refused to disclose to the union directly certain psychological test material used to determine whether union-represented employees should be promoted, but agreed to disclose the material to a certified psychologist chosen by the union there involved. The employer also refused to give the union test scores of employees who took the tests, unless the employees specifically agreed to waive their right to confidentiality of this material. The Board held that in both situations the material should be disclosed directly to the union, subject only to a protective order restricting disclosure of the material by the union.

The Supreme Court, first of all, found that the reasonableness of the employer's concern for secrecy was not in question, a point not at all evident here.[14] Because of the procedural posture in which the case was presented, the Supreme Court held, as to the psychological test material, only that the Board's remedy in ordering the test material be given directly to the union, rather than to a certified psychologist, was in error. In respect to the test scores, the Court stated that the employer's conditional offer to disclose the test scores was warranted and reasonable in the circumstances.

What is most evident in Detroit Edison, however, is the fact that at no time did the employer there claim the right to absolutely refuse to provide the information or documents required by the union in the performance of its duty to represent the employees, but in all situations offered the union reasonable means of securing the necessary information. See Air Express International Corp., supra. Here Respondent, though admitting that at least parts of the sales document were relevant to the Union's interest, insisted on a unilateral privilege to withhold the entire document. Nor may Respondent's obligation to provide the sales agreement be defeated by a private agreement between Respondent and The Post, as Respondent claims. See General Electric Co. v. NLRB, 466 F.2d 1177 (6th Cir. 1972); cf. Detroit Edison, supra, at 348 (indicating that staturory duties cannot be defeated by the standards of a private group).

[13] Respondent also points out that the bargaining agreement provides that its obligation to provide lifetime jobs under the bargaining agreement ceased when Respondent ceased publication. However, this is a matter of contract interpretation, in light of all the facts, to be made by the arbitrator, if a grievance is filed. It is not my function to pass on the merits of the contract dispute.

[14] One may have some appreciation for Respondent's desire to keep secret the sales prices involved, but there is little to support a finding of need for such secrecy. In any event, Respondent did not identify this as a concern to the Union during their discussions. At the hearing, the Union made clear that it was not interested in the sales prices. Respondent continues to refuse to disclose the material requested.

On the basis of the above, and the entire record, I find that by failing and refusing to provide the Union with the sales agreement between Respondent and The Post, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. The unit set forth in footnote 1 above is appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.
4. At all times material to this proceeding the Union has been the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.
5. Respondent has violated and continues to violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to grant the Union's demand for a copy of the sales agreement Respondent and The Washington Post Company entered into between September 2 and September 30, 1981, which is relevant and necessary to the Union's obligation to administer and enforce its collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent.
6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent has violated and continues to violate the Act by failing and refusing to grant the Union's demand for a copy of the sales agreement between Respondent and The Washington Post Company entered into in September 1981, it will be recommended that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and supply the Union, on request, with that document, provided, however, that Respondent may first delete therefrom the sales prices contained therein. The Union may see, study, and use the information provided to the extent required to protect the rights of the unit employees under the collective-bargaining agreement with Respondent, but shall not otherwise disclose the sales agreement to the employees or others.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[15]

ORDER

The Respondent, The Washington Star Company, Washington, D.C., its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Columbia Typographical Union No. 101 by refusing to furnish the Union with a copy of the sales-purchase agreement between Respondent and The Washington Post Company entered into during September 1981, or other information relevant and reasonably necessary to the Union's duty to administer and enforce the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and Respondent.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Furnish to the Union, on request, a copy of the sales-purchase agreement between Respondent and The Washington Post Company, entered into in September 1981, in accordance with the provisions of the section entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Mail to each employee in the appropriate unit covered by Respondent's collective-bargaining agreement with the Union during August 1981, at the employee's home address, a copy of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[16] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be immediately mailed to the employees designated above. Five additional signed copies shall be provided to the Union for posting at its offices and meeting places, if it desires.

[16] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with the Union by refusing to furnish the Union with the sales-purchase agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of their rights guranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, furnish to Columbia Typographical Union No. 101 a copy of the sales-purchase agreement entered into between The Washington Star Company and The Washington Post Company during September 1981, in order to assist the Union in protecting the rights of employees in the composing room covered by the Union's bargaining agreement with The Washington Star Company.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 4 May 1984 Administrative Law Judge James T. Youngblood issued the attached decision. The Respondent KTY Leasing Co., Inc. filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off drivers Hofer, Thornton, Muncy, and Evans, and mechanic Jones 16 October 1981,[4] because of their union and/or concerted activities. We agree with the judge's conclusion, but modify his rationale as described below.

In assessing the legality of the layoffs, we are guided by our Wright Line[5] analysis. Our initial inquiry under Wright Line concerns whether the General Counsel has shown that protected activity was "a motivating factor" in the employer's decision to lay off the alleged discriminatees. For reasons fully set forth in the judge's decision, we find that the General Counsel has sustained this burden. Briefly, the undisputed record shows that each of the five employees had become the object of management's attention and animosity by seeking to enforce their contractual rights, indicating their preference for a rival union, or engaging in other protected activity.

As the General Counsel has made out a prima facie case of unlawful motivation, the remaining question under Wright Line is whether the Respondent has demonstrated that the layoff of the five named employees would have occurred absent their protected activity. Both in its layoff letter sent to employees and at the hearing, the Respondent alleged "a severe downturn in business" as the justification for the layoff. In concluding that the asserted reason was "purely and simply a pretext" designed to "rid itself of the Union and all of the Union adherents including the five alleged discriminatees," the judge stated that "[a] review of the financial information submitted . . . indicates that [Fedco's] load level was increasing not decreasing prior to the layoff." Contrary to the judge's finding, the relevant exhibits show that the load level had declined for 4 straight weeks preceding the

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

No exceptions were filed to the judge's finding that Trans-State was not a successor to Fedco and KTY under the standard set forth in Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168 (1973).

The judge found Fedco and KTY are a "single integrated enterprise and a joint employer." We find, as the complaint alleges, that Fedco and KTY simply constitute a single employer.

To determine whether two entities are sufficiently integrated to be considered a single employer, the Board and courts examine four principal factors: (1) common management; (2) centralized control of labor relations; (3) interrelation of operations; (4) common ownership. Radio Union v. Broadcast Service, 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965); NLRB v. Browning-Ferris Industries, 691 F.2d 1117, 1122 (3d Cir. 1982); Shellmaker, Inc., 265 NLRB 749, 754 (1982). While none of these factors, viewed separately, has been held controlling, the Board has stressed the first three factors, particularly centralized control of labor relations. Parklane Hosiery Co., 203 NLRB 597, 612 (1973). Single-employer status depends on all of the circumstances and has been characterized as an absence of the "arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies." Blumenfeld Theatres Circuit, 240 NLRB 206, 215 (1979), enfd. 626 F.2d 865 (9th Cir. 1980).

While we agree with the judge that all four factors are present here, we emphasize certain evidence supporting the findings of common management and centralized control of labor relations.

Loren King, president and sole owner of Fedco and KTY, exercised complete control of labor relations and personnel policies for both entities including hiring, firing, wage rates, and fringe benefits. King's son, Maynard, was general manager of Fedco and a supervisor at KTY and made recommendations concerning hiring and firing for both concerns. The drivers at both locations performed identical work under the same work rules and conditions, and were supervised, dispatched, and disciplined by the same individuals.

We disavow fn. 2 of the judge's decision concerning Fedco's recognition of the Congress of Independent Unions because, as the judge noted, it is not an issue in this case.

[2] In fn. 9 of the decision, the judge found that, by Maynard King's statement to employees present at a spring 1981 safety meeting that he would close the doors if the Teamsters came to Fedco, the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. As the statement was not alleged as a violation in the complaint, nor fully litigated at the hearing, we reverse. See Cardivan Co., 271 NLRB 563 (1984), NLRB v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co., 613 F.2d 267, 273–275 (10th Cir. 1980). In any event, finding the violation would be cumulative and would not affect the remedy, as the judge found a similar statement made in September 1981, and alleged in the complaint, constituted a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1).

We will amend Conclusion of Law 4 to reflect the judge's finding the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) by "laying off" rather than "terminating" employees Rich Hofer, Charles Thornton, Rufus Muncy, Wes Evans, and Mike Jones.

[3] We will amend the Order to reflect the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening to transfer employee Jones to the third shift for filing a grievance and to include broad remedial language consistent with Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). We will also issue a new notice to employees.

Nevertheless, we find the Respondent's economic defense lacks merit. Of the 17 employees laid off on 16 October, 8 were employed at the Cincinnati facility and 9 at the Effingham, Illinois terminal.[8] The nine Effingham employees were placed on voluntary layoff and given the option of transferring to Cincinnati, although none chose to do so. The five alleged discriminatees were Cincinnati-based employees. They were placed on involuntary layoff and told they could return only if business improved. Since the Respondent offered Effingham employees work at its Cincinnati facility, a decline in business there cannot account for the layoff of the alleged discriminatees unless there is a neutral reason, such as seniority, for giving the Effingham employees the opportunity to transfer.[9] No such reason is evidenced in the record[10] or, in any event, advanced by the Respondent.

In fall 1980, the Respondent began a "Driver of the Year" contest to encourage driver safety and better work performance. Drivers were ranked numerically by Maynard King based on information he obtained in discussions with the safety director, operations manager, dispatchers, department supervisors, and the operations manager at the other terminals.[11]

The Respondent contends the "Driver of the Year" ranking was the sole criterion used to determine the 16 October layoffs. However, the record shows, as the judge found, that many of the employees retained either were not rated or did not even work for the Respondent during the relevant period,[12] while two of four employees laid off were on the ranking list.[13] Additionally, the Respondent has failed to explain why the four alleged discriminatees were laid off, when three drivers with lower ratings than Thornton and one driver with a lower rating than Evans were given the option of continuing to work.[14]

An examination of Fedco's hiring practices before and after the layoff conclusively establishes that the layoff could not have been due to a decline in its need for drivers. Prior to the layoff, the Respondent had been using temporary drivers and had actually used them with increasing frequency in the 2 months preceding 16 October.[15] Most significantly, the judge overlooked undisputed evidence that Loren King hired as many as four new permanent drivers between 16 October and the following 1 June. Though hired ostensibly by KTY Leasing, the new drivers performed the same work and drove the same trucks as the laid-off Fedco employees.[16] The Respondent offered no explanation for failing to recall its experienced drivers other than Loren King's statement that he "didn't want to."[17] When an employer lays off employees

[6] G.C. Exh. 14 indicates the following load per unit figures calculated on a weekly basis:

[7] The monthly load level in 1981 was:

[8] The judge inadvertently stated 16 rather than 17 employees were laid off 16 October. We correct the error.

[9] We also rely on Dispatcher-Supervisor Heritage's unrefuted statement that he was "just as desperate to move loads the day before the layoff as . . . 6 months before the layoff," as indicating business had not slowed such as to create the need for layoffs.

[10] Loren King admitted seniority was not the basis for the transfer offers made to Effingham employees, and the record fails to disclose another legitimate basis.

[11] The information obtained by Maynard King was used to make numerical entries on driver rating forms, filled out on a quarterly basis. Points were deducted for various deficiencies in work performance with accident record and attitude being of primary importance in the calculation. Drivers were later ranked according to the most points accumulated for the year.

[12] For example, the Respondent recorded no yearly ranking for drivers Webster, Pelcha, Molt, and Troutman, apparently because they had not worked for the entire rating period. Nevertheless, all four employees were retained, while Thornton and Evans, two ranked drivers, were laid off. Drivers Lorentz and Jim Rogers, former employees of Fedco, were working for other companies during the summer, yet were still retained.

[13] The drivers were Charles Thornton and Wesley Evans. We correct, however, the judge's inadvertent error in stating that Thornton ranked 2d rather than 17th on the "Driver of the Year" list.

[14] Hoard, Croy, and Brooks, three of the voluntary layoffs from Effingham, were ranked lower than Thornton on the list. Brooks was also ranked lower than Evans.

[15] In sec. III, par. 11, of his decision the judge stated Fedco continued to use temporary drivers after the layoff. Though there is no evidence the Respondent did not continue using temporaries after the layoff, the record fails affirmatively to so state.

[16] In any event, as we have found, Fedco and KTY are a single employer.

[17] At one point in his testimony Loren King stated that he did not recall laid-off employees because the new hires were paid less, and he felt the laid-off employees would not want the lower paying jobs. The record, however, clearly indicates the laid-off employees wanted the jobs and had even filed a grievance over the matter.

assertedly for economic reasons, then hires new employees to replace them, it is patent evidence that its assertion is pretextual.[18] Accordingly, we find the Respondent has not overcome the General Counsel's prima facie case and that laying off employees Hofer, Thornton, Muncy, and Evans violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

We also find that the layoff of mechanic Jones was unlawful. Jones was laid off at a time when the Respondent's volume of business would suggest a continuing if not increasing demand for his services. Jones testified without contradiction that the mechanics were unable to keep up with demand for repair services during the entire month preceding the layoff, and that one mechanic worked overtime.

AMENDED CONCLUSION OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 4.

"4. By discharging Robert Rogers because of his union and protected concerted activities, and by laying off Rick Hofer, Charles Thornton, Rufus Muncy, Wes Evans, and Mike Jones because of their union activities and protected concerted activities, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Fedco Freightlines, Inc. and KTY Leasing Co., Inc., Cincinnati, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Insert the following as paragraph 1(b) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(b) Threatening to transfer employees for filing grievances."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(d).

"(d) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with closure of our facility because of your union support or activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten to transfer you for filing grievances.

WE WILL NOT coercively question you about union support or activities.

WE WILL NOT lay you off or otherwise discriminate against any of you for supporting the Congress of Independent Unions or any other union.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Robert Rogers, Rick Hofer, Charles Thornton, Rufus Muncy, Wes Evans, and Mike Jones immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their layoffs, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

FEDCO FREIGHTLINES, INC. AND KTY LEASING CO., INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES T. YOUNGBLOOD, Administrative Law Judge. The amended complaint which was issued on April 7, 1983, alleges that Fedco Freightlines, Inc. (Fedco) and KTY Leasing Co., Inc. (KTY and collectively Respondents) are joint employers within the meaning of the Act and that Trans-State Express, Inc. (Trans-State) is a successor employer to the garage operations of Respondents Fedco and KTY. The complaint also alleges that Respondents discharged Robert Rogers and laid off certain other employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, and engaged in other threats and interrogations of its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Respondents deny the commission of any unfair labor practices. In addition, Trans-State raises the question of the Board's jurisdiction over it in this matter because of insufficient service of process.

A hearing was held on April 18 through 21 and August 30, 1983. All parties were represented at the hearing, and Respondent KTY, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party filed briefs which have been duly considered.

On the entire record in this matter, and from my observations of the witnesses and their demeanor and after due consideration of the briefs filed herein, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS[1]

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE COMPANIES INVOLVED

Fedco at all times material herein until it ceased doing business in December 1982 was a contract freight carrier operating under an ICC permit. It maintained an office and place of business at 4870 Este Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio, where it was engaged in the operation of an interstate trucking service, and it maintained terminals in Ohio and Illinois.

Also at all times material herein KTY, an Illinois corporation, maintained an office and place of business at Effingham, Illinois, and 4870 Este Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio, where it was engaged in the business of leasing trucks and furnishing truckdrivers to Respondent Fedco and of leasing trucks to other customers. Respondents admit, and I find, that they are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Around December 1, 1982, Trans-State began operating as an Illinois corporation with an office and place of business in Cincinnati, Ohio, and since that time has been engaged in the interstate transportation of freight and general commodities.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

The Respondents admit, and I find, that Congress of Independent Unions (CIU) is now, and has been at all times material herein, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. Respondents admit, and I find, that at all times material herein International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Teamsters) has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

During the period 1979 until it ceased business in December 1982, Fedco was a contract freight carrier with its principal terminal located in Cincinnati, Ohio, where it was engaged in hauling freight for Proctor & Gamble in Indiana and Illinois. Proctor & Gamble was its only customer. Fedco maintained terminals in Chicago, St. Louis, and at one time in Tennessee. Its home office was in Effingham, Illinois. KTY, a leasing company, provided all of Fedco's trucks, most of its trailers, and its garage and office equipment. KTY's only location was a garage in Effingham, Illinois, where it also maintained an office. Approximately 75 percent of KTY's total business consisted of leasing trucks to Fedco. Fedco in turn employed truckdrivers to drive the leased equipment from KTY and additionally employed a few owner-operators. Loren King was the owner and president of Fedco and also owned KTY. Maynard King, the son of Loren King, was the general manager of Fedco. These two in turn were the supervisors of KTY. Thus, it is clear that Loren King and Maynard King, the president and general manager of Fedco, controlled not only Fedco but KTY as well. Prior to October 1981, KTY employed no drivers. In the spring of 1980, Fedco recognized the CIU as the representative of its drivers and mechanics and signed a contract which included a union-security clause. In the summer of 1980, Bob Rogers was elected union steward for the CIU.

During the fall of 1980, Fedco began a "Driver of the Year" program as a part of Fedco's safety program to reduce insurance cost. The prize for the top driver was a trip to Hawaii. Maynard King and Safety Director Jim Lankster prepared the forms for rating the drivers, which were to be gathered quarterly. The information compiled was used to determine each driver's numerical standing. In this connection Maynard King spoke to the safety director, the garage employees, the supervisors, the dispatchers, the operations manager, and the terminal managers at Fedco's other locations to determine the drivers' ratings. At the spring 1981 safety meeting, which was held at a Cincinnati restaurant, the rankings and point totals of the Fedco drivers were announced. During that meeting, Maynard King told the assembled drivers that if they tried to bring in the Teamsters Union Fedco could not afford it and they would close the doors.[2] In the early summer of 1981 certain drivers heard that Loren King planned to sell some of the KTY trucks to existing drivers. Some of the drivers met to discuss what terms they would seek if any of them did purchase a truck and to ensure whatever protection from arbitrary treatment they could obtain by acting in concert as opposed to negotiating separately with King. At the same time the drivers contacted Union Representative Richard Davis concerning the possible sale of trucks. In late August or early September 1981, Bob Rogers, the union steward, put a notice on the wall of the drivers' room announcing a meeting for all "Road Boss" drivers. The term "Road Boss" is a make of truck and KTY owned several of these trucks which it had leased to Fedco. It was these trucks that King had indicated an interest in selling. On August 28, 1981, Bob Rogers met with Richard Davis, the union representative, and Loren King to discuss the rumored sale of the trucks and the

[1] The facts found herein are a compilation of the credited testimony, the exhibits, and the stipulations of fact viewed in light of logical consistency and inherent probability. Although these findings may not contain or refer to all of the evidence, all has been weighed and considered. To the extent that any testimony or other evidence not mentioned in this decision may appear to contradict my findings of fact, I have not disregarded that evidence but have rejected it as incredible, lacking in probative weight, surplusage, or irrelevant. Credibility resolutions have been made on the basis of the whole record, including the inherent probabilities of the testimony and the demeanor of the witnesses. Where it may be required, I will set forth specific credibility findings.

[2] Although it is not alleged as a violation, it appears that the General Counsel feels that the CIU recognition was not totally aboveboard in that to a certain extent it was employer sponsored. The record also reflects that many of the employees were unaware of the CIU's existence until they were notified to pay their union dues or be discharged. The record also reflects that there was some dissatisfaction with the CIU as the representative of the employees.

Bob Rogers had been an active union steward since his election in the summer of 1981 and was the primary conduit between CIU and management and earned a reputation as a forceful, effective representative. It was obvious that management resented his actions. In this regard Rogers engaged in both concerted and union activities as a spokesman for the employees shortly before his discharge when he set up the Road Boss drivers' meeting. Additionally, he advised mechanic Mike Jones about the contract provisions regarding the payment of overtime when Jones worked a double shift. According to the credited testimony of Rogers, he presented employee problems to members of management and discussed these problems with management on the average of two to three times a week. He talked to Maynard King about payment for glass loads delivered to Marian and Winchester, Indiana, when the drivers received only $10 for such loads and the contract called for $40. Rogers also complained to the dispatchers and to Maynard King about desirable loads not being assigned to the more senior drivers. At least on one occasion he threatened to take the Company to court if they deducted the amount of shortages from the drivers' paychecks.

In the summer of 1981, Rogers represented employee Rufus Muncy, who was to be discharged for supposedly refusing to carry a load. After Rogers' intervention, Muncy was returned to work and Rogers even attempted to get Muncy pay for the time he had lost during his disciplinary meeting.

Also during the summer of 1981, Jim Heritage, a dispatcher-supervisor, warned Rogers that he was stirring up trouble and bringing pressure on the Company.[3]

[3] The General Counsel alleges and Respondents deny that James Heritage, a dispatcher, was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Heritage was employed as a dispatcher and worked primarily on the second shift from 4 p.m. to midnight. Heritage was the only member of management present on most days after 5 p.m. He was responsible for resolving any and all problems that arose during his shift, which might include mechanical problems with company vehicles, labor relations matters, and customer demands. Heritage testified that he had discharged an employee for refusing to take a load. In this case a driver refused to take a truckload to Chicago for unknown reasons and Heritage ordered that driver to return to the terminal as a passenger in another company vehicle. The driver was then fired. Heritage made other arrangements to have that load delivered to the customers. Heritage credibly testified that he recommended the hire of an employee and had the authority to pledge a substantial sum of Respondents' credit by hiring drivers from Transportation Unlimited. In this connection, Heritage would determine his need for drivers and then contact Transportation Unlimited and advise them to provide the needed number of drivers. Any driver who experienced difficulty while on the road from 4 p.m. to midnight would contact Heritage. It was Heritage's responsibility to take any action necessary to resolve these problems.

Respondents complain that Heritage is not a statutory supervisor because he had to check with members of management before taking any action regarding problems or hiring. The facts in this case do not bear out Respondents' contention. It is clear that Heritage was the only person with any authority after 5 p.m. in the evening. It is unlikely that Respondents would leave the operation totally unattended without any member of management or any supervisory authority during the period from 5 p.m. until 7 a.m. the following morning. The factors enumerated above clearly indicate to me that Heritage was a supervisor as defined in the Act, and I so find.

On September 24, 1981,[4] Rogers returned to the Cincinnati terminal from a run about 3 or 3:30 p.m. He was driving truck No. 93, a sleeper, at the time, which he parked in the lot before going home. Although he was not scheduled to work on September 25 he went to the terminal around noon to submit his paperwork and log and to pick up his paycheck.

The record reflects that early in the morning on September 25 Maynard King had found a small foil-wrapped package in truck No. 93 under the mattress. When Rogers arrived at the terminal he was told by dispatcher Galen Kirby that Maynard King wanted to see him. Rogers went to King's office, and King asked for his registration and told him that he had found something in Rogers' truck. Rogers indicated that he was not surprised because people leave things in his truck all the time. Maynard King advised Rogers that he had found marijuana and that if Rogers did not resign he would have him arrested. Rogers refused to resign and King called the police. When the police officer arrived, King told the officer that the marijuana was found in Rogers' truck and that Rogers had admitted ownership. Rogers denied this. The police officer cited Rogers for possession of marijuana. As indicated, Rogers was discharged on September 24 when he refused to resign. A trial date was eventually set for October 28, but the case was dismissed for lack of prosecution. After the charges of possession of marijuana were dismissed, Rogers returned to Fedco and requested his job back.

According to the credited testimony of Jim Heritage,[5] on the evening of September 25 when he arrived at work, he was called into Maynard King's office and informed of the events leading up to the discharge of Rogers. He testified that it was mentioned that Rogers had admitted that the marijuana belonged to him. Heritage testified that later that evening or the following evening a driver named Wesley Evans, after learning that Rogers had been discharged, admitted that he put the marijuana in the truck. Heritage said the next day he brought this to the attention of Maynard King and when he mentioned it to King almost simultaneously King stated that he knew Wesley Evans had put the marijuana into the tractor. As noted above, Rogers' trial date was eventually set for October 28, but the case was dismissed for lack of prosecution. After the charges of possession of marijuana were dismissed, Rogers returned to Fedco and requested his job back. His request was refused. It is apparent that, when Rogers returned in October to ask for his job back, Fedco was aware of the fact that the marijuana did not belong to Rogers, that it had been put in Rogers' truck by Wesley Evans, and that it was put in there for another individual who Evans thought would be driving that truck. In other words, Respondents knew completely that Bob Rogers was totally innocent of the charge of possessing marijuana, using marijuana, or in any way carrying marijuana on Respondents' vehicles. Nevertheless, Respondents refused to reinstate Rogers to his job. This record makes it very clear that Fedco made no further attempt to investigate the marijuana problems at its premises or to discipline any of the other employees involved in the incident.

[5] I have carefully reviewed the testimony of both Maynard and Loren King and have concluded that their testimony is not worthy of belief. In this connection it is my conclusion that both of the Kings had a very selective memory. Their testimony was not straightforward and did not have a ring of truth. Therefore to the extent that their testimony is contrary to that of other of the General Counsel's witnesses their testimony has not been credited.

Rogers filed a grievance over his discharge and eventually an arbitration award was granted in his favor; however, Fedco has refused to abide by the terms of this award.

On October 16, 16 Fedco employees were laid off. These included drivers based in Effingham as well as Cincinnati. Among the drivers laid off were Rick Hofer, Charles Thornton, Rufus Muncy, Wesley Evans, and mechanic Mike Jones, along with dispatchers Jim Heritage, Galen Kirby, and Kim Bannings. These employees were laid off allegedly for lack of work. This record reflects that at the time the layoffs occurred Fedco was very busy. It had been using temporary drivers[6] frequently in the weeks immediately preceding the layoffs and, in fact, had recently hired five drivers in Herrin, Illinois, less than 1 month before the layoffs. This record also reflects that following the layoffs Fedco continued to use temporary drivers. Also the record reflects that shortly after the layoffs Fedco's business increased so much that it needed to hire more drivers. However, it did not recall any of its experienced laid-off drivers, but hired new drivers.

In this regard, the new drivers ostensibly were not hired by the entity Fedco. Loren King hired the new road drivers and made them employees of KTY and assigned them to drive for Fedco. These employees were paid on a mileage basis rather than by load. Also, new city drivers were hired rather than recalling the old employees.

After the discharge of Rogers several of the drivers, including Charles Thornton,[7] discussed going out on strike to protest his discharge because in their view Rogers had been set up and discharged because of his activities as a union steward. When the drivers learned that employee Wes Evans had placed the marijuana in Rogers' truck and that this fact had been communicated to management, they reconsidered the strike and no strike occurred.

A review of the financial information submitted during the course of this proceeding indicates that Fedco's load level was increasing and not decreasing prior to the layoff of October 16. Also its gross revenues were showing a steady increase during the several months prior to the layoff. It is apparent from this overall record that Respondent Fedco had some financial problems which ultimately resulted in its bankruptcy during the instant hearing. However, the economic information available suggests that business was getting stronger, not weaker, during the months preceding the layoff in October. On the evidence as presented I cannot conclude that Fedco's layoff of October was economically justified. Additionally, James Heritage testified that he overheard Operations Manager Gary Krutsinger refuse loads from Proctor & Gamble on several occasions prior to the layoff. This would also suggest that there was no merit to the claim that business was declining. Although Respondent may have wanted to get out of the trucking business, it does not appear that the motive for that was lack of business. Moreover, it would appear that much of the loss or debts attributed to Fedco were debts which it owed to KTY, the other Respondent, which is wholly owned by Loren King, the owner of Fedco. This debt was merely a paper transaction.

Respondents also contend that the employees were allegedly selected for layoff on the basis of their numerical standing in the driver-of-the-year contest. However, this record does not support this contention for many of the employees retained were either not rated during this time or did not even work for Respondents during this entire period of time.

As indicated, the General Counsel contends that the layoff of the five named employees was because of their concerted activities and activities on behalf of the Union and not as alleged by Respondents.

Charles Thornton had the second highest rating of those employees rated in the driver-of-the-year contest and also had been elected union steward on August 28. His election as union steward was at the union meeting which the drivers had demanded because of their dissatisfaction with the Company and the Union. Thornton protested many practices of Respondents, including the dispatching of casual drivers when regular road drivers were available. He consistently complained to the dispatchers about Fedco's failure to pay for certain runs to Winchester and Marion, Indiana, the so-called glass loads, in accordance with the rates specified in the contract. He complained to dispatcher Jim Heritage about Fedco's failure to pay for a motel room for a driver who was sleeping on the floor of his cab. He assisted employee Mike Jones in contacting the Union about an overtime problem, and spoke to Gary Krutsinger about the basis for computing vacation pay. He had numerous conversations with other drivers in which he encouraged them to get behind the Union as a group to get their problems rectified. Around October 1, Heritage advised Thornton that since he was made union steward he was drawing the attention of the front office about the many complaints he was making.

Rufus Muncy at one time had been close to Maynard King. At one point he wanted to get out of driving and because of his friendship with King he was allowed to take a job as a mechanic. When he was tired of being a mechanic he was allowed to go back on the road. However, when he went back to driving in August he showed a propensity for enforcing his contractual rights and for engaging in certain other activities. In this regard he attended the Road Boss meeting set up by Rogers. He also discussed with other drivers their problems in getting paid according to the CIU contract and also the possibility of voting out the CIU and getting the Teamsters in. He talked to Maynard King about these problems and advised King that all the drivers were having problems with dispatching and with the pay for the Winchester loads under the contract. He also told Maynard King the drivers could vote out the CIU and vote the Teamsters in. Maynard King replied that Fedco would lock the gates before it would let the Teamsters in. To demonstrate that Respondents were aware of the Road Boss meeting, Maynard King asked Muncy what had happened at that meeting.

In September Muncy asked Bob Rogers to accompany him as union steward to a meeting with management as Muncy was fearful he might be discharged for refusing to take a load. After the meeting Maynard King immediately told Muncy that he did not need Rogers. After it had been agreed that Muncy's failure to take the load resulted from a misunderstanding, Rogers asked Fedco if they would pay Muncy for losing a day's pay. When King refused, Rogers threatened to file a girevance. Following this meeting Muncy was told that he had a bad attitude and immediately assigned to drug loads. Because of the idle time involved the drug loads were considered to be the least favorable driving job. On one occasion because he liked to keep his equipment in safe operating condition, Muncy went to the head mechanic, Maynard King, Gary Krutsinger, and finally Loren King before a bad tire on his truck was fixed. Thus, it is apparent that Respondents knew that Muncy was around, and that he would exercise his rights and use the union contract and insist upon it being enforced.

About a month prior to the layoff, Muncy, Rogers, and several other drivers were arguing with dispatcher Gary Krutsinger about pay for the Winchester loads. Muncy told Krustinger that, if the Company and the Union could not get them pay for these loads, they would get the Teamsters in. Thus, it is also apparent that Respondents were aware that the employees were not only dissatisfied with Respondents' treatment, but also they were dissatisfied with the Union and at least on two occasions had mentioned the fact that they might attempt to bring in another union, namely, the Teamsters.

Rick Hofer, who was laid off on October 16, was also vocal in pointing out situations to management involving himself and other drivers which he felt should be remedied by management. Thus, about 1 month before the layoff he protested to Gary Krutsinger about the way driver Roger Baker was being dispatched out of Chicago. Additionally, he attended a meeting of drivers who planned to organize their efforts in case they were approached to buy trucks. He also attended the union meeting on August 29 and the Road Boss meeting called by Rogers. He had made many oral grievances to management shortly before the layoff and had complained to Gary Krutsinger and Maynard King about being lied to by dispatcher Galen Kirby concerning a rush load in Chicago which had cost him a speeding ticket. He made several complaints about the safety of his truck and finally threatened to redline it (take it out of operation) until it was repaired. On one occasion he directed a new driver to call the dispatcher for money for a layover and to use Hofer's name. He also talked to Gary Krutsinger about the Company's failure to pay for loading tractors. At one point he told Jim Heritage that he would like to have the Teamsters in so they could get some representation. He also complained about and refused to perform city work for the Chicago terminal where Fedco was working the men in violation of the union contract. Hofer had no complaints about his work, no accidents, and in the summer of 1981 Gary Krutsinger had told him to keep up the good work.

Employee Wesley Evans, who as indicated was involved in the marijuana incident with Bob Rogers, was also laid off on October 16, allegedly for lack of work. Evans like the other four employees had made several complaints with Rogers and Muncy concerning the lack of pay for glass loads in Marion and Winchester, Indiana. He also made complaints about the time drivers were forced to wait for glass loads without any compensation. He complained to management about running to Chicago without a sleeper truck because you could not turn around without an 8-hour break under DOT regulations. He did not take an 8-hour break because Fedco would not pay for a motel room. He had been told by Jim Heritage and Gary Krutsinger that he could not get a motel room unless he had to layover to wait for a load. He also complained to Maynard King about the condition of his truck and met with other drivers and discussed bringing the Teamsters into the shop.

Mike Jones, the other employee laid off on October 16, was a mechanic and normally assigned to work on the second shift. However, in August and September, he was consistently assigned to work a double shift on Friday nights. He felt he should be paid time and a half for working over 8 hours and with this in mind he talked with Garage Superintendent Dan Muller and Union Stewards Bob Rogers and Charles Thornton. After Jones had talked to Muller he was called into a meeting with Loren and Maynard King, who asked what were his problems. When he explained why he wanted overtime pay Loren King made a statement that he would move him permanently from second to third shift. Loren King asked Jones why he had gone to the Union in the first place instead of coming to management and also asked Jones which of the truckdrivers he had talked to.

On December 18, 1982, Fedco ceased its operations and went out of business. At that time Bill Edmund, who had been hired as Fedco's general manager on June 1, 1982, announced the closing at a meeting of Fedco's employees.[8] At the close of the meeting he informed the employees present that he was starting his own trucking company, Trans-State a general commodities carrier, and that he would be employing only owner-operators and would be soliciting new customers.

It appears that in September 1982 Edmund had purchased operating rights from Glaze Trucking Company of Columbus, Ohio. Additionally, he purchased the garage and office equipment which had been used by Fedco from KTY. He operated out of the same facility which had been used by Fedco, leasing it from Proctor & Gamble on a month-to-month basis, and also negotiated leases for terminals in Chicago and St. Louis which were located in facilities previously used by Fedco. Edmund also has terminals or agencies in Columbus, Ohio; Toledo, Ohio; Harold, Illinois; West Memphis, Arkansas; and Clear Water-Tampa, Florida.

Most of the former Fedco and KTY drivers purchased trucks and went to work for Edmund. Six of Fedco's eight office employees went to work for Edmund including Pat Perin, Jack Hunt, Jim Lanster, Harriet Ferrell, Evelyn Molt, and Tim Rogers. Some of these individuals had different positions under Trans-State. Trans-State employed city drivers, including former Fedco employee Sam Curry, Terry Hamblin, and Rod Allen. Trans-State also uses two garage employees, Tom Dippold and Rod Koch, who were both Fedco garage employees. Their pay and benefits remain basically the same under Trans-State. The mechanics are peforming basically the same work that they performed under Fedco and under the same supervision. The only apparent difference in their work is that the owners of the individual trucks now determine what work is to be performed, rather than Fedco management.

The General Counsel contends that Trans-State is a successor to, at least, the garage operations of Respondents Fedco and KTY and that, as it acquired successor status with knowledge of the pending unfair labor practice proceedings, it is jointly and severally liable for backpay with Fedco and KTY.

Discussion and Conclusions

Bob Rogers was discharged by Respondent Fedco on September 24, allegedly because marijuana was found in his truck. The General Counsel contends that the reason assigned for the discharge of Bob Rogers was merely a pretext and that he was actually discharged for his concerted and union activities.

This record reflects that Bob Rogers was an extremely active and vocal union steward. Other employees were aware of this fact, and knew that he was willing to take their problems to management on their behalf. The records clearly reflect that Rogers went to management with the complaints of the other drivers. The records also clearly reflect that Rogers was becoming a thorn in the side of management because Jim Heritage warned Rogers that he was causing too much trouble for Respondent Fedco. Heritage stated that Gary Krutsinger said that Rogers' complaints would ultimately hang him. Thus, it is apparent that the management of Fedco was unhappy with the numerous complaints and grievances of its employees. It was also unhappy with its union stewards because they brought the complaints to management's attention.

It is my conclusion that Fedco was looking for an excuse to rid itself of its chief troublemaker Bob Rogers when Maynard King went searching the trucks to see what he could find, and low and behold he found marijuana in the truck of union antagonizer Bob Rogers. Respondent Fedco wasted no time in calling Rogers to account, and even gave him an opportunity to resign before it discharged him without even making an investigation. Rogers denied that the marijuana was his and informed management that many people left things in the truck for him, particularly things dealing with union business. And even after Fedco learned that Rogers knew nothing about the marijuana, and that it was put in his truck by Wesley Evans, Fedco refused to rehire Rogers. This, in my view, clearly closes the door on any argument by Fedco that it was merely attempting to rid itself of people who would violate the law by using marijuana. Moreover, Respondent Fedco made no investigation of the marijuana incident, it took no action toward either Wes Evans or Tim Rogers for whom the marijuana was destined, and as mater of fact seem totally unconcerned with the marijuana problem once Rogers was gone. Under all the circumstances, it is my conclusion that Fedco's reasons for the discharge of Bob Rogers were clearly pretextual, and that it discharged Bob Rogers because of his concerted and union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[9]

As indicated, the complaint also alleges that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by their layoff of five employees allegedly for economic reasons. The record reflects that in the spring of 1980 the Union claimed to represent a majority of the Fedco employees and that Loren King recognized the Union as the representative of the drivers and mechanics and signed a collective-bargaining agreement which included a union-security provision. Shortly after the Union was recognized, Maynard King, the general manager of Fedco, contacted employee Rufus Muncy and asked him to be the union steward, for which he would receive $100 a month. Muncy refused because he did not want the problems associated with the union steward job and thereafter another driver, Don Rowlette, was named union steward.

By the spring of 1981 Maynard King apparently learned that some of the employees were dissatisfied with the incumbent union, and told the employees at the spring safety meeting in Cincinnati, Ohio, that if they tried to bring in the Teamsters Union Fedco could not afford it and would close its doors.

Later, in the summer, some of the drivers learned that Loren King planned to sell certain of the KTY trucks. KTY owned several trucks called Road Boss which it leased to Fedco. It was these trucks which King had indicated an interest in selling. When the drivers learned of the probable sale of these trucks, they met to discuss what terms they would seek if any of them purchased a truck and to ensure whatever protection from arbitrary treatment they could obtain by acting in concert as op-

[9] The complaint alleges several independent violations of Sec. 8(a)(1) involving interrogation and threats to employees. Several instances of 8(a)(1) conduct were credibly testified to by the General Counsel's witnesses and none were specifically denied by Respondents' witnesses. Additionally, if there were specific denials by Maynard or Loren King, those denials would not be credited. In any event, these facts were fully litigated and I find that Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by the following: (1) Maynard King's statement at the spring safety meeting that if the Teamsters come in Fedco would close its doors; (2) Maynard King's statement to Rufus Muncy in September that if the Teamsters come in his father would close the doors; (3) Maynard King's interrogation of Rufus Muncy in September concerning a drivers' meeting held for the purpose of discussing union and protected activities; (4) Loren King's interrogation of Mike Jones concerning his conversations with other employees concerning contractual matters and the filing of grievances; and (5) Loren King's threat to transfer Jones to the third shift if he filed a grievance for overtime.

posed to negotiating separately with King. The drivers contacted Union Representative Richard Davis concerning the sale of these trucks. In August Bob Rogers, the union steward, put a notice on the wall of the drivers' room announcing a meeting for all Road Boss drivers. On August 28, Bob Rogers met with Richard Davis and Loren King to discuss the rumored sale of the Road Boss trucks and the forced resignation of driver Terry Hamblin. On August 29, Richard Davis met with all of the drivers to discuss their complaints. These several incidents were a beginning of the employee discontent and the employees taking their complaints to management. This was not to the liking of the Kings because they intended to operate Fedco and KTY as they pleased, with no interference from their employees or outsiders. Like Rogers, each of the employees named above, Hofer, Thornton, Evans, Muncy, and Jones, had in some way upset the Kings. Thus, Jones had gone to the Union about overtime pay. Muncy brought a union steward to what he believed was a discriminatory interview, which action was strongly opposed by Maynard King. Additionally, Muncy was the employee who told Maynard King about the drivers' intentions to seek representation by the Teamsters. Thornton was the union steward, and with Hofer showed signs of attempting to enforce the contract, DOT regulations, and safety precautions. Each of these five employees in some way, as described above, brought management attention to themselves.

Respondents decided early that the way to rid itself of these problems was to get rid of the employees. In this regard it decided that a layoff would be the most feasible way to get rid of those employees that were complaining, and all the other employees, as it intended to put Fedco totally out of the trucking business. Thus, in the guise of a layoff Fedco terminated most of its employees, but included in those 16 employees were the 5 employees that were giving it the most problems.

Fedco assigned economics as the reason for the layoff. However, as I have indicated, the financial information submitted does not support the proposition that Fedco's load level was decreasing at the time of the layoff. In fact, the evidence shows that prior to the layoff of October 16 the load level was increasing. Moreover, it appears that Fedco had been turning down loads that were offered it by Procter & Gamble. Thus, in my view, Respondent Fedco's financial problems were more of a smokescreen than anything else and were set up to justify the layoffs.

This appears to be borne out by the facts of the layoffs and the fact that, when Fedco needed additional drivers, it did not recall the laid-off employees, but in fact hired new drivers from Transportation Unlimited. In any event, all of Respondent's actions were designed to put Fedco completely out of the trucking business. It is my conclusion that Fedco did this with an eye to rid itself of the Union and all of the union adherents, including the five alleged discriminatees. It is my conclusion that Respondents' assigned reason, that these employees were laid off for economic reasons, is purely and simply a pretext. Respondents set upon a course of action to rid Fedco of the Union and to put Fedco totally out of business. It engaged in the foregoing conduct to discourage membership in the Union and to discriminate against its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the act, and I so find.

The General Counsel alleges that Fedco and KTY are joint employers within the meaning of the Act, and that any order issued herein should run jointly and severally against both.

Certain critical criteria considered by the Board in determining whether two employers are a joint employer or common employer include common ownership or financial control, integration of operations, common management, and centralized control over labor relations. Here there is no question but that there is common ownership and financial control. There certainly is an integration of operations in that KTY supplied the trucks and Fedco supplied the employees for one common purpose—to operate a trucking company. There is no question but there was common management and that the Kings exercised control over both corporations. There is no question but whatever labor relations existed at KTY were controlled by the Kings as well as the labor relations of Fedco. It is my conclusion that the testimony in this case makes it clear that Fedco and KTY meet all the criteria established by the Board for finding a joint employer relationship. While there may have been in fact a corporate separation, this appears to be only an illusion. One company was totally dependent on the other and I conclude that they were a single integrated enterprise and a joint employer of the employees involved herein. Therefore, it is my conclusion that KTY is jointly and severally liable with Fedco for remedying any unfair labor practices found herein, including reinstatement and backpay which shall be ordered.

The General Counsel also contends that Trans-State is a successor to the garage mechanic operations of Respondents Fedco and KTY. The General Counsel's argument seems to be that, as Trans-State purchased from KTY the garage equipment which had been used in the Fedco garage and retained two of the three mechanics and continued to use the same facility, it somehow became a successor to Fedco and KTY. Consequently, having taken over this operation knowing about the pending unfair labor practices, Trans-State somehow must share the liability for the unfair labor practices of Fedco and KTY. Thus, the General Counsel argues that Trans-State, insofar as the garage is concerned, meets the test set out in Golden State Bottling Co., 187 NLRB 1017 (1971), enfd. 467 F.2d 164 (9th Cir. 1972), affd. 414 U.S. 168 (1973), for the finding of a successor. I do not agree. The facts herein indicate only that Trans-State retained two employees out of a much larger number of employees, all of whom constituted an appropriate unit. This alone is sufficient to conclude that Trans-State did not employ a majority of the former employees, and could not be a successor. I conclude that the General Counsel's evidence is totally insufficient to establish that Trans-State is a successor. Therefore, I shall recommend that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety insofar as it relates to Trans-State.

IV. THE EFFECTS OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondents set forth above, occurring in connection with Respondents' operations, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead to labor dispute, burdening and obstructing commerce and free flow of commerce.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. As I have found that Respondents discriminatorily discharged Robert Rogers on September 16, 1981, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, and unlawfully terminated Rick Hofer, Charles Thornton, Rufus Muncy, Wesley Evans, and Mike Jones in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondents be ordered to offer immediate and full reinstatement to these employees, unless reinstatement has already been offered, to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the Respondents' discrimination against them, until such time as Respondents make them a valid offer of reinstatement, with interest. See F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[10]

On these findings of fact and and the entire record, I issue the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Fedco Freightlines, Inc. and KTY Leasing Co., Inc., Respondents, are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Fedco Freightlines, Inc. and KTY Leasing Co., Inc., Respondents herein, are a single integrated business enterprise and constitute a single integrated employer within the meaning of the Act.

3. By threatening employees that if the Teamsters Union got in Fedco would close its doors; by interrogating its employees concerning their meetings and other concerted and protected activities, including the filing of grievances; and by threatening to transfer employees because of their filing grievances, Respondents have engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By discharging Robert Rogers because of his union and/or concerted activities and by terminating Rick Hofer, Charles Thornton, Rufus Muncy, Wesley Evans, and Mike Jones because of their union and/or concerted activities or because of their support of or assistance to the Union, Respondents have discouraged membership in the Union in violation of Section 8(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. Trans-State Express, Inc. has not violated the Act as alleged in the complaint.

6. The above-described unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

ORDER

The Respondents, Fedco Freightlines, Inc. and KTY Leasing Co., Inc., Cincinnati, Ohio, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees with closing of Respondents' facilities if they continue their support of the Union or continue to engage in union activities or other concerted activities.

(b) Interrogating employees concerning their union activities or their support for the Union.

(c) Laying off, discharging, or otherwise discriminating against its employees because of their activities on behalf of the Union or any other labor organization to discourage membership in the Union or any labor organization of its employees.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to Robert Rogers, Rick Hofer, Charles Thornton, Rufus Muncy, Wesley Evans, and Mike Jones, unless reinstatement has already been offered, to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, with interest.

(b) Post at their facilities in and around Effingham, Illinois, and Cincinnati, Ohio, and any other location where they do business, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by Respondents' authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[10] I recognize that Fedco is no longer in business and that KTY is not a trucking operation. This, however, is a compliance problem.

[11] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[12] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondents has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not found herein.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 10 March 1983 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in response to the Respondent's exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

As set forth in detail in the judge's decision, on 27 August 1981 the Union was certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees and the parties commenced bargaining. The Union contends that on 26 August 1982[3] it accepted the Respondent's contract proposal. Several days later and prior to the execution of the contract, the Respondent refused to sign the agreement and subsequently withdrew recognition of the Union. The Respondent maintained it was privileged to refuse to sign the agreement and to withdraw recognition as, relying on a petition signed by a majority of employees, it had a good-faith belief based on objective considerations that the Union no longer represented a majority of the Respondent's employees.

In evaluating the Respondent's contentions, the judge concluded that the Respondent failed adequately to demonstrate a reasonably based good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status. The judge based this conclusion on the fact that only one page of a two-page petition proclaiming the signatories no longer wanted the Union to represent them was admitted in evidence. This one page contained signatures of only 18 of the 60 unit employees. In its exceptions and brief, the Respondent does not contend the judge erred in refusing to admit page two of this petition, but rather argues the Respondent's reasonably based good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status existed as evidenced by both pages of this petition.

After closely examining the record, we agree with the judge. During the hearing, the Respondent moved that page two of the petition be admitted into evidence. The judge refused on the ground that it had not been properly authenticated. The Respondent never again requested that this document be admitted into evidence. Therefore, the only evidence before us of the Respondent's good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status is the one-page document containing signatures of 18 employees. We thus conclude, in agreement with the judge, that this is insufficient evidence of a reasonably based good-faith doubt that the Union retained majority status.[4] Accordingly, as the Respondent was not privileged to refuse to bargain or to withdraw recognition from the Union, those actions constituted violations of Section 8(a)(5).

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The remedy section of the judge's decision is amended only to the extent that backpay, if any, shall be computed in accordance with Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[4] In light of this finding, we find it unnecessary to pass on the issue of whether, as found by the judge, the Union's telegram of 26 August and the Respondent's letter of 1 September, respectively, constituted a request and refusal to sign the collective-bargaining agreement. An unequivocal request to sign the contract was contained in the Union's letter of 10 September. Therefore, as the Respondent has failed to show sufficient evidence that it had a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status on 14 September when it refused to comply with the Union's 10 September unequivocal request to sign the contract, we find that it violated Sec. 8(a)(5).

Additionally, in light of the finding that the Respondent did not have a reasonably based good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status when it refused to execute the contract, Chairman Dotson and Members Hunter and Dennis find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's finding that once final agreement on the substantive terms of the contract was reached, regardless of the status of any written agreement, the Respondent was not free to refuse to bargain even if it then had lawful grounds for believing that the Union had subsequently lost its majority status.

Member Zimmerman would adopt the judge's findings that the Union's telegram constituted a request and the Respondent's reply letter constituted a refusal to sign the collective-bargaining agreement, and that such refusal was unlawful. He, like the judge, finds that even if the Respondent had been able to establish that as early as 1 September it had a reasonable doubt of the Union's continued majority status, so as to legitimize its withdrawal of recognition from the Union, the Respondent would still have been obligated to execute its 26 August 1982 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and its failure to do so would still have been, as it was here, a violation of Sec. 8(a)(5). The Respondent's obligation to execute the collective-bargaining agreement arose, and is retroactive to, 26 August, when the Union notified the Respondent of the former's acceptance of the latter's 8 June offer. Subsequent manifestations of possible loss of majority support for the Union would not serve to relieve the Respondent of its obligation to execute and give retroactive effect to the agreement it had reached with the Union on 26 August. North Bros. Ford, Inc., 220 NLRB 1021 (1975); Utility Tree Service, 215 NLRB 806 (1974), affd. 218 NLRB 784 (1975). See also Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., 183 NLRB 213, 217 (1970).

Member Dennis also notes that while the Respondent raised the existence of a "decertification petition" supporting its 14 September refusal to execute the contract, the record shows that no question concerning representation existed until 21 September when a petition was actually filed.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Consumat Systems, Inc., Mechanicsville, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) On 14 September 1982, failing or refusing, on request, to execute and give effect to a written agreement incorporating the agreement reached with the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers."

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. On August 27, 1981, the National Labor Relations Board in Case 5–RC–11447 certified Charging Party International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers (Union) as the collective-bargaining representative for a unit of "all production and maintenance employees employed at Consumat Systems, Inc.'s Mechanicsville, Virginia location, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, technicians, over the road truckdrivers and their helpers, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act." Thereafter, about September 4, 1981, Respondent and the Union commenced bargaining and on February 9, 1981,[1] negotiators displeased with the offer, presented it to the union membership, who promptly rejected it.

Little progress was made over the next several months. Rather, Respondent's financial position, none too good to begin with, became worse. Contracts were lost or postponed, some indefinitely. As a consequence, on June 8, Respondent renewed its previous written offer, with three modifications: it withdrew its prior opposition to the checkoff of union dues and initiation fees, it reduced its wage offer of an annual 5-percent increase for 3 years to no increase at all,[2] and it orally agreed to a 1-year contract,[3] rather than the 3-year contract it originally proposed. The union negotiators were no more pleased with this proposal than they were with the one in February; but they did not outrightly reject Respondent's latest proposal either, again stating that they would take up the proposal with the membership. That, however, did not occur until Thursday, August 26, the last day of the Union's first year as the employee's collective-bargaining representative, when Bartley sent the following mailgram to Thomas J. Manely, Respondent's attorney and principal negotiator:

> Please be advised that the employees of Consumat Systems, Inc. voted this day to accept the Company's offer made to the Union on 6/8/82. I will be in contact with you in the very near future for the purpose of signing this agreement.

On Monday, August 30, the next business day,[4] word of the membership ratification spread quickly. Two employees, incensed that the contract (with no wage increase) had been ratified and that they had been given insufficient notice of the action to be taken at the union meeting the prior Thursday, circulated a petition stating the desire of the signatories for a "fair meeting with advance notice of a vote before a labor contract is made with" Respondent. A telephone call on Tuesday evening from one of the employees to Bartley met with a firm reply that the Union had already accepted the agreement and no new vote would be taken.

On Wednesday, September 1, in response to Bartley's refusal to conduct another vote, the same two employees circulated a new petition proclaiming that the signatories no longer wanted the Union to represent them. That was forwarded to the Regional Office of the Board on September 2, and a copy of it, allegedly signed by 35 of 60 employees,[5] was presented to Ron Mancuso, Respondent's director of manufacturing. The employees' petition apparently led to the filing of a formal decertification petition on September 21.

In the meantime, delivery of Bartley's mailgram had been delayed. Manley testified that he received it in his office no earlier than Monday, August 30, although it was sent the prior Thursday and although Bartley received a confirmation copy on Friday. I find it surprising that Manley did not forward it to his client immediately; in any event, Mancuso, who had been told on Monday by a union negotiating committee member that the contract had been ratified, said he did not receive the mailgram until Tuesday, August 31, the same day, he testified, that he was presented with the first petition.[6] The following day Mancuso wrote to Bartley that, before receiving the mailgram, he had "received information that a majority of the men believed the vote referred to was improper and questioning the Union's representation." (Any "questioning [of] the Union's representation" ocurred, however, no earlier than September 1, the day after Mancuso received the mailgram.) He further stated

[2] Union International Representative Phillip Bartley testified that the wage offer was orally withdrawn in March.

[3] Other than this oral agreement, the contract proposal was written.

[4] Respondent was then working a 4-day workweek, Monday through Thursday.

[5] The entire petition was never properly authenticated and admitted in evidence. Thus, the record proof does not adequately demonstrate that a majority of employees did not desire the Union to represent them and Respondent had a good-faith doubt that the Union represented a majority. See Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982). However, in the event that the failure to introduce the entire petition was merely the result of inadvertent and excusable error, and on the assumption the document demonstrates that the Union lost majority support, this decision would be no different.

[6] Mancuso prepared a memorandum which noted that he received the first petition on September 1, not August 31. It is unnecessary to resolve this inconsistency, first, because good-faith doubt obtained after the agreement was made is irrelevant and, second, because the first petition indicated only employee disagreement with the ratification vote and not a clear intention that a majority of the employees no longer wished to be represented by the Union. Gregory's Inc., 242 NLRB 644, 648 (1979).

that because Respondent had received no response to its last offer from the Union for several months, he was in doubt as to the "lawfulness" of concluding or not concluding a contract.

On September 10 Bartley wrote Manley requesting signed copies of the "recently negotiated" contract for his signature. Manley replied on September 14 that Respondent had not received any explanation or clarification as requested in the September 1 letter, that the employees did not wish to be represented by the Union, that the employees did not authorize the Union to conclude an agreement with Respondent, and that the employees had petitioned the Board for a decertification election. "Under the circumstances Consumat does not believe it is lawful or appropriate to conclude a labor contract with your union." Again, by letter dated October 18, Mancuso advised Bartley that because he had received no clarifications from the Union in reply to his earlier September 1 and 14 letters, because Respondent's employees had advised Respondent that they no longer wished to be associated with the Union, and because they had filed a decertification petition, Respondent "does not believe it may any longer lawfully recognize or bargain with your union as the representative of our employees."

Two complaints herein, as consolidated,[7] allege that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq., by refusing since September 14 to execute a written contract embodying the agreement which the Union accepted on August 26 and that on October 18 Respondent withdrew recognition of the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its production and maintenance employees. Respondent denied that it violated the Act in any manner.[8]

In the absence of unusual circumstances, a certified union's majority status must be honored for 1 year, even if an employer has evidence of the union's loss of majority. That rule was established in order to permit collective bargaining to function and to stabilize industrial relations. Even if the decertification petition had been filed prior to August 26, although it would have possibly permitted an election to be held, but only after the expiration of the 1-year period, Respondent would not have been permitted to rely thereon and cease bargaining during the 1-year period. Once having continued to bargain, an employer would be bound by any agreement it struck during the year.

That being stated, the first issue presented is whether a contract was made on August 26. Respondent made its last complete proposal on June 8. The Union did not reply to that offer until August 26, a fact which Respondent admitted in its September 1 letter. I refuse to credit Mancuso's testimony that, in a telephone conversation with Bartley on August 26, Mancuso told Bartley that the offer had been withdrawn by Respondent. Bartley denied such statement, and none of Respondent's letters rely on its withdrawal of the offer, or on the Union's rejection of it, or on the fact that the offer had lapsed by the passage of time.[9]

"The Board is [not] strictly bound by the technical rules of contract law." NLRB v. Donkin's Inn, 532 F.2d 138, 141–142 (9th Cir. 1976); Penasquitos Gardens, 236 NLRB 994, 995 fn. 8 (1978), enfd. 603 F.2d 225 (9th Cir. 1979). Even when a contract proposal has been rejected, the Board has frequently held that the proposal survives, enabling the party which previously rejected it to reverse itself and accept it. The Board affirmed this view in Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co., 251 NLRB 187, 189 (1980), as follows:

> [A] complete package proposal made on behalf of either party through negotiations remains viable, and upon acceptance in toto must be executed as part of the statutory duty to bargain in good faith, unless expressly withdrawn prior to such acceptance, or defeased by an event upon which the offer was expressly made contingent at a time prior to acceptance.

See also Presto Casting Co., 262 NLRB 346 (1982). Pepsi-Cola was enforced at 659 F.2d 87 (8th Cir. 1981), the Court noting at 90 fn. 3, that there appears to be contrary authority, some cited by Respondent, which can be explained solely by the fact that the Board is continuing to develop the law in this area.

Respondent's offer was on the table for 2-1/2 months before the Union accepted it. The Board has held that 4 months before acceptance is not unreasonable delay, barring intervening events that make it unfair to do so. Worrell Newspapers, 232 NLRB 402 (1977); contra, Scientific Research Co., 110 NLRB 393 (1954). Respondent offers no cogent showing of unfairness. That it has suffered losses of business is not attributed to labor costs; and its contract offer of no wage increase is not claimed to be a further impairment of its financial condition.[10] Finally, I

[7] The relevant docket entries are as follows: The Union filed an unfair labor practice charge in Case 5–CA–14719 on September 27, 1982, and a complaint issued on October 26. The Union filed its charge in Case 5–CA–14826 on October 29 and a compliant issued on November 22. The complaints were consolidated by order of the Regional Director for Region 5 on November 23 and a hearing was held before me on January 3 and 4, 1983, in Richmond, Virginia.

[8] There is no question as to jurisdiction herein. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is a Virginia corporation with an office and place of business in Mechanicsville, Virginia, where it engaged in the manufacturing of energy recovery incinerators. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of each complaint, it sold and shipped products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Virginia. I conclude that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union, as admitted by Respondent, is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[9] Mancuso testified that Bartley, prior to conducting the union vote, called Mancuso to tell him that the employees were getting ready to vote and inquired about the effective date of the agreement. Mancuso asked what the Union was voting on. When Bartley replied the June offer, Mancuso testified, he told Bartley that the present condition of Respondent and the delay of 2 months in the Union's response made the offer "no longer available." Bartley testified, however, that an entirely different conversation took place; that he called Mancuso to inquire about whether the effective date of the contract would be June 8, the date of the last offer, or that day, August 26, when the Union accepted the offer, and that Mancuso replied that the contract became effective only when it was accepted. I credit Bartley's version.

[10] The record is barren of what, if any, financial gains were made by the Union.

find that Respondent's June offer was a continuing offer. Indeed, the day after it was made, Bartley telephoned Manley's legal assistant to advise that he was going to reevaluate the Union's position and, if Respondent changed its position, that Respondent should so advise him. Respondent never advised Bartley that it withdrew its offer or amended it in any way.

The Union's acceptance occurred when the Union notified Respondent of that fact; and it was the transmittal or the mailgram, not its receipt by Respondent, that governs the date of acceptance and the contract. Raybestos-Manhattan, 183 NLRB 213, 218 (1970). Bartley's mailgram of August 26 to Respondent notifying that he would soon be in contact for the purpose of signing the agreement gave Respondent sufficient notice of a request for its execution. Mancuso's reply of September 1 setting forth his "doubt" about concluding the agreement demonstrated that Mancuso understood what Bartley was requesting and constitutes a refusal to execute the agreement. It is well settled that the failure to sign, on request, a written memorandum of the agreement made is a per se refusal to bargain. Section 8(d) of the Act; H.J. Heinz v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 514 (1941); Big Run Coal & Clay Co., 152 NLRB 1144 (1965), enfd. 385 F.2d 788 (6th Cir. 1967); Lozano Enterprises v. NLRB, 327 F.2d 815 (9th Cir. 1964).

However, by the time it received Bartley's August 26 mailgram, Respondent argues, it already knew of employee discontent with the method of the ratification vote and, a day or two later, employee desire no longer to be represented by the Union. Thus, the remaining issue is whether employee action after the contract had been made permitted Respondent to avoid what was otherwise its obligation under Section 8(a)(5). To paraphase the Board in North Bros. Ford, 220 NLRB 1021, 1022 (1975), on facts strikingly similar to those herein, final agreement was reached no later than August 26, well before the employee petitions disavowing representation by the Union and for decertification were filed. Once final agreement on the substantive terms of the contract was reached, and regardless of the status of any written instrument incorporating that agreement, Respondent was not free to refuse to bargain even if it then had lawful grounds for believing that the Union had subsequently lost its majority status. See, e.g., Utility Tree Service, 215 NLRB 806 (1974), enfd. 539 F.2d 718 (9th Cir. 1976); Raybestos-Manhattan, supra.

Finally, to the extent that Respondent continues to urge that I erred in excluding testimony regarding the validity of the Union's ratification vote, I adhere to my prior rulings at the hearing. Although the Union clearly stated that ratification by its membership was necessary for it to make a final and binding agreement, no agreement was made by the parties that made ratification necessary and no requirement that this occurrence was incorporated into the written contract proposal prepared by Respondent. Martin J. Barry Co., 241 NLRB 1011, 1013 (1979). "Furthermore, even if ratification were a precondition . . . Respondent has no standing to question the validity of the procedures used by the Union in ratifying the agreement. It is well settled that ratification is an internal union matter which is not subject to question by an employer." Id.; M&M Oldsmobile, 156 NLRB 903, 905 (1966), enfd. on other grounds 377 F.2d 712 (2d Cir. 1967); London Chop House, 264 NLRB 638, 639 (1982).

Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to execute the agreement and by withdrawing recognition from the Union. These activities occurring in connection with Respondent's operations have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

THE REMEDY

I will, accordingly, recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from its illegal activities and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the polices of the Act. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to execute the agreement which it negotiated, on request of the Union, comply with all the provisions thereof retroactive to August 26, 1982, the date such agreement was consumated, and make all employees whole for any losses they may have suffered by Respondent's failure to sign the agreement. Backpay, if any, shall be computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[11] It is possible that the 1-year agreement will have expired before Respondent complies with the order recommended herein. In such event, the recommended Order will provide an option to the Union to request that Respondent sign the agreed-upon contract or resume bargaining and, if an agreement is reached, embody it in a signed agreement. Big Run Coal & Clay Co., supra; Worrell Newspapers, supra.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record,[12] I issue the following recommended[13]

ORDER

The Respondent, Consumat Systems, Inc., Mechanicsville, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing or refusing, on request, to execute and give effect to, retroactive to August 26, 1982, a written agreement incorporating the agreement reached with the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers.

[11] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 139 NLRB 716 (1962), enf. denied on other grounds 322 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1963).

[12] The General Counsel and Respondent both moved to correct the official transcript in certain respects. There being no opposition to Respondent's motion and Respondent having agreed to the General Counsel's motion, the motions are granted and the transcript amended accordingly.

[13] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Failing or refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union concerning issues which have arisen, or may arise, during the terms of the aforesaid agreement.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action found necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request of the Union, execute and give effect, retroactive to August 26, 1982, to the written agreement embodying the terms reached between it and the Union, deliver an executed copy to the Union, and make the employees whole for any losses they may have suffered by its failure to sign the aforesaid agreement, with interest, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) On request of the Union, bargain collectively with the Union concerning any question which has arisen or which may arise under the terms of the aforesaid agreement, including the settlement of grievances and disputes entitled to arbitration as therein provided.

(c) In the event that the term of the aforesaid agreement has expired before it is signed by Respondent, and on request of the Union, bargain with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees in a unit composed of all production and maintenance employees employed at Respondent's Mechanicsville, Virginia location, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, technicians, over-the-road truckdrivers and their helpers, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and if an agreement is reached, embody the same into a signed contract.

(d) Post at its plant in Mechanicsville, Virginia copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[14] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse, on request, to execute and give effect to, retroactive to August 26, 1982, a written agreement incorporating the agreement reached with the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers.

WE WILL NOT fail or refuse to recognize and bargain with the Union concerning issues which have arisen, or may arise, during the term of the aforesaid agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request of the Union, execute and give effect, retroactive to August 26, 1982, to the written agreement embodying the terms reached between us and the Union, deliver an executed copy thereof to the Union, and make our employees whole for any losses they may have suffered by our failure to sign the aforesaid agreement, with interest.

WE WILL, on request of the Union, bargain collectively with the Union concerning any question which has arisen or which may arise under the terms of the aforesaid agreement, including the settlement of grievances and disputes entitled to arbitration as therein provided.

WE WILL in the event that the term of the aforesaid agreement has expired before it is signed by us and, on request of the Union, bargain with the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of our employees in a unit composed of all production and maintenance employees employed at our Mechanicsville, Virginia location, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, technicians, over-the-road truck drivers and their helpers, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act and, if an agreement is reached, embody the same into a signed contract.

CONSUMAT SYSTEMS, INC.

The General Store No. Two, Inc. and United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 576. Case 17–CA–11529

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 14 December 1983 Administrative Law Judge Steven M. Charno issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The complaint in this case alleges that the Respondent, General Store No. Two, Inc., threatened its employees in order to coerce their acceptance of wage and benefit concessions at midterm of the collective-bargaining agreement. The judge agreed, finding that certain statements made by the Respondent in the course of discussing with its employees the need for concessions amounted to threats in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The issue before us is whether, under the particular circumstances of this case, the Respondent's statements did in fact constitute threats which impaired employee rights under Section 7 of the Act. We answer in the negative and we will dismiss the complaint.

The Respondent owns and operates three grocery stores in the Kansas City, Missouri area. It is a member of the Retail Grocers Association of Greater Kansas City (the Association), an employer's association consisting mostly of independent grocers. United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 576 (the Union) is the exclusive representative of the sales employees of the Respondent and of the employees of a number of other grocery store operators in the area. The collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union during the events of this case ran from 10 May 1981 through 10 September 1983.

By a memorandum of agreement dated 24 February 1983[1] the Union granted substantial wage and benefit concessions to Milgram Food Stores, a grocery chain in the Kansas City area. Milgram is in direct competition with the Respondent and other independent grocers who are members of the Association.[2]

On 8 March representatives of the Association met with the president of the Union to discuss the possibility of the Union's granting Milgram-type concessions to the independent grocers of the Association. It is apparent from the record that the Union's president indicated that the union leadership had no objection to granting the same concessions to the independent grocers, but he also indicated that final approval would hinge on a vote by the bargaining unit members who would be affected by the concessions. The president stated that, as a prerequisite to the vote, it would be necessary for each of the employers to meet with its employees in order to inform them of the particulars of the Milgram concessions and to "condition" them concerning the similar concessions contemplated by the Union and the Association members. When the Association's representatives objected to this direct approach, the Union's president stated that the Union would not file unfair labor practice charges as a result of the employers' directly approaching their employees to discuss the concessions.

The Association members, including the Respondent, met 14 March to discuss the union leadership's position on the concessions proposal. The members were given printed information concerning the Milgram concessions and copies of a form letter to be sent to the Union requesting equivalent concessions. The form letter had been approved previously by the Union's president. The members also were instructed to meet with their employees prior to the vote on concessions in order to "condition" them as suggested by the Union's president.

On 16 March the Respondent's owners, Alan Gailey and Jim Marsh, met with five of their bargaining unit employees. Two of the employees worked at the Respondent's Kansas City store, two worked at the North Kansas City store, and one worked at the Raytown store. The five were considered influential with the Respondent's other employees. Each was either a produce manager or a head clerk.[3]

Alan Gailey began the meeting by describing the nature of the Milgram concessions. He then explained the impact of the concessions on independent grocers like the Respondent in the Kansas City area. He emphasized that the Respondent needed similar concessions in order to continue operating on a competitive basis and to maintain its fair market share of the local grocery business. He indicated that the independent grocers had approached the union leadership with a request for Milgram-type concessions and that the Union had been receptive to the request. After some discussion Gailey informed the five employees that all of the bargaining unit employees would be voting on the concessions within a few days. Should the unit employees vote to reject the proposal, Gailey stated that (1) the Respondent would roll back wages unilaterally; (2) the Respondent's North Kansas City store would have to be either sold or closed; and (3) the Milgram concessions would be the Respondent's only contract offer at negotiations following expiration of the current contract in September.

[2] The record indicates that the Milgram chain is also a member of the Association. The record is not clear however on whether Milgram and the independent grocer/members were parties to a single collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

[3] No issue has been raised as to the possible supervisory capacity of any of these employees.

On the following day, 17 March, one of the five employees who had been present at the above meeting discussed the meeting and the proposed concessions with the store manager of the Respondent's North Kansas City store. During this discussion the manager reiterated the Respondent's position that it would have to close the North Kansas City store if the employees did not accept the concessions.

No vote on the concessions was taken among the bargaining unit members following these incidents and there is no indication that the Respondent implemented any of the alternatives of which Gailey spoke at the 16 March meeting.

The judge found Alan Gailey's three statements of alternatives made on 16 March and the related statement of the Respondent's store manager on 17 March to be violative of Section 8(a)(1). He concluded that they were threats which interfered with the employees' right to bargain collectively as to the terms and conditions of their employment. For the reasons given below we do not agree.

It is clear that at the 8 March meeting the union leadership gave at least tacit approval to the Association's proposal for concessions equivalent to those which the Union had granted to the Milgram chain. The Union's president later approved the form letter to be used by the Association members to formally request Milgram-type concession. Further, the Union's president not only agreed to allow the employers to approach their employees directly to "condition" them to the concessions, he suggested this course of conduct in the first instance. The Union drew no limits on the nature or extent of the "conditioning" approach to be taken by the Employers. The Union also promised not to file charges as a result of the Employers' direct, individual approach. We interpret the Union's position in these circumstances as one of broad endorsement, broad enough to include the reasonably foreseeable consequences of the employers' desire to persuade their employees to accept the concessions.

The judge's reliance on Admiral Merchants Motor Freight, 265 NLRB 134 (1982), to support the 8(a)(1) findings is misplaced. In that case the employer bypassed the exclusive representative to bargain directly with employees concerning benefits concessions. The Board found independent 8(a)(1) violations in threats made by the employer, in addition to the 8(a)(5) and (1) violations with regard to the employer's bypassing the union to bargain with employees. The critical factor which is absent in the Admiral Merchants situation but present here is the consent of the union to the employer's conduct. In Admiral Merchants the 8(a)(1) threats, while independent violations, grew out of the 8(a)(5) context: the employer's ignoring the union to negotiate directly with employees.[4] In the present case the Respondent did not bypass the Union; it acted with the approval and consent of the employees' exclusive representative and at its suggestion.

Given the particular circumstances of the case we find that the statements of the Respondent which the judge found violative were part of a course of conduct which the Union had encouraged and broadly approved. The statements made by Alan Gailey on 16 March were part of a communication with the employees which was supported by the Union. The statement made by the Respondent's store manager on 17 March was a continuation of that communication. Under these particular circumstances we conclude that the Respondent's statements did not reasonably tend to interfere with, restrain, or coerce the employees in the exercise of their rights under the Act. Therefore we do not adopt the judge's conclusions of law and we will dismiss the complaint in its entirety.[5]

[5] We also note that Alan Gailey's 16 March statements were preceded by an explanation of the nature of the Milgram concessions, their economic impact on independent grocers in the area, and the Respondent's need to maintain a competitive position in its market. Under the circumstances, where there is no indication whatsoever that the Respondent had bypassed the Union and where the Respondent has prefaced its statements with relevant, objective, economic considerations, we find that the 16 March statements were a legitimate expression of the Respondent's reasonable economic alternatives, protected by Sec. 8(c). The 17 March statement, as a continuation of the Respondent's communication with its employees, carried the same 8(c) protection.

With respect to our colleague's dissenting opinion, we disagree with his rhetorical inferences and evaluation of the circumstances of this case. As our analysis indicates, the facts here do not support the conclusion that the Respondent's conduct contravened the Sec. 7 rights of its employees.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

I do not agree with my colleagues that under the circumstances here the Respondent was privileged to threaten its employees with plant closure, job loss, unilateral wage cuts, and immutable bargaining demands. On the contrary, I would find that—despite the Union's request that the Respondent "condition" employees for wage concessions—the Respondent's statements unlawfully interfered with the employees' Section 7 right to engage in collective bargaining.

At a meeting with five key employees the Respondent's co-owner declared that if the employees failed to vote for midterm wage concessions the Respondent would (1) close or sell one of its three stores, (2) unilaterally reduce wages and fringe benefits, and (3) make the proposed concessions its only offer at the expiration of the collective-bargaining contract. The next day a store manager reiterated to an employee the threat to sell a store if concessions were not forthcoming.

My colleagues have reversed the judge's findings that these statements were violative of Section 8(a)(1) on the grounds that the Union suggested and consented to the Respondent's approaching the employees for "conditioning," and that the Respondent's statements were protected by Section 8(c) of the Act.

With respect to the first ground, the majority reasons that the Respondent's conduct was a "reasonably foreseeable consequence" of the Union's tentative endorsement of the wage concessions. In asking the Respondent to "condition" employees to accept concessions, the Union's statement cannot reasonably be interpreted as encouraging the Respondent to threaten employees with job loss or unilateral cuts if they did not agree to the concessions. That the Respondent may have so interpreted the Union's statement as permission or acquiescence does not make the threats permissible. At issue is the right of employees to be free of restraint or coercion with respect to their Section 7 rights; interference with that right cannot be excused simply because the Union may have encouraged the Respondent's conduct.

In addition I find no basis for my colleagues' conclusion that the threats expressed by the Respondent are the type of legitimate expression of views or economic predictions protected by Section 8(c). Accordingly, I would affirm the judge and I dissent from my colleagues' dismissal of the complaint.

DECISION

STEVEN M. CHARNO, Administrative Law Judge. In response to a charge filed March 16, 1983, a complaint issued on April 22, 1983, alleging that The General Store No. Two, Inc. (Respondent)[1] had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by threatening its employees with closure of a facility, unilateral wage reductions, and a refusal to bargain in good faith with the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local No. 576 (Union). Respondent's answer denied the commission of any unfair labor practice.

A hearing was held before me in Kansas City, Kansas, on July 5, 1983.[2] Briefs were filed by the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and the Respondent under due date of August 9, 1983.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Missouri corporation engaged in the retail sale of groceries, produce, meat, and related products at its facilities in Kansas City, Raytown, and North Kansas City, Missouri. Respondent's gross volume of business at these facilities exceeds $500,000 annually. In the course and conduct of its business operations within Missouri, Respondent annually purchases goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 from sources outside the State. It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

The Union is admitted to be, and I find is, a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

At all times relevant the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's sales employees. Respondent and the Union have been parties to a series of collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which was in effect from May 10, 1981, through September 10, 1983.[3] The Union also represents the employees of other grocers doing business in the Kansas City area and, by a February 24 contract supplement, it granted significant wage and benefit concessions to the Milgram grocery chain. Milgram's stores and those of Respondent are direct competitors.

Respondent is a member of the Retail Grocers Association of Greater Kansas City (Association). One of the Association's functions as a trade organization is to represent its members, including Respondent, in labor negotiations.

On March 8 the Association's executive director and its attorney met with Carl Nothnagel, the Union's president, to discuss the availability of the Milgram concessions to grocers who were members of the Association. Nothnagel stated that, before the Union could grant concessions to the Association's members, it would be necessary for the grocers to meet with and "condition" their employees concerning the concessions. The Association's attorney, citing the National Labor Relations Act, objected to the grocers talking directly to their employees. Nothnagel stated that no charges would be filed and that it would be necessary for the grocers to meet with their employees and discuss the concessions with them. Nothnagel also noted that an employee vote would have to be held on the question of whether to grant concessions.

On March 14, a meeting was held of the Association's membership. Representatives of the members, including Respondent's owners Jim Marsh and Alan Gailey, were told what had transpired at the March 8 meeting with Nothnagel, and each of the representatives was given a copy of the Milgram contract supplement, a letter from Milgram's president to its employees, and a handwritten chart showing the impact of the Milgram concessions on the members' employees. Also distributed was a draft letter to the Union requesting concessions similar to those granted Milgram in order to allow the Association's members to remain competitive. Gailey subsequently executed and mailed a copy of this letter to Nothnagel.

B. The March 16 Meeting

On March 16, Alan Gailey called a 9 a.m. meeting at his office in the Raytown store. Present were Gailey, Marsh, and five employees: the Kansas City store's produce manager Ronald Lybarger and Head Clerk Richard Sanchez, the North Kansas City store's produce manager William Stewart and Head Clerk Ruben Chavez and the Raytown store's produce manager Ralph Weant.

Gailey explained the Milgram concessions, as well as their impact on the grocery industry in the Kansas City area, and stated that Respondent needed comparable concessions to remain competitive and to maintain its market share. The Milgram contract supplement, the letter from Milgram's president, and the chart prepared by the Association were passed around. Gailey stated that the Union would soon hold a meeting to vote on whether to grant similar concessions to Respondent and other independent grocers. Gailey further stated that, even if the concessions were not approved by that vote, there would be a wage rollback in the relatively near future. He went on to explain that the moneys not paid to employees because of the rollback would be held in a escrow account pending the outcome of anticipated litigation.[4]

Gailey also told the assembled employees that, when the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union expired in September, Respondent's only contract offer to the Union would be the Milgram concessions.[5] During the meeting, Stewart stated that he would not take a pay cut of the magnitude indicated, to which no response was made. Gailey stated at some point that it was a "hell of a cut" and that he was not sure whether he would vote for it himself. In response to Chavez' question of whether Respondent's employees would have to take the same pay cut if they voted the Union out, Gailey answered that the issue was not union or nonunion, but parity of wage costs among competing grocers. Gailey also stated that he would pay his employees $20 an hour if his competitors had the same wage costs.

Finally, Gailey told his employees that Respondent's North Kansas City store was losing money because of inadequate volume and that wage concessions might make that store profitable over the near term.[6] Gailey further stated that the North Kansas City store would have to be sold or closed without the wage concessions.[7]

Respondent did not implement the pay cuts discussed at this meeting, and Respondent's North Kansas City store had not been closed or sold at the time of the hearing.

C. The March 17 Incident

On March 17, a conversation took place at the front of Respondent's North Kansas City store between Stewart and Michael Gailey, the manager of that store. At the time of the conversation, Stewart and Gailey had maintained both a working and a social relationship for approximately 10 years. No one else was present during the conversation. Stewart and Gailey discussed the March 16 meeting and the Milgram concessions. This was not the first occasion on which they had discussed the concessions. Gailey told Stewart that Respondent would have to sell the North Kansas City store unless the wage concessions were accepted.[8] There is no evidence that Gailey talked to any other employee on this subject.

Discussion

The General Counsel contends that Alan Gailey's statements on March 16 constitute three separate violations of the Act: a threat to shut down an operation unless wage concessions were granted, a threat to unilaterally modify terms and conditions of employment, and a threat to refuse to bargain in good faith. Respondent argues that Gailey's statements were not threats when viewed in the context of everything which was said during the meeting and that his statements were part of an isolated incident and therefore de minimis.

It was established that Gailey stated that Respondent would sell or close one its stores unless wage concessions were granted, that it would make unilateral wage cuts, and that it would bargain from a fixed position on expi-

[4] The foregoing findings are based primarily on Gailey's admissions which were corroborated by the employees present at the meeting.

[5] Gailey's candid admission that he told his employees "this is the contract that we'll offer and that's all" was confirmed by Respondent's witness Weant who testified that Gailey stated that the Milgram concessions "would be the only contract that was offered" in September.

[6] Gailey so testified.

[7] The General Counsel's witnesses Stewart, Lybarger, and Chavez, as well as Respondent's witness Weant, so testified.

[8] Stewart so testified. Gailey conceded that he stated, in the conversational context of Respondent's competitors paying lower wages, that Respondent would have to sell the store before it lost too much money. To the extent that their versions of the conversation may be thought to be inconsistent, I credit Stewart who displayed the better memory of what occurred.

ration of the then current collective-bargaining agreement. By making these statements, Gailey threatened to inflict economic harm on his employees by engaging in conduct which was indisputably violative of the Act.[9] All three of these threats may reasonably be said to interfere with the free exercise of employee rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, specifically of the right of Respondent's employees to bargain collectively concerning the terms and conditions of their employment. See Admiral Merchants Motor Freight, 265 NLRB 134 (1982). Given this finding, neither Gailey's intent in making the statements nor the ultimate coercive effect of those statements is material. Fairleigh Dickinson University, 264 NLRB 725 (1982); National Apartment Leasing Co., 263 NLRB 15 (1982).

Because I found that Gailey's threats tended to interfere with the free exercise of employee rights, it is necessary to address Respondent's argument that those threats were merely an isolated incident which does not rise to the level of a violation of the Act. Gailey, acting pursuant to a union request to "condition" Respondent's work force to accept wage concessions, called together five admittedly "key" employees and threatened them. Those threats envisioned a serious economic impact on all of Respondent's employees and were made by an individual who had the power to carry them out. There is no evidence that Respondent ever attempted to retract or repudiate the threats. In this context, the presumption that such threats will be repeated to and discussed with other employees is clearly applicable. See Coach & Equipment Sales Corp., 228 NLRB 440 (1977); General Stencils, 195 NLRB 1109, 1110 (1972). For the foregoing reasons, I find that all of Gailey's threats on March 16 were violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[9] Gailey's statements therefore fall within one of the definitions of the term "threat" quoted by Respondent on brief: "an indication of something impending and usu. [sic] undesirable or unpleasant . . . as . . . expression of an intention to inflict loss or harm on another by illegal means . . . ."

The General Counsel contends that the conversation on March 17 at Respondent's North Kansas City store discloses a further violation of the Act. Respondent argues that the conversation was merely one "between individuals who had a working relationship for many years" and that it was an isolated incident. The existence of a long-standing social and working relationship between Stewart and Michael Gailey does not nullify the coercive effect of Gailey's statement. Indeed, a statement of serious economic consequences may have an even greater impact on an employee when it comes from a friend who is part of management. See Coach & Equipment Sales Corp., supra; Wichita Eagle & Beacon Publishing Co., 199 NLRB 360, 370 (1972) Contrary to Respondent's second argument, I do not believe that Michael Gailey's statement can be assessed standing alone. Rather, it must be considered in connection with and as corroborative of Alan Gailey's similar threat on March 16. Accordingly, I find that Michael Gailey's statement that the North Kansas City store would be have to be sold unless wage concessions were granted was a threat violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By threatening that (a) it would sell or close one of its stores unless its employees granted wage concessions, (b) it would unilaterally reduce employee wages, and (c) it would refuse to bargain in good faith by adopting a fixed and unalterable bargaining position, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices effect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 17 October 1983 Administrative Law Judge Stanley N. Ohlbaum issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

For the reasons the judge stated, we agree that a Gissel[2] bargaining order is clearly warranted to remedy the Respondent's unfair labor practices, which the judge aptly described as the "unlawful discharge of an entire bargaining unit, lock, stock and barrel, for the express purpose of avoiding the statutory bargaining obligation."[3] We also agree with the judge's rejection of the Respondent's argument that a bargaining order should be denied because all three discriminatees declined reinstatement, and thus there has been substantial "employee turnover." As the judge pointed out, the Respondent's contention has "a hollow ring" because the "employee turnover" in this case was a direct and obvious product of the Respondent's own unlawful conduct.

Our dissenting colleague claims that a bargaining order is inconsistent with decisions of the Second Circuit. We disagree. In its Jamaica Towing opinion,[4] the court specifically cautioned against "rewarding an employer for his own misconduct," and limited consideration of the turnover factor to "cases where later relevant events are not of the employer's making." Here, the "employee turnover" was "of the employer's making," and withholding a bargaining order on that ground would be "rewarding an employer for his own misconduct." Accordingly, for all of the above reasons, we adopt the judge's recommendation that a Gissel bargaining order be issued.[5]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Eli Gordon, Gerald Tillinger and Seymour Tillinger, a Copartnership, d/b/a Balsam Village Management Company, New York, New York, its partners, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969).

[3] We find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's alternative rationale for issuing a bargaining order.

[4] NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, 632 F.2d 208, 214 (2d Cir. 1980).

[5] Chairman Dotson finds the issuance of a bargaining order in this case arising in the Second Circuit to be contrary to the law of that circuit. See NLRB v. Pace Oldsmobile, Inc., 739 F.2d 108 (2d Cir. 1984); NLRB v. Windsor Industries, 730 F.2d 860 (2d Cir. 1984); NLRB v. Knogo Corp., 727 F.2d 55 (2d Cir. 1984), and cases cited therein. While recognizing the severity of the Respondent's misconduct, Chairman Dotson finds that a bargaining order would impair the rights of the Respondent's current work force. In so finding he notes that the unlawfully discharged employees declined reinstatement to their former jobs. Thus, there is no continuity in the Company's work force before and after the unfair labor practices. Further, the record fails to show that the Respondent asked the replacement employees about their union sentiments, that the replacement employees exhibited any interest in the Union, or that the Union attempted to organize the new employees. No showing was made that the current employees discussed the Respondent's prior misconduct or that the Respondent has engaged in further antiunion activity. In view of the circumstances of this Second Circuit case, Chairman Dotson finds a bargaining order inappropriate.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

STANLEY N. OHLBAUM, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding,[1] under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (Act), was litigated before me in Brooklyn, New York, on August 15 and 17, 1983, with all parties participating throughout by counsel afforded full opportunity to present evidence, arguments, and briefs (received on October 7, 1983). All have been carefully considered.

The basic issues presented are whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by threatening employees with discharge and other reprisals for joining or supporting the Charging Party Union, by discharging (and, for a time, refusing to agree to reinstate) three employees for joining the Union and engaging in concerted activities protected under the Act, and by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the authorized collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees. Respondent denies all of these allegations.

[1] Based on complaint issued April 5, 1983, by the Acting Regional Director for NLRB Region 29, growing out of charge filed on February 18, 1983, by the above Union.

On the entire record and my observation of the testimonial demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. PARTIES; JURISDICTION

At all material times, Respondent, a copartnership consisting of Eli Gordon, Gerald Tillinger, and Seymour Tillinger doing business under the firm name and style of Balsam Village Management Company, has continuously engaged and now engages in the management, operation, and rental of a garden apartment complex known as Balsam Village, at 88–15 133d Avenue, Borough and county of Queens, city and State of New York, at which address Respondent has also maintained and maintains its principal office and place of business. During the representative year immediately preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent derived gross revenues exceeding $500,000 in and from those business operations; and, further therein, caused to be transported to and received at its said premises for its use in said business, goods and materials valued at over $5000, purchased from other enterprises in New York who in turn had purchased and received them directly in interstate commerce from and through other States.

I find that at all material times Respondent has been and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act; and that at all of those times Charging Party Union has been and is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts as Found

Respondent operates and manages an apartment house complex in Queens County, New York, covering some seven city blocks, consisting of 270 apartment units located in 45 six-family buildings. Prior to events to be described, upkeep, maintenance, and cleanup of the grounds, walks, and portions of the buildings used in common (hallways, stairs, doors, cellars, furnaces, etc.), as well as minor repairs (e.g., minor plumbing), were done by three employees who figure prominently in the events to be described. These were Carlos Casal, the "superintendent" (but not a supervisor within the Act's definition, since he lacked authority over and had no subordinates, and possessed no other characteristic of supervisorship listed in the Act) who tended some 118 boilers and water heaters and also made minor repairs within his capability; and Mario Aguila and Daniel Santos, who took care of the grounds (mowing lawns, keeping grass and walkways debris free, etc.) and general cleanup chores (hallways, stairways and rails, hall ceilings, windows, doors, mailboxes, vacuuming and waxing floors, laundry rooms, parking lots, project office, etc.). Major refurbishing was accomplished by outside contractors, including firms of the Tillinger brothers or Eli Gordon, the partners comprising Respondent partnership.[2] Until around the summer of 1982, Mattie Tillinger, wife of Respondent partner Seymour Tillinger, was in overall charge and management of the housing project. When she (Mrs. Seymour Tillinger) ceased functioning in that capacity, Respondent partner Eli Gordon commenced overseeing the project until Respondent partner Gerald (Jerry) Tillinger assumed that responsibility on a full-time basis in October 1982 (with Gordon continuing to participate on a part-time basis). The project office bookkeeping, correspondence, and related chores were handled by office manager/secretary Helen Lober in an office she shared with Jerry Tillinger (and Gordon). Respondent partner Seymour Tillinger has not taken an active part in Respondent's operations at the times here involved.

Because of dissatisfaction with the terms and conditions of their employment (including a cutback in medical insurance for dependents), in early December 1982 interest in the possibility of joining a union to bargain collectively, developed among these three employees, who (except for an occasional student here and there utilized occasionally and sporadically to assist with a chore, a part-time night watchman/guard, and the office manager/secretary), comprised the entire work force at the project. It was stipulated at the outset of the hearing that these three employees constituted the only employees in the bargaining unit alleged in the complaint, a conventional bargaining unit which I find appropriate for collective bargaining under the Act (and so admitted at the trial by amendment to the answer).

After meeting with a business agent (Anthony Poccio) of the Charging Party Union in January 1983 and, after discussions with him being satisfied to proceed along that line, Respondent's three employees joined the Union (paying the required initiation fees) and on January 20, 1983, signed cards (the meaning and significance of which they each clearly understood) authorizing the Union to represent them in collective bargaining. On January 25 or 26 the Union mailed receipts for these initiation fees to Casal at the project (in the mistaken belief that he lived there), although Casal lived off the project premises. That mail, in a window envelope showing the name and return address of the Union, and bearing the capitalized words "ENCLOSE YOUR UNION BOOK! DO NOT SEND CASH!," thus arrived at the project office, where it landed on the desk of Project Manager Jerry Tillinger, where it was observed by Casal on January 27 or 28 (Thursday or Friday). The envelope, perhaps opened,[3] was handed to Casal by Office Manager Lober on February 2 (Wednesday).

When the three employees discussed the pros and cons of union affiliation with Union Business Agent Poccio, the latter specifically warned them that "joining the Union could mean losing [your] jobs if the Employer [is] not in agreement with it." Unfortunately, this prediction of Poccio was precisely and rapidly fulfilled. On February 4 (Friday), payday, 2 days after the union envelope with the union initiation fee receipts of Casal and his two fellow employees was handed to Casal by Lober, the three employees were summarily discharged.

[2] Some painting was occasionally done by one or the other of the foregoing three employees, on their own time, for extra or separate pay.

[3] Casal could not recollect one way or the other, since, as he testified, he was considerably unnerved by the incident—i.e., delivery of the envelope bearing the union name, addressed to him, at the project office, clearly disclosing connection with the Union.

Casal as well as Aguila had been in Respondent's employ uninterruptedly for some 6 years, since 1977; and Santos from 1980, with a hiatus from late 1980 to mid-1982 followed by rehire and continuous employment since then. As testified by these three individuals, whom I credit based on my close observation of their testimonial demeanor, no dissatisfaction had been expressed by management with the work of any of them.[4] At no time has Respondent furnished any of these employees with any writing stating any reason or basis for his discharge, and unemployment insurance benefits[5] to them were applied for and paid without objection or protest from Respondent.

The circumstances of the actual discharges were as follows. In the early afternoon of February 4 (Friday), Office Manager Lober summoned Casal to the project office, where he was met by Project Manager Jerry Tillinger and his partner, Gordon. Gordon opened up at Casal with, "This is not Manhattan. We cannot afford Unions here, and [you all] should have came and talked to me about this before you done anything about it. . . . We cannot afford Unions and you should talk the [other two] men out of getting into Union . . . . [We need your] cooperation for all of us to work together to try to bring the place back into shape and the Union will not let us do that. . . . [G]o and talk to them [i.e., his two fellow-employees] and talk them out of the Union. . . . if [you all] bring the Union [I'm] going to have to fire them and [I'm] going to have to accept your resignation. . . ." When Casal explained to Gordon and Tillinger that "it's too late, the men want the Union. We have talked about it," Gordon persisted, "Well, just go and talk to them, just tell them that they will lose their jobs. They have families to support and I'm sure they don't want to lose their jobs. Just go and talk to them and explain to them that there will be no job if they join the Union." Gordon also told Casal, "You have to decide whether you guys want to work here or you guys don't want to work here . . . unions are no good for the company . . . once you have a union you cannot work as a family any more . . . if the men don't want to give up the union, then they don't have a job. . . . [I]f [you don't] cooperate and get them out of the union, [we will] have to accept [your] resignation. . . . You have a family also . . . and [you have] to think about [your] family." Casal thereupon conveyed the foregoing to Aguila and Santos and told them that "you have to make a decision if you want the Union or not because he's firing you if you want the Union." Both Aguila and Santos indicated that they "wanted" and were "sticking with the Union." Casal returned to the project office and relayed this decision to Gordon and Tillinger, adding that "I'm sticking with the union with the men." Gordon then urged Casal to "come off the union [yourself] and [I'll] straighten it out with the men." When Casal reiterated, "No, I'm sticking with the union with the men," Gordon responded, "Well, if you're going to stick to the union, . . . then I accept your resignation also." At no time did Casal accept the invitation to "resign." Gordon proceeded to remonstrate with Casal again, urging anew that they give up the Union, this time adding, "You [Casal] know that you are the key for them to be in the Union. You know that if you don't join the Union they have no chance. They don't speak English. They will never be able to do anything, but you are the key." Gordon concluded by inviting Casal and his wife to join him for dinner that evening "and then we will all be a happy family again." As for Aguila and Santos, Gordon said, "they are finished. [I] cannot keep them any longer." And, when they came for their pay later in the afternoon, Gordon did indeed abruptly terminate them, stating that their jobs were "not going to be performed any longer . . . . [We] are not in the business to clean hallways. . . . [We are] doing a rental business and things [are] not doing well and besides . . . [you] don't speak English and we cannot use you for anything else. If you spoke English maybe we could try to put you doing something else."

Following the discharge of these three employees on February 4, the Union on February 7 formally requested to meet and bargain with Respondent (G.C. Exh. 2), a request received by Respondent on February 10 but to which Respondent has at no time responded. On February 8, continuing until mid-April, the three discharged employees picketed Respondent's premises. During the course of this picketing, replacement employees were observed to be doing the work they had formerly done.[6] Also during the course of this picketing, on February 25 Gordon approached the pickets and informed them that if they renounced the Union they could return to their jobs—a condition not accepted by the employees, who continued their picketing.

It was stipulated at the trial that on June 8, 1983, Respondent offered the three employees here reinstatement, which they declined.

It is evident from the foregoing facts as found that the General Counsel has established a clear prima facie case of inhibitory, restraining, coercive, discriminatory, and retaliatory discharge of the three employees in question, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The three had been satisfactory employees for a long time but were precipitately fired right after they joined the Union

[4] Some alleged correspondence from a very few alleged tenants out of the very large number of tenants, produced by Respondent, details certain alleged complaints to management. These, however (including nonreceipt of a copy of the lease, and various structural or outside repairs desired), from but few of the very large number of tenants in the project and constituting seemingly the usual kind of complaints from tenants, either obviously fall outside the scope of the duties or competence of the three employees or have not been shown to be ascribable in any way to any neglect, misfeasance, or nonfeasance on their part; nor is there any showing that any of these alleged conditions was ever reported or assigned to any of those employees for rectification, nor, if it was, that it was not taken care of.

[5] As is well known, such benefits are not payable in case of discharge for cause ascribable to the employee.

[6] Confirmed by Respondent's own personnel records, as testified to by Respondent's office manager Lober. Gordon also conceded that, after the discharge of Aguila and Santos, their work continued to be done by other employees hired to replace them; and that of the six hired, none was a union member.

and Respondent learned about it. Respondent's knowledge is clear not only from its receipt of the unfortunately misdirected union envelope containing the receipts for the three employees' initiation fees, but also, of course, from Gordon's remarks to Casal, detailed above, importuning Casal to persuade his fellows to drop out of the Union, on penalty of being discharged.

The General Counsel having established a prima facie case, the burden shifts to Respondent to establish by a preponderance of evidence that the discharges in question were not for reasons violative of the Act. See NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). It is accordingly necessary to address Respondent's defenses.

B. Respondent's "Defenses"

Respondent advances several contentions by way of defense. Each is readily and simply answered.

To begin with, Respondent contends that it no longer had need for the discharged employees' services. This is belied by the fact that no previous mention had been made to that effect, prior to their advent into unionism; by the nature of Respondent's business, which had not changed and which clearly continued to require such services; by Respondent's prompt hire of replacements for the discharged employees; and by Respondent's offer of reinstatement to the discharged employees.

Respondent next contends that it discharged Aguila and Santos because they could not speak English. The answers to this are that Respondent was aware of this when it hired them; that they remained in Respondent's employ for years without complaint or incident on that (or other) score; that knowledge of English was not required in the work they did, and ignorance of English in no way affected their job performance; and that they could and did carry on two-way conversations with Project Manager Tillinger in Spanish, which he spoke and understood.

Respondent further contends that Casal resigned his job voluntarily. This is simply untrue. Upon comparative testimonial demeanor evaluation, without more (as well as on the plain inherent probabilities of the situation under the circumstances described), I clearly prefer and accept the version of Casal (a most impressive witness) over that of Gordon (a poor quality witness, as the record also will disclose) as to the statements, circumstances, and events surrounding the employees' discharges on February 4.

Respondent also contends that the employees were discharged for inefficiency or inability to do the needed work. This also is belied by their long-term employments, during which Respondent had expressed no dissatisfaction with their work.[7]

As for other "defenses" darkly hinted at in Respondent's opening statement, suffice it to say that they did not emerge from that darkness at the trial, and that they therefore continue to be invisible and not deserving of mention, much less credit. Perhaps it is fair, however, to regard them as reflective of the fictive or pretextual nature of the other "reasons" contrived to attempt to justify the discharges under the circumstances shown.

Finally, it is to be observed that Jerry Tillinger, although deeply implicated in events that have been described, elected without explanation not to testify.

Under these circumstances, Respondent having failed by a preponderance of the evidence to overcome the General Counsel's prima facie case (Transportation Management, supra), it is found that Respondent threatened to and then discharged the three employees in question on February 4, 1983, because of their union membership and their desire to bargain collectively, rights guaranteed to them under Section 7 of the Act; that but for such union membership and their exercise of such rights they would not have been discharged, and that Respondent thereby violated and continues to violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act; and, further, that by failing and refusing to bargain with Charging Party Union as the duly authorized collective-bargaining representative of an appropriate bargaining unit of Respondent's employees, Respondent has violated and continues to violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

On the foregoing findings and the entire record, I state the following

Conclusions of Law

1. Jurisdiction is properly asserted here.

2. By threatening to discharge and by discharging its employees Carlos Casal, Mario Aguila, and Daniel Santos, at the times and under the circumstances described and found in section III, supra, Respondent has discriminated in regard to the hire, tenure, and terms and conditions of employment of its employees, and has further interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7, thereby violating Section 8(a)(3) and (1), of the Act.

3. By failing and refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with Local 32B–32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO as the duly designated bargaining representative of all of Respondent's employees in the following appropriate collective-bargaining unit, under the circumstances described and found in section II, supra, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act:

> All building service employees, including porters, handymen and superintendents employed by Respondent at its Queens facility, exclusive of office clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices and each of them have affected, are affecting, and unless permanently restrained and enjoined will continue to affect, commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[7] I have already commented on the insignificant, irrelevant, or inconclusive nature of the few paltry "complaints" of a small number of tenants, many, if not most, which related to matters not within these employees' duties or competence, and as to which there was no proof that they were communicated to these employees for their action, nor that they were not attended to by them. Supra, fn. 4.

REMEDY

Respondent having been found to have discharged employees, after threatening to do so, and to have interfered with, restrained, and coerced them in the exercise of their Section 7 rights, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, should, as is usual in cases of that variety, be ordered to cease and desist from continuing or other such violations and to make each of the employees whole through payment of backpay and interest computed as explicated by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). In this connection it is to be noted that the parties have stipulated that the three discharged employees here were offered, but declined, reinstatement on June 8, 1983, and that with regard to the calculation of backpay, the General Counsel seeks no more for the three by way of recompense than the backpay due them until then. Respondent should also, as usual, be required to expunge any relevant deleterious references to these employees from its records; to preserve and open its books and records to the Board's agents for computation and compliance determination purposes; and to post the conventional informational notice to employees.

There arises the additional question of whether, as the General Counsel demands, a bargaining order should be issued in this case. In this connection it is to be noted that, at the time of their unlawful discharge as well as at the time of the Union's demand for recognition and collective bargaining, the three employees here constituted the entire (100 percent) bargaining unit. It is further to be noted that at no time was the status of the Union as such bargaining agent in any way challenged or questioned by Respondent—indeed, to the contrary, Respondent insisted that the three employees and Union members relinquish their union membership as a condition to being permitted to remain in Respondent's employ; and when they refused to do so they were for that reason promptly discharged. Employees who are discharged in violation of the Act remain employees within the Act's definition (Sec. 2(3)). Since the three unlawfully discharged employees were thus employees, as well as the only members of the bargaining unit, when Respondent received the Union's demand to bargain, the Union represented all of the employees in the bargaining unit at that time. In no way did Respondent challenge or raise any question concerning the union's authority as bargaining representative, and at no time did Respondent request an election. The Act does not require an election as a precondition to union recognition. An employer who doubts a union's representative status without an election should in some way so indicate. But here there was no doubt in Respondent's mind regarding the Union's status and authority. After a direct confrontation, the employees expressly refused to abandon the Union, when Respondent demanded that they do so as the cost of retaining their jobs. What better proof of their union desires (or of Respondent's knowledge thereof) was required? Thus, there was no question in Respondent's mind of the Union's status as the duly designated bargaining representative of all of the unit employees at the time the Union sought to bargain on their behalf. The fact that, on top of its discharge of these employees for joining the Union and seeking to bargaining collectively, Respondent later replaced them with a new and larger crew, does not change this. We have been long and consistently instructed by the Supreme Court that mere turnover—even, unlike here, where wholly legitimate—does not oust a union as bargaining representative. See NLRB v. P. Lorillard Co., 314 U.S. 512, 513 (1942); Franks Bros. Co. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 702 (1944); NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 748 fn. 16 (1962); NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 610 (1969). And, of course, an employer cannot disestablish a bargaining unit or avoid his obligation to bargain by simply unlawfully discharging all of the unit members—this is so plain that it requires no citation of authority. Even if, after the bargaining obligation was perfected, the three employees here had left of their own accord and had been replaced by nonunion employees, the existing bargaining obligation would not thereby have been erased. Gissel and other cases cited supra. It is no different just because the three here subsequently declined reinstatement, for reasons good and sufficient to them, such as disinclination to give up other jobs they had since obtained. An employer cannot be permitted (as Respondent here attempted to do) to disestablish a bargaining unit through the simple expedient of discharging all of its members. Such a result would constitute an intolerable affront to the basic purposes of the Act. And since the effects of Respondent's actions remain coercive, they continue to require remediation so that deliberate flouting of core purposes of the Act not be encouraged by going unremedied.[8]

Respondent's refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union as the bargaining representative of all of its unit employees, without raising any question as to the Union's status or demanding an election, constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(5), as found above. In this situation, resort to Gissel to support an electionless bargaining order is unnecessary, for to withhold a bargaining order in this situation would leave the Section 8(a)(5) violation wholly unremedied.[9] However, even under Gissel a bargaining order would be appropriate under the circumstances shown—i.e., unlawful discharge of an entire bargaining unit, lock, stock, and barrel, for the express purpose of avoiding the statutory bargaining obligation. In Gissel, supra, the Supreme Court described the conditions where an electionless bargaining order is appropriate under the Act. The instant case fits comfortably within the Court's instructions there. I find that Respondent's described unlawful actions in discharging the three employees, comprising the entire bargaining unit, for attempting to exercise the statutorily guaranteed right to bargain collectively, was deliberate, egregious, and pervasive, thrusting at the heart of the Act's purposes

[8] For this reason (in addition to the 8(a)(5) violation described above), it matters not that the three unlawfully discharged employees do not desire reinstatement, since, if no effective remedy is provided, Respondent will have succeeded in its deliberate flouting of the Act.

[9] Neither a bargaining demand (or petition) nor an 8(a)(5) violation is a prerequisite for a Gissel electionless bargaining order. Gissel, supra at 610 and 614.

and guarantees; that it had and will "have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes" (Gissel, supra at 614); that it was and continues to be of "'such a nature that [its] coercive effects cannot be eliminated by the application of traditional remedies, with the result that a fair and reliable election cannot be had'" (id. at 614); that, under the circumstances described and found, "the possibility of erasing the effects of [Respondent's] past practice and of ensuring a fair election . . . by the use of traditional remedies . . . is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order" (id. at 614–615); and that there is "insufficient indication that an election . . . would definitely be a more reliable test of the employees' desires than the card count taken before the unfair labor practice occurred" (id. at 616).[10]

An employer who discharges the entire bargaining unit because its members have designated a union to bargain collectively for them is hardly in a position to complain if required to bargain with the union without that fair election which it set out deliberately to abort by riding roughshod over its employees' rights and the law's requirements.[11] Respondent's current tongue-in-cheek protestation against an electionless Gissel bargaining order on the ground that it would deprive its present employees of the "free choice" of bargaining representative has a hollow ring, since it was Respondent itself who, by discharging all of its union employees, attempted to deprive them of that free choice through an uncoerced and fair election without unlawful interference on its part. Respondent's current argument, purportedly "seek[ing] to vindicate the rights of his employees" (Brooks v. NLRB, 348 U.S. 96, 103 (1954); see also Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, 374 F.2d 295, 308 (D.C. Cir. 1967), cert. denied 387 U.S. 942 (1967), who themselves seek no such "vindication," would be more appealing if Respondent had not deliberately terminated its union employees and replaced them with nonunion employees, thereby deranging the statutory election system by putting a heavy hand on the election scales. Respondent has changed the electorate to one of its own design. Its position is thus at odds with the principles enunciated by the Supreme Court 14 years ago in Gissel. Respondent's contention that it should no longer be required to bargain since, as a result of its unlawful discharge of the three employees here, it no longer employs any union personnel, smacks like that of the orphan who, convicted of murdering his parents, pleaded for mercy on the ground that he was a poor orphan. See Franks Bros. Co., supra at 704.

Accordingly, on Gissel principles as well as because of Respondent's flat-out violation of Section 8(a)(5), a bargaining order is warranted and required here, and should be issued.

In view of the serious, egregious nature of Respondent's violation, thrusting at "the very heart of the Act,"[12] Respondent should also be required to cease and desist from any violation of the Act.[13]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[14]

ORDER

The Respondents, Eli Gordon, Gerald Tillinger and Seymour Tillinger, a Copartnership, d/b/a Balsam Village Management Company, New York, New York, their agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging or encouraging membership in any labor organization by discharging, terminating, laying off, furloughing, suspending, failing to recall or reinstate or rehire, threatening so to do, or otherwise discriminating in regard to the hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment of any of its employees.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing any employee in the exercise of the right to self-organization; to form, join, or assist any labor organization; to bargain collectively through representatives of his or her own choosing; to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; or to refrain from any and all such activities.

2. Take the following affirmative actions necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make the following employees whole for any loss of pay (including overtime, holiday, and vacation pay, and insurance benefits and reimbursements if any), together with interest, in the manner set forth in "The Remedy" portion of the decision of which this Order forms a part:

Carlos Casal
Mario Aguila
Daniel Santos

(b) Forthwith expunge from the personnel and employment records of each of said employees all statements or references that they (or any of them) were terminated or laid off by Respondent for any work related fault, deficiency, or reason; refrain from so reporting to any employer, prospective employer, employment

[10] See also Amsterdam Wrecking & Salvage Co., 196 NLRB 113 (1972), enfd. 472 F.2d 153 (2d Cir. 1973); Medley Distilling Co., 187 NLRB 84 (1970), enfd. 453 F.2d 374 (6th Cir. 1971); Gibson Products Co., 185 NLRB 362 (1970).

[11] As has been pointed out, discriminatory discharge "goes to the very heart of the Act" (A. J. Krajewski Mfg. Co., 180 NLRB 1071 (1970)) and is the "surest method of undermining a union's majority or impeding an election process" (NLRB v. Sitton Tank Co., 467 F.2d 1371, 1372 (8th Cir. 1972)); and, accordingly, a bargaining order is on that basis alone warranted.

[14] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

agency, reference seeker, or credit or character inquiry, or that such action by Respondent was in any way related to any union or other lawful activity by any of said employees under the Act; and notify said employees in writing that such entries in Respondent's records have been expunged and that evidence of said terminations or layoffs will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) On request, bargain collectively in good faith with Local 32B–32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the following appropriate collective-bargaining unit, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment, and embody in a signed agreement any understanding reached:

> All building service employees, including porters, handymen and superintendents employed by Respondent at its Queens facility, exclusive of office clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

(e) Post at its premises at 88-15 133d Avenue, Borough and county of Queens, city and State of New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[15] Copies of said notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken to ensure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had the opportunity to present evidence and arguments, the National Labor Relations Board has decided that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act. We have therefore been ordered to post this notice and do what it says.

The National Labor Relations Act gives all employees these rights.

> To engage in self-organizaton
> To form, join, or help unions
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing
> To act together for collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection
> To refrain from any or all of these things.

WE WILL NOT violate these rights of yours.

WE WILL NOT terminate the employment of, discharge, lay off, suspend, or refuse to reinstate you, or threaten to do so, because you seek to bargain collectively with us, or because you join or apply for membership in, affiliate with, designate as bargaining representative, or act on behalf of or in sympathy with, any labor organization, or because you exercise or seek to exercise any right under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of your right to self-organization; to form, join, or assist any labor organization; to bargain collectively through representatives of your own choosing; to engage in concerted protected activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; or to refrain from any and all such activities.

WE WILL make whole the following employees for any wages and benefits lost by them because of their discharge by us on February 4, 1983, plus interest:

> Carlos Casal
> Mario Aguila
> Daniel Santos

WE WILL at once eliminate from our records all indications that any of the above employees was discharged or laid off for any deficiency in work performance, or for union membership or activity; WE WILL NOT so report to any employer, prospective employer, employment agency, or credit or character inquiry; WE WILL NOT use such terminations or layoffs as a basis for future personnel actions against said employees; and WE WILL so notify those employees in writing.

WE WILL, on request, recognize and bargain collectively with Local 32B–32J, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit, and embody in a signed agreement any understanding reached:

> All building service employees, including porters, handymen and superintendents employed by us at our Queens facility (Balsam Village), exclusive of office clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 28 March 1983 Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached decision. The Charging Parties and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Charging Parties filed a brief in answer to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions[1] and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 340, AFL–CIO, Sacramento, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard these consolidated cases in trial at Sacramento, California, on June 29 through July 12, 1982, and at San Francisco, California, on August 20, 1982. Thereafter, the record was reopened for one further day of trial on January 10, 1983. The cases arose as follows: Hulse Electric (Hulse) filed charges in Case 20–CB–5397 on August 17, 1981, against International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 340, AFL–CIO (Respondent or the Union). On October 15, May-Han Electric, d/b/a M & M Electric (M & M) filed charges in Case 20–CB–5441 against the Union. On October 30, the Acting Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing against Respondent in Case 20–CB–5397 (the Hulse case). Clint McCubbin, Inc. (McCubbin) filed a charge against the Union in Case 20–CB–5459 on November 13. On November 30, the Acting Regional Director issued a complaint and notice of hearing against Respondent in Case 20–CB–5441 (the M & M case). On December 1, the Acting Regional Director issued an order consolidating Cases 20–CB–5397 and 20–CB–5441 for purposes of hearing. On December 16, the Acting Regional Director issued a complaint against Respondent in Case 20–CB–5459 (the McCubbin case) and that same date ordered the McCubbin case to be consolidated for purposes of hearing with the Hulse and M & M cases. On December 17, Rex Moore Electrical Company (Rex Moore) filed a charge against the Union in Case 20–CB–5490 and thereafter Rex Moore filed the charges in Cases 20–CB–5502 and 20–CB–5504 on January 12 and 14, 1982, respectively. Amos J. Walker, Inc. (Walker) filed the charge in Case 20–CB–5509 against the Union on January 21, 1982. On January 29, the Acting Regional Director issued a consolidated complaint in Cases 20–CB–5490 and 20–CB–5502 (the first two Rex Moore cases) and that same date issued an order consolidating those two cases for trial with the three outstanding complaints. On February 22, the Regional Director issued a complaint in Case 20–CB–5504 (the third Rex Moore case) and that same date issued an order consolidating that case for trial with the outstanding complaints in the five prior cases. On February 26, the Regional Director issued a complaint in Case 20–CB–5509 (the Amos Walker case) and that same date issued an order consolidating that case for trial with the preceding six cases. Peters Electric Co. (Peters) filed a charge in Case 20–CB–5541 against the Union on March 2. Thereafter, on April 29, the Regional Director issued a complaint against the Union and an order consolidating that case with the preceding seven cases. On May 21, Rex Moore filed the charge in Case 20–CB–5593. On June 11, 1982,

[1] The Charging Parties excepted to the judge's alleged failure to find that the charges in Cases 20–CB–5459 and 20–CB–5502 were filed by the National Electrical Contractors Association (NECA) on behalf of the named employers. The formal documents reveal that NECA filed the charges. The complaints in those cases, however, state that Clint McCubbin, Inc. and Rex Moore Electrical Company were the Charging Parties. At the hearing the discrepancy was addressed, but no motion was made to amend the pertinent complaints. At this stage in the proceeding, we find it unnecessary to amend the complaints because the charges were filed on behalf of the named employers, and the interests of NECA were fully represented by counsel for the Charging Parties.

[2] In affirming the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's action had a representational purpose, we find it unnecessary to rely on his finding that the Respondent was bound by statements of various pickets. See fn. 27 of the judge's decision.

[3] Chairman Dotson and Member Dennis agree with the judge that the fines imposed against Dale Pettit, Don Verga, and Doyle McDaniel violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A). See Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984). In agreeing with his colleagues that these fines violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A), Member Zimmerman relies on the fact that the fines were for conduct which occurred after the employees had effectively resigned their membership.

We find no merit in the Respondent's contention that the principles of Typographical Union 101 (Washington Post), 242 NLRB 1079 (1979), are applicable in the circumstances of this case. See Electrical Workers IBEW Local 340 (Royal Electric), 271 NLRB 995 fn. 5 (1984). In agreeing with his colleagues that the Respondent's fines against the union members who were supervisors of employees with whom the Respondent had an ongoing labor dispute violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(B), Member Zimmerman relies solely on the adoption of the judge's conclusion that the fines were designed to deprive the employees of their supervisors.

the Acting Regional Director issued amendments to the outstanding complaints in Cases 20–CB–5502 and 20–CB–5504 (the second and third Rex Moore cases) and issued a complaint in Case 20–CB–5593 (the fourth Rex Moore case). That same date the Acting Regional Director issued an order consolidating all nine cases for trial. On June 17, the Regional Director issued a consolidated complaint against the Union in Cases 20–CC–2499 and 20–CC–2504 and an order consolidating those cases with the preceding nine cases for purposes of trial.[1] As mentioned earlier, the consolidated trial closed on August 20, 1982. Thereafter, on September 1, Rex Moore filed a charge in Case 20–CB–5651 and pursuant thereto on October 21 the Regional Director issued a complaint and notice of hearing. That same date, the General Counsel filed a motion to reopen the record and to consolidate Case 20–CB–5651 with the previously litigated nine cases. On November 15, having received no opposition to the General Counsel's motion, I issued an order granting the motion.[2] As mentioned earlier, the record was reopened on January 10, 1983, for the purpose of taking evidence in Case 20–CB–5651.[3]

The Issues

The principal questions presented for decision are:

1. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act when it levied fines against employees Dale Pettit (Hulse), Don Verga (Peters), and Doyle McDaniel (Peters) for having worked for nonsignatory employers.

2. Whether Robert Hogan (McCubbin), Curtis Watson (M & M), John Reese (Amos Walker), Gary Wheeler (Rex Moore), Ted Barlow (Rex Moore), Don Sutton (Rex Moore), Robert Slack (Rex Moore), and Francisco Orden (Rex Moore) were supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and representatives of their employers for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B).

3. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act by fining Hogan, Watson, Reese, Wheeler, Barlow, Sutton, Bailey, Zicarelli, Slack, and Orden.

All parties were given full opportunity to appear, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Based on the entire record, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after due consideration of the briefs filed on behalf of the parties, I make the following

Findings of Fact and Conclusions

I. Jurisdiction

The parties stipulated that during 1981 Hulse, Peters, Rex Moore, McCubbin, Amos Walker, and M & M, all electrical contractors doing business in the greater Sacramento, California area, have each purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from companies located outside the State of California. Accordingly, I find Hulse, Peters, Rex Moore, McCubbin, Amos Walker, and M & M, at all times material herein, have each been an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. The Labor Organization Involved

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent has been, at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. The Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

A. Background

National Electrical Contractors Association, Inc., Sacramento Valley Chapter (NECA) is an association of employers engaged in electrical contracting which has as one of its purposes the representation of its employer-members in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreements with various labor organizations. Respondent and NECA had a collective-bargaining relationship for approximately 40 years. The last collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and NECA expired May 31, 1981. On June 11, 1981, Respondent commenced a strike against the employers in the NECA multiemployer bargaining group, including Rex Moore, McCubbin, Peters, Amos Walker, and M & M.[4] On September 15, the Union sent NECA a disclaimer of interest which provided:

> On behalf of Local Union 340, IBEW, this letter shall serve as, and constitute a disclaimer of interest by IBEW Local Union 340 in representing, for purposes of collective bargaining or any other purpose, the employees of the multi-bargaining unit previously established and consisting of the employees of the employer-members of the Sacramento Valley Chapter, of the National Electrical Contractors Association, Inc., and other employers who have, from time to time, agreed to become part of the multi-employer bargaining unit. This disclaimer covers the employees covered by the Inside Wireman's Agreement, the Line Agreement, and the Material Handler's Agreement, and is intended to disclaim interest as to the multi-employer bargaining units or unit previously created by these three separate labor contracts.

[1] On August 20, 1982, at hearing, Respondent and the General Counsel reached agreement on a formal settlement disposing of all the allegations in Cases 20–CC–2499 and 20–CC–2504. On September 17, 1982, I issued an order approving the settlement stipulation over the objections of the Charging Party, Rex Moore. On October 20, the Board issued a Decision and Order approving the settlement stipulation and providing for an order consistent with the settlement.

[2] On January 5, 1983, I issued an order denying the General Counsel's motion to consolidate the complaint against Respondent in Case 20–CB–5717 with the instant consolidated cases. Case 20–CB–5717 was filed by an employer that was not involved in the instant hearing.

[3] References hereinafter to the complaint refer to all nine complaints viewed as a whole.

[4] At the time the strike commenced, there were approximately 55 employers in the NECA bargaining unit.

On September 25, the Union filed 17 representation petitions in individual employer units for 17 employers, formerly in the NECA bargaining unit, including Peters and M & M. The Regional Director administratively dismissed the 17 petitions on the basis that the appropriate bargaining unit was the multiemployer unit.[5] On August 12, 1982, the Board directed a hearing on the issue of the continued existence or viability of the multiemployer unit. The Board Order is reported as Arden Electric, 263 NLRB 318 (1982). The hearing in the representation cases closed on February 28, 1983, and the decision in that case is now pending before the Board.

During the strike, employee Dale Pettit was fined for working for Hulse on June 18, 1981. All the other fines occurred after the Union's disclaimer of September 15. The complaint alleges that Pettit, Don Verga, and Doyle McDaniel were fined in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) on the ground that they had effectively resigned their union membership prior to the conduct for which they were fined. The complaint alleges that the fines of Ted Barlow, Gary Wheeler, Don Sutton, Tim Bailey, Robert Slack, Dale Zicarelli, Francisco Orden, Curtis Watson, Rober Hogan, and John Reese violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) on the theory that all were natural and potential representatives of their employers for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances.

With respect to the 8(b)(1)(A) allegations, Respondent contends that the employees had not effectively resigned from union membership prior to engaging in the conduct for which they were fined. With respect to the 8(b)(1)(B) allegations, Respondent contends that the alleged supervisors did not possess the authority to bargain collectively or to adjust grievances and further that no violation could be found because the Union had previously disclaimed interest in representing the employees in the NECA multiemployer bargaining unit.

B. Employee Dale Pettit

Dale Pettit had been a member of IBEW Local Union 180 (a sister local of Respondent) in Vallejo, California, since approximately 1966. On June 16, 1981, Pettit had his wife, Valerie, type a letter to Local 180 stating that Pettit wished to resign his membership effective that same date. Valerie Pettit sent the letter by certified mail to Local 180 on June 16. On June 17, the Postal Service attempted to deliver the letter but was unable to do so. That same date a notice was left at Local 180's offices and on June 19 an official of Local 180 picked up Pettit's letter at the post office.

On June 18, Pettit was working for Hulse, a company against which the Union was on strike.[6] On that date, Al Romitti, a business representative for Respondent, visited the Hulse jobsite. Pettit told Romitti that he no longer belonged to the IBEW. Romitti answered that he was "sorry to hear it." Shortly thereafter, Romitti filed intraunion charges against Pettit, the substance of which provides:

> The alleged violation occurred on 6–18–81 at approximately 11:30 a.m., at Sycamore West Apartments, Covell and Sycamore and Alvarado Ave., Davis, California.
> The alleged violation occurred as follows: On entering the second cluster of apartments fronting Alvarado Ave. I observed Brother Petit [sic] installing electrical wall boxes. Upon further conversation I requested seeing his Union receipt and he stated he was not a member of the IBEW anymore. Upon returning to Local Union 340's office I received information to the contrary in that he is still a member of Local 180, IBEW. I also stated to Brother Petit that at this time Hulse Electric is not signatory to Local Union 340's agreement. Because of these violations, I feel Brother Petit has wronged the members of Local Union 340, IBEW.

On July 27, the Union's trial board conducted a meeting on the charges brought against Pettit by Romitti. Pettit did not attend the trial board meeting and was found in violation of the Union's bylaws and the IBEW's constitution. Pettit was fined a total of $12,020. The Union sent Pettit a letter on October 7 notifying him of the trial board's decision and fine.

C. Employees Don Verga and Doyle McDaniel

Don Verga had been a member of IBEW Local Union 234 in Castroville, California, since 1976. In November 1981, Verga called Ralph Gaines, a business agent for Local 234, and told Gaines that he had a job offer from Peters in Sacramento. Gaines invited Verga to talk about the matter that evening. Verga went to Gaines' home to talk about the job offer from Peters. Verga mentioned that the shop had a new union.[7] Gaines said that he had heard about the situation and suggested that Verga reconsider accepting the offer. Verga answered that he had been trying to get to the Sacramento area and that this job was a chance to do so. Verga then asked Gaines about obtaining a withdrawal from Local 234. Gaines said that Verga was not eligible for a withdrawal because Verga was still working in the trade. Verga then asked about quitting and Gaines said that Verga could not just quit. Finally, Gaines said that the only way Verga could get out of the Union was to quit paying dues. Verga then asked if his dues payments for November and December could be returned and Gaines answered no. Verga did not pay any further dues to Local 234 or to the IBEW.

Verga did not send a letter of resignation to Local 234. However, he sent a letter in November and again in [5] On October 1, NECA signed a collective-bargaining agreement with the National Association of Independent Unions (NAIU), which agreement purported to cover the electrician employees of the employers previously involved in the negotiations between NECA and Respondent.

[6] Hulse was not a member of the NECA multiemployer bargaining unit but had signed a "me-too" agreement binding it to the terms and conditions of the NECA-Union 1978–81 bargaining agreement. While some "me-too" employers signed interim agreements with the Union, Hulse signed no agreement after the expiration of the 1978–1981 contract.

[7] The new union was the NAIU which had signed a collective-bargaining agreement with NECA about October 1.

January 1982 resigning from his position as vice president of Local 234. Verga testified that he resigned as vice president in writing because the "book" (the constitution and bylaws) required him to do so. He further testified that, when he heard that his November resignation was not mentioned at the union meeting or to his employer, he sent another resignation in January.

Doyle McDaniel had been a member of Respondent since approximately 1951. In December 1981, McDaniel called Lee Frith, Respondent's business manager, and told Frith that he had to return to work after the first of the year. McDaniel asked what he had to do "in case I wanted to go to work as a plumber, electrician, a carpenter or ditchdigger, whatever I had to find a job—that I had to do so that I wouldn't cause any problems with the Union or anyone else." Frith told McDaniel to send in a letter of withdrawal. McDaniel then wrote Frith seeking to withdraw his union card effective January 6, 1982. On January 12, Frith wrote McDaniel acknowledging receipt of McDaniel's withdrawal letter. Frith sent two withdrawal forms to McDaniel: (1) a form entitled "honorary withdrawal" which provided, inter alia, that McDaniel forfeit 30 years of pension credits and his life insurance policy; and (2) a form entitled "participatory withdrawal" which provided, inter alia, that the employee was no longer working in the electrical trade and would reactivate his membership in the Union if he returned to the electrical trade.[8] McDaniel did not fill out either form or respond to Frith's letter in any other manner. McDaniel testified that he did not sign the honorary withdrawal because he did not wish to forfeit his pension and did not sign the participatory withdrawal because, as he was still working in the electrical trade, the form did not apply to him.

On January 19, 1982, Chuck Cake, a business agent for Respondent, visited the Peters jobsite where Verga and McDaniel were working. Cake first spotted Verga on the job and said, "I can't believe that you're up here." Verga and McDaniel then spoke with Cake. McDaniel asked Cake why the Union was bothering them when employees for other contractors, such as Foss Electric,[9] were working without interference from the Union. Cake said that the Foss situation was different and that Frith was working with Foss Electric. Cake said that he would have to cite both Verga and McDaniel. Cake said that, if the employees could get their boss, Dave Rubins, to sign an agreement, the intraunion charges would be dropped. Verga said that he would see what he could do. Later that same day, Cake again asked McDaniel to talk to Rubins about signing a contract. Cake said he would drop the charges if Rubins signed a contract.

Cake filed intraunion charges against both Verga and McDaniel for working for Peters on January 19. A trial board meeting on the charges against McDaniel was held on April 2, 1982. Before the trial, McDaniel spoke with Cake. Cake had been unsuccessful in attempting to get Rubins to sign a contract[10] and told McDaniel that the Union would continue to process the charges. At the trial board meeting, McDaniel pleaded not guilty to all the charges on the ground that he was no longer a union member. A trial board member said that McDaniel could not withdraw but had to resign. McDaniel argued that Frith had never mentioned resignation and that he thought he had done everything necessary to free himself from the Union.

The trial board meeting on the charges against Verga was held on April 5. Just prior to seeing the trial board, Verga told Cake that Rubins would not talk about a contract until the charges against Verga and McDaniel were dropped. Cake again said that, if Rubins would sign a contract, the charges against Verga and McDaniel would be dropped. At the trial board meeting, Verga told the board members about his conversation with Gaines and that it was his belief that he had resigned from union membership.

On April 12, the Union's trial board found both Verga and McDaniel guilty of performing bargaining unit work for Peters. McDaniel was fined $11,604 and Verga was fined $19,287.20. However, on June 15, the fines against both McDaniel and Verga were rescinded by the trial board on the ground that the trial board hearings were untimely.

The Union concedes that its constitution places no restrictions on a member's ability to resign. However, Frith testified that it is the Union's policy that a written resignation is read at the next regular union meeting and that the resignation becomes effective the last day of the month in which the meeting was held, provided that the member's dues are paid through the month the resignation is submitted, the member is not indebted to the Union, and there are no pending charges in the Union against the member. According to Frith, the Union enforces this policy by letter to each individual who wants to resign. However, McDaniel, the only member of Respondent involved in this aspect of the case, did not receive such a letter. Verga and Pettit were members of other locals and there is no evidence of any restrictions on their ability to resign.

D. Conclusions Regarding 8(b)(1)(A) Issues

It is well settled that Section 7 of the Act guarantees to employees the right to resign from a labor organization. Marlin Rockwell Corp., 114 NLRB 553, 561–562 (1955). Section 8(b)(1)(A) protects such rights by making it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization "to restrain or coerce . . . employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7."

The right of a union to fine an employee for violating a union rule and, therefore, escape the prohibition of Section 8(b)(1)(A) is dependent upon whether the employee has lawfully resigned his union membership. As the Supreme Court stated in Granite State:[11]

[8] Both the honorary and participatory withdrawals were not available to an employee who wished to continue working in the trade.

[9] The Union had agreed with Foss Electric that Foss employees, represented by the Union, could return to work about September 28, 1981. About February 12, 1982, Foss Electric signed a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. Prior to October 1981, Foss Electric had been party to the NECA-Union negotiations.

[10] Rubins, the owner of Peters, testified that, in late January or early February, Cake attempted to have him sign a contract with the Union. Rubins told Cake that Peters was a member of NECA and was not free to sign with the Union. Cake insisted that Rubins could sign but Rubins refused to do so.

> Where a member lawfully resigns from a union and thereafter engages in conduct which the union rule proscribes, the union commits an unfair labor practice when it seeks enforcement of fines for that conduct. That is to say, when there is a lawful dissolution of a union-member relation, the union has no more control over the former member than it has over the man in the street.

See also Machinists Local 405 v. NLRB, 412 U.S. 84 (1973).

Where a union's constitution and bylaws are silent as to resignation, a member is free to resign at will. Granite State, supra; Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423 (1969); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 66 (Houston Lighting), 262 NLRB 483 (1982). Inherent in the union-member relationship is a duty on the part of the union to inform its members of any constitutional limitations placed on their statutory right to resign union membership. Teamsters Local 439 (Loomis Courier), 237 NLRB 220, 223 (1978).

The legality of the instant fines depends primarily upon two issues: (1) whether the individuals effectively resigned their memberships in the Union, and (2) whether they were fined for postresignation conduct.

1. The fine of Dale Pettit

It is undisputed that Pettit sent a letter of resignation on June 16 to Respondent's sister local in Vallejo. On June 17, unable to deliver the letter, the Postal Service left a notice of attempted delivery. On June 19, an official of Local 180 picked up the letter. Pettit was fined for conduct which occurred on June 18. Thus, the issue is when did Pettit's resignation become effective.

The Board has held that, when a letter of resignation is mailed to a union, the resignation is not effective until it is received by the union. Communications Workers Local 6135 (Southwestern Bell), 188 NLRB 971 (1971); Broadcast Employees NABET Local 531 (Skateboard Products), 245 NLRB 638, 645 (1979).[12] There is no case dealing directly with the question of whether actual receipt is required. However, the Board has applied a presumption of receipt in cases where there was no evidence of actual receipt. See, e.g., Hendricks-Miller Typographic Co., 240 NLRB 1082, 1098 (1979); Auto Workers Local 1384 (Ex-Cell-O Corp.), 219 NLRB 729 (1975); Machinists District 99 (General Electric), 194 NLRB 938, 944–945 (1972). In Hendricks-Miller, supra, the Board held that the resignation letter was effective upon receipt notwithstanding that the union agent never saw the letter and was unable to locate it for the unfair labor practice hearing. In the present case, no presumption of delivery is required as the record reveals delivery on June 17. The fact that Local 180 did not pick up the letter until June 19 should not affect Pettit's rights. It appears no different than if Local 180 chose not to read the letter until June 19. Moreover, there is no evidence as to what date Local 180 considered the effective date of Pettit's resignation.[13] Under these circumstances, I find that Pettit's resignation was effective as of the close of business on June 17. Since Pettit was fined for conduct which took place on June 18, it appears that the entire fine levied against him was based on postresignation conduct. Accordingly, I find that by such conduct Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A).

2. The fine of Don Verga

It is undisputed that Verga told Ralph Gaines of Local 234 that he wished to quit that union. Gaines said Verga could quit by simply not paying dues. Verga paid no further dues. Verga's letters of November 1981 and January 1982 stated that he wished to resign as union vice president. Those letters made no mention of resigning from union membership.

Absent lawful restrictions to the contrary, in order for an employee to effectively resign from membership, it is only necessary that he "clearly indicate that he no longer wishes to be bound by the union." Houston Lighting, supra; Distillery Workers Local 80 (Capitol-Husting), 235 NLRB 1264 (1978). Thus, the Board has held oral resignations to be effective. See, e.g., Carpenters Local 1233 (Polk Construction), 231 NLRB 756, 761 (1977); Communications Workers Local 1127 (New York Telephone), 208 NLRB 258, 262–263 (1974). Further, inartful demands to "withdraw" from the union have been found by the Board to be sufficient on the ground that they clearly conveyed the intent to resign. Capitol-Husting, supra. See also Polk Construction, supra at 758–761.

In this case, Verga clearly indicated his intent to quit and acted consistently with Gaines' instruction that the only way to quit was to stop paying dues. While Verga's resignation from union office is misleading, there is no evidence to contradict Verga's testimony that the book required a written resignation of union office. There is no contention that a written resignation from membership was required. Further, neither Gaines nor any other official of Local 234 testified that Verga did not resign membership in Local 234 prior to January 19, 1982. Accordingly, I find that Verga effectively resigned from Local 234 in November 1981, and in any event no later than December 1981, the last month for which he had paid dues. Accordingly, Respondent's fine of Verga for his postresignation conduct of January 1982 violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

3. The fine of Doyle McDaniel

In December 1981, McDaniel called Frith and asked what he had to do to go back to work without having [11] NLRB v. Textile Workers Local 1029, Granite State Joint Board, 409 U.S. 213, 217 (1972).

[12] In cases where the resignation is mailed to the union, the resignation is effective at the close of business on the date of receipt. American Nurses' Assn., 250 NLRB 1324, 1329 (1980). However, where personal delivery was made, the Board found the resignation to be effective immediately. Skateboard Products, supra.

[13] The General Counsel apparently concedes Respondent's authority to fine members of sister locals. The General Counsel's allegations are based on the contention that the members had effectively resigned their union membership prior to engaging in the conduct for which they were fined.

any problems with the Union. Frith told McDaniel to send in a letter of withdrawal. About January 6, 1982, McDaniel followed Frith's instructions. However, on January 12, Frith wrote McDaniel acknowledging receipt of the withdrawal letter but enclosing two different withdrawal forms, neither of which satisfied McDaniel's needs. McDaniel took no further action to resign or withdraw from the Union and was fined for work on January 17 for Peters.

As mentioned earlier, a union has a duty to inform its members of any constitutional limitations placed upon their statutory right to resign union membership. McDaniel asked Frith what he had to do so that he could work without any union problems. Frith told McDaniel that he only had to withdraw and McDaniel followed those instructions. Frith made no mention of resignation and, accordingly, McDaniel did not use the word resignation. However, McDaniel clearly indicated to Frith his intention to be free of the Union's restrictions. There was no need for McDaniel to fill out any further form.

Respondent's defense appears to be that McDaniel mentioned withdrawal but not resignation. However, McDaniel clearly indicated his intention to be free of union discipline. Frith had a duty to notify McDaniel of the restrictions on withdrawals. Instead, Frith contributed to McDaniel's inartful attempt at resignation.[14] Frith never denied McDaniel's testimony that McDaniel indicated a desire to go back to work without union restriction. Under the authorities cited above, McDaniel's conversation with Frith would constitute a sufficient oral resignation. In any event, McDaniel's letter of withdrawal complied with Frith's instructions as to what McDaniel had to do to free himself from the Union's rules. Frith and Respondent cannot now contend otherwise. Thus, I find that McDaniel had effectively resigned from the Union prior to the conduct on January 19 for which he as fined. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by fining McDaniel for postresignation conduct.

Although the fines of Verga and McDaniel were rescinded in June 1982, I find that the violation of the Act has not been repudiated. The fines were rescinded on the ground that the trial board's action was untimely. However, the Union took no action which would minimize the threat to the employees that the Union sought to restrict their postresignation conduct. It is the threat that is the core of cases involving postresignation discipline. See Electrical Workers IBEW Local 2131 (Rucker Co.), 217 NLRB 46, 47 (1975); Typographical Union 18 (Northwest Publications), 172 NLRB 2173 (1968).

E. Curtis Watson, Superintendent for M & M

1. Supervisory status

Curtis Watson has been employed by M & M since May 1979. In the fall of 1981, Watson was employed by M & M as a superintendent. M & M specializes in underground electrical work, i.e., traffic signals, street lighting, tennis courts, and ball parks. Approximately 65 percent of M & M's electrical work is traffic light work. Watson is the superintendent responsible for all of M & M's traffic light jobsites. Each project has a foreman who reports to Watson. Watson determines the foreman for each job and the size of the work crew. His duties include transferring men from site to site, including non-traffic light jobs. Watson transfers employees due to changes in the workload and has also transferred employees due to personality problems between workmen and the foremen on jobsites. On at least one occasion Watson fired an employee. Watson's recommendations for promotions of journeymen electricians to foremen are followed by Ross Price, general superintendent in charge of field operations, as a matter of course. Finally, Watson testified that he resolved at least two complaints by union business agents: one involving work jurisdiction and the other involving hiring procedures.

Based on the foregoing facts, I find that Curtis Watson is now, and has been at all times material herein, a supervisor of M & M within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. I further find that Watson was a representative of M & M for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. See Painters District Council 36 (Brown & Co.), 259 NLRB 808, 810 (1981).

2. The union discipline

Watson has been a member of a sister local of Respondent for approximately 30 years. Watson did not work for M & M during the strike but returned to M & M on September 21, after the Union's disclaimer letter.[15] On September 24, two union members observed Watson on an M & M jobsite helping some laborers with certain work which the laborers were having trouble performing. That same date the two members filed an intraunion charge with Respondent alleging that Watson was "working for an employer who has been on strike for 15 Weeks. [Watson] was working with five (5) laborers." Approximately 1 week later, M & M and the Union agreed that M & M's union workers could return to work.[16]

On November 2, Respondent's trial board conducted a trial on the charge brought against Watson. Watson explained that on the date in question he was acting in a supervisory capacity. He further argued that he was helping the Union by showing the futility of having laborers do the electrical work and that he was attempting to convince M & M to sign an agreement. At least one of the board members argued that M & M would not have held out so long without Watson's help. In addition, Watson presented a letter from M & M contending [14] There is no contention that Frith explained Respondent's restriction on resignation, i.e., that resignations were effective on the last day of the month of the union meeting at which the resignation was read.

[15] Prior to the disclaimer letter, M & M had been party to the NECA-Union multiemployer bargaining.

[16] On September 25, the Union filed a representation petition seeking to represent M & M's employees in a single employer unit. As mentioned earlier, the Union filed 16 other representation petitions on that date. About September 28, the Union agreed that M & M's electrician employees could return to work. About February 12, 1982, Respondent and M & M signed a collective-bargaining agreement.

that the fine was invalid and stating that Watson "works in a supervisory position with authority to hire and fire, promote and discipline employees." There was no mention at the trial of the Union's September 15 disclaimer. By letter dated November 4, Watson was notified that he had been found guilty of the charges against him and was fined $3,921.60 ($2000 of which was suspended on condition that no similar violations occur for a period of 5 years).

F. Robert Hogan, Estimator for McCubbin

1. Supervisory status

Robert Hogan has been employed as an estimator by McCubbin for approximately 7 years. Hogan does approximately 99 percent of all the estimating for McCubbin's construction contracting. As estimator, Hogan has full responsibility for doing a complete "take-off" on a proposed job, i.e., estimating how much material, labor, and time would be needed to accomplish the proposed job. Once McCubbin is awarded a job, Hogan is responsible for ordering material, scheduling the job, coordinating with the general contractor, and going over the plans for the electrical work with the general contractor, owner, and/or government agency. Once a job is begun, Hogan is responsible for overseeing the progress of the job, ordering materials, scheduling, and billing. Hogan usually spends 1 day a week visiting jobsites and the other 4 days working in the office.

Hogan and Clint McCubbin, president of the Company, jointly determine who will be foreman for a job. The foreman has the authority to adjust minor disputes on the job, deal with safety problems, and send employees home due to inclement weather. However, if the foremen have any problems in these areas, they call Hogan or Clint McCubbin. The foremen determine how many men are needed for their crew and relay this information to Hogan. Hogan and Clint McCubbin then fill the foremen's needs. Hogan approves foremen's requests to lay off and/or transfer employees to other jobsites. Hogan hires employees, usually in consultation with McCubbin, and fires employees. Finally, Hogan has dealt with union officials concerning working conditions on McCubbin jobsites and on at least one occasion, after consultation with Clint McCubbin, resolved a union grievance by agreeing to pay certain moneys claimed by a sister local of Respondent.

Based on the foregoing facts, I find that Robert Hogan is now, and has been at all times material herein, a supervisor of McCubbin within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. I further find that Hogan was a natural and potential representative of McCubbin for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.[17]

2. The union discipline

Hogan joined Respondent in March 1951. In approximately 1976, the Union notified Hogan that he was a member of management and could no longer participate in the Union's health and welfare, pension, and vacation programs. Thereafter, Hogan was covered by McCubbin's health and retirement plans for its nonunion personnel. However, in order to continue teaching for the Joint Apprentice Training Committee, he continued to pay dues to the Union. Hogan paid dues but not working assessments paid by full members. Thus, Hogan remained an "inactive" member of the Union.

On September 25, 1981, Robert Gately, a member of the Union, observed Hogan working with prints and a ruler on one of McCubbin's jobsites and filed charges with the Union against Hogan. Hogan had been measuring the wiring on that jobsite because it was a state job and McCubbin was paid by the linear foot for work completed. Hogan has not worked with the tools of the trade for over 20 years. On one occasion in October, he was spotted by a union member showing nonunion employees how to properly bend pipes. On November 2, the Union held a trial board meeting on the charges against Hogan.

Hogan attended the trial board meeting and pleaded not guilty to the charges against him. Hogan explained to the trial board that in 1976 the Union had notified him that he was part of management and could not participate in the Union's benefit plans. He said that he had been an inactive member since 1976. Hogan explained that he was not doing electrical work but was measuring for billing purposes on the date that he was cited. He further explained that he was not bending pipe as a workman but was teaching employees of McCubbin how to bend pipe. One of the trial board members, Gary Peterson, suggested that McCubbin could hire back Respondent's members. Hogan said he did not know how that could be done and Peterson said that the Union could file a petition as it did with Collins Electric and that McCubbin could have the same deal as Collins Electric.[18] Notwithstanding the Union's disclaimer of September 15, the trial board asserted that the Union was on strike against McCubbin. By letter dated November 5, Hogan was informed that he was found guilty and fined $2000 ($1000 of which was suspended on the condition that no similar violations occur for a period of 5 years).

G. John Reese, Project Superintendent for Walker

1. Supervisory status

John Reese has been employed by Walker for approximately 14 years. Reese has been project superintendent since October 1981. Prior to that time, Reese was a foreman. As project superintendent, Reese reports to either [17] The fact that Clint McCubbin has final authority on matters involving collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances does not change the result herein. Ultimate authority cannot be a prerequisite to supervisory or representative status, since in every corporation ultimate authority is vested in the board of directors. Cf. Bentley Hedges Travel Service, 263 NLRB 1408, 1412 (1982) (a case involving managerial status).

[18] The Union filed a petition seeking to represent Collins Electric's employees on September 25. Shortly thereafter, Collins Electric's union employees returned to work. Collins Electric signed an agreement with the Union in February 1982. However, no petition was filed for McCubbin's employees and McCubbin honored the October 1, NECA-NAIU multiemployer bargaining agreement.

Amos Walker, president, or Ray Roberts, estimator and designer.

Reese did not work for Walker during the Union's strike from June until September 1981. In October, he was hired by Amos Walker as a project superintendent.[19] Amos Walker gave Reese the authority to hire and fire employees and the overall responsibility for jobs under his supervision. In October, Reese was given the responsibility for approximately five jobs then in progress. Each job had its own foreman.

Once Walker is awarded a job, Reese has the responsibility of determining the material, equipment, and labor requirements of the job. He decides how many employees will be needed and chooses the job foreman. Once the job is begun, Reese continues to work with the general contractor and the foreman to monitor material, equipment, and labor requirements. Reese, rather than the foremen, authorizes overtime and transfers and/or lays off workers. The foremen notify Reese of changes in labor requirements and Reese hires, transfers, or lays off employees to meet those requirements. Reese has the authority to discipline and to discharge employees, which authority he has exercised on several occasions. Personnel and safety problems on the jobsites are usually handled by the foremen. However, if the foremen cannot resolve the problems, Reese is called in "like a fireman" to "put out the fires." Reese was involved in one grievance by the NAIU concerning an employee who had been fired by Reese. Reese met with an NAIU official to give his side of the story. That dispute has not been resolved at the time of the instant hearing.

Reese testified that he performs journeyman's work approximately 20 percent of the time. Richard Earl, a member of Respondent who filed the intraunion charges against Reese, testified that Reese spent 50 percent of his time performing journeyman electrician's work on a certain job in Sacramento. However, Earl admitted that he only observed Reese for brief periods and that the two men rarely worked in the same area.[20] Accordingly, I credit Reese's testimony that he performed such work only 20 percent of the time.

Based on the foregoing facts, I find that John Reese is now, and has been at all times material herein, a supervisor of Walker within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. I further find that since October 1 Reese has been a natural and potential representative of Walker for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. The fact that Reese performs journeyman electrician's work approximately 20 percent of the time does not detract from his representative status. See Carpenters (Skippy Enterprises), 211 NLRB 222, 225–226 (1974), enfd. 532 F.2d 47, 53 (7th Cir. 1976).

[19] Reese did not return to work for Walker until after the Union's disclaimer. Walker had been party to the NECA-Union negotiations and after the disclaimer Walker became party to the NECA-NAIU agreement of October 1.

[20] Earl was employed by another contractor on the same jobsite.

2. The union discipline

As mentioned earlier, Richard Earl filed charges against Reese which provided, inter alia:

> During the morning of 10/23/81 I observed John Reese installing and performing electrical work for Amos Walker Electric. With these actions I feel he has violated his contract and oath to the IBEW and has wronged other members.

The trial board meeting was held on December 7, 1981, but Reese did not attend. Business Agent Cake stated at the trial board meeting that Reese had told Cake that Reese was a journeyman and not a foreman. At the instant hearing, Cake testified that, as far as Cake and the Union were concerned, all foremen and superintendents continued to be journeymen. By letter dated December 9, Reese was notified that he had been found guilty of all charges and fined $5000.

H. The Superintendents and Foremen of Rex Moore

1. The supervisory hierarchy

Rex Moore had been party to the NECA-Union collective-bargaining agreement. In June 1981, when the Union commenced its strike, Rex Moore continued its Sacramento operations with replacement employees.[21] After the strike, Rex Moore's business increased. The combination of the hiring of strike replacements and the increased number of worksites caused Rex Moore to establish a new chain of command for the supervision of its construction projects.

The president and general manager of Rex Moore is Steven Moore. Under Steven Moore's supervision are Rodney Weckworth, vice president for construction and engineering, and two superintendents, Gary Wheeler and Ted Barlow. After the strike, Wheeler and Barlow were each promoted from foreman to superintendent. Wheeler and Barlow have responsibility for all the Company's construction jobs and maintenance jobs, including authority over the job foremen and electrical workers. Generally, Wheeler has authority over in-town projects and maintenance contracts and Barlow has authority on out-of-town projects. However, to even out the workload, Barlow has some in-town projects. Combined, Barlow and Wheeler have the responsibility of 50–60 jobs.

In November 1981, Rex Moore set up a new organizational structure to deal with the supervision problems created by the increase in its business and the change in its employee complement.[22] On December 2, Steven Moore held a meeting of the Company's managerial and supervisorial personnel, including Barlow and Wheeler and all its current and "potential" foremen. The two superintendents and all of the foremen and potential foremen were given written job descriptions. Steven Moore informed the foremen that problems and grievances should be funneled through the superintendents. Wheeler and Barlow told the foremen that foremen were to handle as many problems as possible on the job and only bring the larger, more difficult problems to the superintendents. Don Sutton, Tim Bailey, and Dale Zicarelli, foremen at issue in this case, were present at the meeting. Francisco Orden and Robert Slack were not hired until February and March 1982, respectively.

[22] In October, after the signing of the NECA-NAIU agreement, Rex Moore adopted that agreement and its strike replacements became NAIU members.

Wheeler and Barlow are responsible for every aspect of every Rex Moore project, including both construction and maintenance jobs. Wheeler and Barlow decide which one of them will be superintendent for the job and they jointly choose the foreman. When a project is first begun, Wheeler, Barlow, Moore, Weckworth, the estimator, and the foreman meet for a prejob conference. At the conference, a prejob agenda is developed, a copy of which is given to the foreman and the superintendent. Next the superintendent and foreman will go to the jobsite and discuss the plans and the material, equipment, and manpower needs. They will also discuss scheduling with the general contractor's representatives.

Wheeler and Barlow visit jobsites approximately once a week. On such occasions, the superintendent takes a "job walk" with the foreman to check on the progress of the job, including the quality of work, amount of work, materials, and any deviations from the plans. The superintendent and foreman fill out a project inspection checklist for each visit which covers, in detail, every aspect of the project, including labor costs and personnel problems. Every other Friday, the checklist for each job is reviewed by Barlow, Wheeler, Weckworth, and Steven Moore at their production meeting.

Wheeler has similar duties with regard to the Company's three large maintenance contracts. However, less supervision of the foreman is required on maintenance jobs because of the direct day-to-day contact between the foreman and the management of the facility.

As indicated earlier, if personnel problems arise on the job, the responsibility falls to the foreman. If the foreman cannot resolve the dispute then he will go to the superintendent for a resolution. Wheeler and Barlow have the authority to discharge, lay off, and transfer employees. Wheeler and Barlow have the responsibility of dealing with unions on the job about contract disputes or other grievances. On Barlow's out-of-town jobs, he has been involved in several disputes with sister locals of Respondent.

In general, all of Rex Moore's supervisors have the same authority. However, certain foremen are permitted more discretion based on the superintendent's confidence in that foreman. On the Company's construction jobs, the foremen have the day-to-day responsibility of running the jobs. The foremen request the number of men needed on the job. The superintendents then transfer men from other jobs or hire new employees. The superintendents attempt to transfer men to other jobs and, if there is no place for transfer, they have employees laid off. However, it is the foremen who choose which employees to transfer or lay off. The foremen can also request employees by name or by skill. The foremen have the authority to fire employees on the spot for misconduct. Moreover, the foremen have responsibility for the safety on their jobs and conduct safety meetings with their crews. The foremen have the authority to grant time off and recommend employees for promotions or raises. Finally, the foremen have the authority to deal with union representatives concerning problems on the job; however, if the resolution of the problem involves a lot of money, the problem is referred to the superintendent.

2. Gary Wheeler and Ted Barlow

As mentioned earlier, Wheeler and Barlow are superintendents who, combined, have 50–60 jobs under their supervision. Their duties include the supervision of foremen. They are involved in the resolution of job problems which cannot be resolved by their foremen, including labor-management disputes. There can be no doubt that Wheeler and Barlow are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and employer representatives for purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B).

Barlow has been employed by Rex Moore for approximately 13 years. At the time of the strike, he was employed as a foreman. In October, Barlow was rehired as a superintendent. Charges were filed against Barlow for working on December 10, 1981, for Rex Moore. The charge alleged:

> Theodore Barlow has been a member of the IBEW for 23 years and has not terminated his contract with the IBEW. He has not furthered the purposes of the IBEW and has sacrificed its interest in the following manner—working for a contractor who is not signatory to an IBEW agreement with Local Union 340. Barlow has wronged the other members of the IBEW by causing economic harm.

On February 1, 1982, the Union's trial board held a meeting on the charge against Barlow but Barlow did not attend. At the trial board meeting it was mentioned that Barlow was not the foreman on the job but was overseeing the foreman. There was no discussion of the Union's disclaimer of September 15. By letter dated February 9, Barlow was notified that he had been found guilty and fined $2978.

Respondent's business agent Romitti filed the charges against Wheeler for working for an employer "who is no longer signatory to an IBEW agreement with Local 340." On January 18, 1982, the Union's trial board met to consider the charges against Wheeler but Wheeler did not attend the meeting. The trial board discussion revealed that on that date Wheeler crossed a union picket line to visit the job.[23] It was further discussed that prior to the strike Wheeler had been a foreman. By letter dated February 4, Wheeler was notified that he had been found guilty and fined $6500.

[23] The Union was picketing Rex Moore with picket signs alleging that Rex Moore did not pay prevailing wages.

3. Francisco Orden

Francisco Orden first went to work for Rex Moore in 1971. In 1974, he became a foreman and continued to work as a foreman until the strike in June 1981. In February 1982, Orden was rehired by Steven Moore, Weckworth, Wheeler, and Barlow as a foreman. Orden accepted the job on condition that he would not be required to work with the tools of the trade.

On his return to Rex Moore, Orden first became foreman for a job under the supervision of Barlow. Orden had from five to seven men working under his supervision. Because Orden was not familiar with the men then working for Rex Moore, Barlow helped Orden choose the men to be hired for this job. Orden determined the number of men needed and ordered the materials for the job. Orden did not fire any employees on this job but did lay off one employee due to a lack of work.

In March 1982, Orden became foreman of a warehouse job at which he supervised a crew of five or six employees. Three employees were transferred to this job from Orden's former job and Orden hired an additional two or three employees. Four weeks later, Orden was transferred to another jobsite for Rex Moore. In May 1982, Orden became a project manager. Orden hired Tim Bailey to be foreman over a crew of 7 to 10 men on one aspect of the job. Orden requested a crew of employees that had previously worked with Bailey on another jobsite. This crew was transferred over a period of time from other Rex Moore jobsites. Thereafter, Orden hired an additional foreman. Initially, Orden reported directly to Wheeler for this job. However, due to the press of work, after a period of approximately 1 month, Orden began to skip Wheeler and report directly to Steven Moore. Orden would show the foremen in detail what work he wanted done and the priority of work. The foremen would then lay out the work for their crews. The direct supervision of the workmen was left to the foremen. The foremen had the responsibility of adjusting minor problems on the job, such as personality conflicts. If the foremen could not resolve such problems, they would be brought to Orden. On one occasion, after an employee had a personality conflict with two different foremen, Orden fired the employee. On another occasion, Orden fired an employee who had been given two warnings by Bailey. Orden testified that neither he nor his foremen had any responsibility regarding Rex Moore's collective-bargaining agreement.

About June 4, 1982, Charles Lux, a member of Respondent, filed a charge against Orden for "working for an employer who is no longer signatory to an IBEW agreement with Local Union 340." On July 19, a trial board meeting was held on these charges, but Orden did not attend. By letter dated July 26, Orden was notified that he had been fined $10,108.

4. Tim Bailey, Don Sutton, Robert Slack, and Dale Zicarelli

Tim Bailey was hired by Rex Moore in August 1981 as a general foreman. As general foreman, Bailey instructed his crew on what was expected of them on a daily basis. Bailey kept a record of each workman's time and a job journal. Bailey was also responsible for ordering the materials on the job. Bailey worked closely with the engineers on the jobsite. Based on the workload, Bailey would call Wheeler for additional workmen. When the workload eased, Bailey would call Wheeler to find out whether men should be transferred to other jobs or laid off. On at least one occasion, Bailey resolved a complaint from two employees by assigning the employees to a different area of the jobsite. Bailey recommended employees for raises. Bailey had two employees transferred to another jobsite because they were not capable of performing certain work. Bailey authorized overtime and also sent men home early because of inclement weather.

On February 24, 1982, Cake filed charges against Bailey for working on February 24 "for an employer who is no longer signatory to an IBEW agreement with Local Union 340." Bailey did not attend the Union's trial board meeting of April 26. By letter dated May 4, Bailey was notified that he had been fined $9604 for "performing bargaining unit work while employed by Rex Moore Electric."

Don Sutton was hired by Weckworth in October 1981 as a foreman for an office building jobsite. Although Sutton had a smaller crew than most foremen, there was testimony that Sutton had the same authority as the other foremen. In addition, there was testimony that Sutton made various changes in the plans for his jobs. On several occasions, Sutton called Wheeler to have particular employees transferred or laid off. Sutton terminated one employee. On one occasion, employees under Sutton's supervision complained about a safety problem. Sutton went to the general contractor's superintendent and had the problem taken care of.

About April 8, 1982, Cake filed charges against Sutton for "working for an employer who is no longer signatory to an IBEW agreement with Local Union 340." On May 17, the trial board held a meeting on these charges but Sutton did not attend. On May 26, Sutton was notified that he was fined $10,640 for "performing bargaining unit work while employed by Rex Moore Electric."

Robert Slack began working for Rex Moore in March 1982 as a foreman. Slack was hired by Wheeler to be a foreman on a job in downtown Sacramento. Wheeler hired the crew for the job. Slack's crew varied in size from 5 to 11 workmen. Slack had the authority to assign work and transfer and discipline workmen, including discharge. On this particular job, Dan Strain was also a foreman for a separate work crew. Slack and Strain transferred men between their crews depending on the press of work. The job walks were done by Wheeler with the two foremen, Slack and Strain.

On April 8, Cake filed intraunion charges against Slack for "working for an employer who is no longer signatory to an IBEW agreement with Local Union 340." On May 17, the Union's trial board held a meeting on these charges. Slack attended the meeting and was questioned about his work for Rex Moore. Slack denied that he was a foreman and told the trial board members that he was not training other employees.[24] During the meeting Cake said "if Rex Moore couldn't get qualified people maybe Rex Moore wouldn't be in the position that he's in right now and maybe he could be coming back knocking at our door." On May 26, Slack was notified that he was found guilty of "performing bargaining unit work while employed by Rex Moore Electric" and fined $10,640.

Dale Zicarelli did not testify at the instant hearing. Zicarelli was a foreman for Rex Moore at a maintenance jobsite known as the Almond Growers' facility. The evidence indicates that Zicarelli had the same authority as the other Rex Moore foremen. Zicarelli reported to Wheeler on that job but worked closely with the facility's engineers. Zicarelli had the authority to determine the number of men needed and to direct the crew in its work. Zicarelli laid off and transferred employees. Further, Zicarelli recommended employees for promotion and raises.

On December 22, Cake filed an intraunion charge against Zicarelli for working at the Almond Growers' facility for Rex Moore. The trial board meeting was held on February 1, 1982, but Zicarelli did not attend. The trial board members noted that Zicarelli had an honorary withdrawal from another IBEW local. On February 9, the Union notified Zicarelli that he had been found guilty of "performing bargaining unit work while employed by Rex Moore Electric Company" and fined $3000.

I. Conclusions Regarding the Foremen of Rex Moore

As mentioned earlier, Wheeler and Barlow, the superintendents, are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and employer representatives for purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. The issue is closer with regard to the foremen.

Section 2(11) of the Act states:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

The possession of any one of the authorities specified in Section 2(11) is sufficient to place an employee in the supervisory class. Ohio Power Co. v. NLRB, 176 F.2d 385, 387 (6th Cir. 1949), cert. denied 338 U.S. 899 (1949); Fair Lady, Inc., 211 NLRB 189 (1974).

On the other hand, the legislative history of Section 2(11) indicates that Congress intentionally distinguished between "straw bosses, leadmen, set-up men, and other minor supervisory employees, on the one hand, and the supervisor vested with such genuine management prerogatives as the right to hire or fire, discipline, or make effective recommendations with respect to such action. Thus, a leadman or straw boss may give minor orders or directives or supervise the work of others, but he is not necessarily a part of management and a 'supervisor' within the Act." 263 NLRB 380, 385 (1982), citing NLRB v. Doctor's Hospital of Modesto, 489 F.2d 772, 776 (9th Cir. 1973). The critical issue herein is whether the foremen exercised independent judgment in performing supervisory duties in the interest of their employer.

The Rex Moore foremen physically lay out the work for their crews and assign employees to various tasks. The foremen transfer or lay off employees when the workload requires such action. While the superintendent determines whether transfer or layoff is required, it is the foreman who determines which employees will remain with the job and which will be transferred or laid off. The foremen have the authority to discipline employees, including transfer, layoff, and discharge. The foremen effectively recommend pay increases and promotion. The foremen resolve such employee problems as safety, personality conflicts, requests for different assignments, and requests for time off. Superintendents Wheeler and Barlow have approximately 30 jobs each and, therefore, visit the jobs only once a week. At all other times, the foreman is the responsible Rex Moore official on the jobsite. Thus, the foreman represents Rex Moore in dealing with the general contractor on the jobsite and in dealing with the employees. Only if the foreman cannot resolve problems on the job are the matters brought to the attention of the superintendent. Thus, the record reveals that Foremen Bailey, Sutton, Slack, and Zicarelli possessed and exercised authority sufficient to find them to be supervisors within the meaning of the Act. Further, I find that the exercise of such authority required independent judgment and was not merely routine or clerical.[25]

Orden, as project manager, had two foremen working under him, each supervising a crew of electricians. As I have found the foremen to be supervisors, it follows that their supervisor, Orden, must have possessed supervisory authority. The facts bear this out; Orden hired a foreman and transferred another foreman. Moreover, Orden fired two employees after the foreman's warnings went un-

[24] Slack testified that he lied about being a foreman in the hope that the trial board would lessen his fine. The fact that Respondent did not know that Slack was a foreman appears irrelevant in view of the Board cases holding that such lack of knowledge is not a defense to an 8(b)(1)(B) violation. See e.g., Skippy Enterprises, 211 NLRB at 227. See also Brown & Co., supra at 811. Moreover, the evidence shows that in this case the Union considered all superintendents and foremen to be journeymen electricians and that the Union was not concerned with the representatitive status of any of the individuals. See American Broadcasting Co. v. Writers Guild, 473 U.S. 411, 420–421 (1978).

[25] While there is some evidentiary conflict as to the amount of manual work performed by certain of the foremen, I find it unnecessary to resolve this conflict. The fact that working foremen perform manual work as well as direct others does not detract from their statutory supervisory status. E.E.E. Co., 171 NLRB 982 (1968); Penco Enterprises, 201 NLRB 29, 31 (1973).

This is not a case where the normal amount of manual work performed by the supervisors increased during the course of a strike. See Polk Construction, supra at 761–762. Here, by sending its disclaimer letter of September 15, the Union ended its strike against the employers. The job duties of the foremen at issue were established after the strike had ended.

heeded. Accordingly, I find Orden to be a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

Respondent contends that none of the supervisors herein engaged in collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances and, therefore, are not covered by Section 8(b)(1)(B). However, under the Board's "reservoir doctrine," the Board interprets the term "representative for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievance" broadly so as to include all individuals who are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) on the ground that such individuals from the logical "reservoir" from which the employer is likely to select his representatives for collective bargaining or grievance adjustment. See, e.g., Lithographers & Photo-Engravers Local 15-P (Toledo Blade), 175 NLRB 1072 (1969), enfd. 437 F.2d 55 (6th Cir. 1971). Recently, in Teamsters Local 296 (Northwest Publications), 263 NLRB 778, 779 fn. 6 (1982), the Board reaffirmed its adherence to the reservoir doctrine and its position that all supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) are representatives within the intent of Section 8(b)(1)(B).

Even without resort to the reservior doctrine, the evidence establishes that the foremen herein adjusted grievances. The foremen granted employees time off to attend to personal business, resolved personality conflicts, resolved personal complaints concerning job assignments, and resolved complaints concerning job safety. The Board has broadly interpreted the term grievances as used in both Section 2(11) and Section 8(b)(1)(B) so as to include not only contractual grievances but also personal grievances. Typographical Union 529 (Hour Publishing), 241 NLRB 310, 315 (1979); Toledo Blade, supra.

J. The Bargaining Relationship

As mentioned earlier, the Union had a longstanding collective-bargaining relationship with NECA. Except for Hulse, which had signed a "me-too" agreement, all the companies involved herein were party to the NECA-Union negotiations of 1981. The 1978–1981 agreement expired on May 31, 1981. On June 10, the Union commenced a strike against NECA and its employer-members and some of the "me-too" contractors, including Hulse.

The strike was in progress on September 15 when the Union sent its disclaimer letter. On September 16, NECA sent a telegram accepting the disclaimer. On September 25, the Union filed 17 representation petitions seeking to represent the employees of 17 NECA employer-members, including M & M and Peters. On October 1, NECA signed a collective-bargaining agreement with the NAIU. Seven of the employers involved in the representation cases reached agreement with the Union permitting the employees to return to work about October 1. Thereafter, these seven employers signed separate collective-bargaining agreements with the Union in February 1982. M & M is the only employer involved herein that reached agreement with the Union. Peters, Rex Moore, McCubbin, and Amos Walker have adopted the NECA-NAIU collective-bargaining agreement.

Between the Union's disclaimer of September 15 and NECA's execution of a collective-bargaining agreement with the NAIU on October 1, the IBEW, the Union's parent organization, attempting to bring NECA and the Union back together again. On September 24, the Union's attorney wrote the IBEW's vice president for the geographic area which includes Sacramento concerning the disclaimer. The attorney's letter contains, inter alia, the following passage which sheds light on the Union's disclaimer:

> In late August and early September, Business Manager Frith asked me for advice concerning the legality of and procedures for disclaiming interest in the multi-employer bargaining unit represented by NECA. He asked me what impact a disclaimer would have on the NECA members and whether a disclaimer would free those NECA members who Frith felt wanted to bargain in good faith with Local 340. I understood then and now understand that the NECA negotiation committee and Board of Directors was and is dominated by employers who want to go non-union. Those NECA members who really wanted a fair contract and wanted to bargain in good faith had been kept out of the negotiations and [were] ignorant of the progress of negotiations. However, these same employers had signed a Power of Attorney with NECA to represent them and up to this point had not chosen to attempt to break away from the multi-employer unit and request individual bargaining.
> Brother Frith also inquired whether NECA could foster an RD election petition or file an RM election petition in an attempt to oust Local 340 from its position as bargaining representative. As you know, those NECA contractors who had shown their true colors at the bargaining table had hired scab replacements during the strike. In fact, NECA had already placed the newspaper ad for strike replacements before the strike was called and before impasse had been reached in negotiations.
> I advised Brother Frith that a disclaimer of interest was legally possible, but would have to extend to the whole multi-employer bargaining unit. I advised him that a disclaimer would cause a halt to his strike and prohibit him from demanding further bargaining with NECA on a multi-employer basis.
> Therefore, with this history of bad faith bargaining, lawsuits and NLRB charges, Brother Frith presented the matter of a disclaimer to the membership for its consideration. Although I was not asked to express an opinion as to the wisdom of disclaiming interest, it is my opinion that it was a realistic move to make considering the tactics employed by NECA and the possibility that the disclaimer would prompt the good contractors into action.
> I further advised Brother Frith that the disclaimer would permit the individual employers to grant recognition to Local 340 on an individual basis and to bargain on a single employer basis. However, I explained that the disclaimer would not have the effect of voiding the Power of Attorney. Should any employer wish to bargain individually with Local 340, it would still have to use NECA as its bargaining agent. Whether NECA would refuse to act on behalf of any employer on this basis (and whether the employer itself would seize this refusal as an opportunity to break the Power of Attorney) were matters for speculation.

On December 29, the Regional Director administratively dismissed the Union's 17 representation petitions. On September 12, 1982, the Board reversed the Regional Director and ordered that a hearing be held limited to the issue of the continuing existence or viability of the NECA multiemployer bargaining unit which the Regional Director had administratively found to be a bar to the 17 petitions. The consolidated representation hearing was consolidated with an unfair labor practice case, Grason Electric, Case 20–CA–16872. That consolidated hearing closed on February 28, 1983, and the unfair labor practice case is now pending before me for decision.[26] In Grason Electric, the Union charged, inter alia, that the collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and NAIU violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act.

The General Counsel and the Charging Parties introduced evidence showing that notwithstanding its disclaimer the Union picketed Rex Moore allegedly for representational purposes. As no case alleging a violation of Section 8(b)(7) of the Act is before me, I make no findings regarding the Union's purpose in picketing Rex Moore. However, I note that certain statements made by union pickets are relevant to the instant case.[27] In June 1982, a union picket, at a picket line established by the Union on a Rex Moore jobsite, told Wheeler that the Union hoped that "everything would get back together, all the small contractors and stuff would try to go back to the IBEW and eventually Rex Moore and the bigger contractors would try to come back." In July, a picket, on a union picket line at a Rex Moore jobsite, told Moore that he "hoped it [the picketing] would be over as soon as things got all back together."

K. Conclusions Regarding 8(b)(1)(B) Violations

Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act provides that "[i]t shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization . . . to restrain or coerce . . . an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances." The applicable principles of law are set forth in Plumbers Local 364 (West Coast Contractors), 254 NLRB 1123, 1125 (1981):[28]

> Section 8(b)(1)(B) prohibits both direct union pressure—for example, strikes—to force replacement of grievance representatives and indirect union pressure—for example, union discipline of supervisor-members—which may adversely affect the chosen supervisors' performance of their representative functions. American Broadcasting Companies v. Writers Guild of America, West, Inc., 437 U.S. 411 (1978); New Mexico District of Carpenters and Joiners of America (A. S. Horner, Inc.), 177 NLRB 500, 502 (1969), enfd. 454 F.2d 1116 (10th Cir. 1972); and Wisconsin River Valley District Council of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO (Skippy Enterprises, Inc.), 218 NLRB 1063, 1064 (1975), enfd. 532 F.2d 47 (7th Cir. 1976).
> It is also well settled that union discipline of supervisor-members who cross a picket line or otherwise violate a union's no-work rule in order to perform their normal supervisory functions constitutes indirect union pressure within the prohibition of Section 8(b)(1)(B). In reaching this conclusion, the Board and courts have recognized that the reasonably foreseeable and intended effect of such discipline is that the supervisor-member will cease working for the duration of the dispute, thereby depriving the employer of the grievance adjustment services of his chosen representative. American Broadcasting Companies, supra at 433–437, fn. 36; N.L.R.B. v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 501, AFL–CIO, 580 F.2d 359, 360 (9th Cir. 1978); A. S. Horner, supra at 502; and [Skippy Enterprises, 532 F.2d at 52–53.] Such discipline is unlawful even where, as here, the supervisor defies the union and continues to work for the employer during the dispute; the discipline is unlawful because the supervisor, having been disciplined for working during a labor dispute, may reasonably fear further discipline and, hence, will be deterred from working during any future disputes. The employer, in such circumstances, must either replace the disciplined supervisor or risk loss of his services during a future dispute; in either event, the employer is coerced in the selection and retention of his chosen grievance adjustment representative. American Broadcasting Companies, supra at 433–437.

In light of the foregoing principles Respondent's discipline of the instant 10 supervisors because they worked for nonsignatory employers would appear to restrain and coerce the instant four employers in the selection and retention of their grievance adjustment representatives.

Respondent, relying on the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in the Chewelah Contractors case,[29] argues that no violation of [26] The representation cases were transferred to the Board in Washington, D.C., on February 28, 1983, and are now pending before the Board for decision.

[27] Respondent contends that it is not bound by statements of pickets on the ground that pickets are not officers or agents of the Union. However, common law principles of agency govern the question of whether a picket was acting as an agent of a union. A finding of agency may be based on evidence that the individual "was acting with the knowledge and acquiescence of the union and that he had implied authority to do what he did." NLRB v. Teamsters Local 135, 267 F.2d 870, 873 (7th Cir. 1959); NLRB v. Teamsters Local 182, 228 F.2d 83, 84 (2d Cir. 1955). Thus, I find that the statements of the pickets within the authorized time and space of the picket line in furtherance of the Union's objectives are within the implied scope of their authority and imputable to the Union. Similarly, I find that the statements of a picket during a telephone conversation to the home of Steven Moore are not, absent other evidence, within the scope of the picket's agency, and therefore not imputable to the Union.

[29] NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 73, 621 F.2d 1035 (9th Cir. 1980), denying enf. of 231 NLRB 809 (1977).

Section 8(b)(1)(B) can be found because the Union did not have a collective-bargaining agreement or a collective-bargaining relationship with any of the employers at the time the supervisors engaged in the conduct for which they were fined.

In Chewelah Contractors, the court, in refusing to enforce the Board's finding of a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B), stated that the purposes of the section were to prevent unions from forcing employers into or out of multiemployer bargaining units and to guarantee that an employer's bargaining representative would be completely faithful to the employer's desires. The court noted that, in any decision involving Section 8(b)(1)(B) that had come to its attention, the charged union had been the bargaining representative of the complaining company's employees. However, the charged union in Chewelah Contractors neither represented the company's employees nor demonstrated a desire to represent the employees. The court reasoned that the union had no incentive to influence the company's choice of representative or affect the member's loyalty to the company. Thus, the court held that a union does not violate Section 8(b)(1)(B) by disciplining a member, even though that member is also the bargaining representative of an employer, if the union neither represents nor shows an intent to represent the employer's employees.

In Plumbers Local 364 (West Coast Contractors), supra at 1126–27, the Board concluded that the Ninth Circuit's decision in Chewelah was in conflict with a long line of Board cases, and that the Board's position appeared to have the support of the United States Supreme Court and the opinions of other circuit courts:

> [In American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. v. Writers Guild of America, West, Inc., supra, the Supreme Court affirmed the Board's finding that the union (which represented writers in the film industry) violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) by threatening to discipline and by disciplining various supervisors—including directors—who worked during the writers' strike. It was undisputed that the directors—who supervised other employees and adjusted other employees' grievances—never dealt with writers and did not adjust writers' grievances. In the Supreme Court, the union argued that the threats and discipline directed toward the directors could not possibly affect their adjustment of writers' grievances and that therefore the union's actions regarding the directors had not violated Section 8(b)(1)(B). 437 U.S. at 437, fn. 37. The Supreme Court explicitly rejected the union's contention, noting that "directors . . . had [grievance] adjustment duties with respect to other employees" and finding that the union's sanctions made the directors "less than completely reliable and effective employer representatives for the duration of the strike, and less likely to perform any supervisory task during future strikes." Id. The Court then concluded: "A union may no more interfere with the employer's choice of a grievance representative with respect to employees represented by other unions than with respect to those employees whom it itself represents." 437 U.S. at 438, fn. 37.

The Union involved in Writers Guild did, of course, represent the employer's writing employees and, thus, had a bargaining relationship with the coerced employer. However, the Supreme Court also made clear that its rationale applied equally in circumstances where the union did not represent the employees of the coerced employer. Thus, the Supreme Court endorsed the Board's decision in A. S. Horner, Inc.,[7] finding an 8(b)(1)(B) violation where the respondent union did not represent the employees of the coerced employer. Referring with approval to a D.C. Circuit opinion[8] discussing Horner, the Supreme Court stated (437 U.S. at 436, fn. 36):

> The [D.C. Circuit] noted its agreement with [Horner] where a union member worked as a supervisor for a company which had no contract with the union. . . . A fine imposed in these circumstances violated [Section 8(b)(1)(B)] because compliance by the supervisor with the union's demands would have required his leaving his job and thus have the effect of depriving the Company of the services of its selected representative for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances. . . . The [D.C. Circuit] said that Horner thus "falls close to the original rationale of § 8(b)(1)(B) which was to permit the employer to keep the bargaining representative of his own choosing." 159 U.S. App. D.C., at 284, fn. 19, 487 F.2d at 1155, fn. 19.

Furthermore, in addition to the Supreme Court's decision in Writers Guild and the Tenth Circuit's decision enforcing the Board's order in A. S. Horner, at least two other courts of appeals have approved Board findings of 8(b)(1)(B) violations where the respondent union had no bargaining relationship with the employer involved. Circuit and the Fifth Circuit decisions were cited with approval by the Supreme Court in Writers Guild, 437 U.S. at 438, fn. 37.

Even assuming that the rationale of Chewelah should be applied to the present case, a violation of the Act would still be found. In Chewelah the court found that, since the union did not represent Chewelah's employees nor demonstrate a desire to represent the employees, the union had no incentive to either influence Chewelah's choice of bargaining representative or affect the supervisors' loyalty to Chewelah. In this case the union evidenced reasons to influence the employers' choice of bargaining representative and to affect the supervisors' loyalty to their employers.

While the Union disclaimed interest in representing employees in the NECA bargaining unit, it sought representation in single employer units of 17 NECA-represented employers. Statements at the trial board meetings and on the picket line reveal an intention to have the employers come back to Respondent.

At the trial board meetings conducted on the charges against Verga, McDaniel, Slack, Watson, and Hogan the board members spoke as if the Union were still on strike against the employers. There were requests that Peters, M & M, and McCubbin sign agreements with the Union. There was a discussion that Rex Moore would have to come back to the Union if it could not get trained electricians. Further, union pickets, at picket lines established at Rex Moore jobsites, made statements indicating that the Union was attempting to get the contractors, including Rex Moore, back together with the Union. Finally, the letter of the Union's attorney, quoted above, indicated that the Union's disclaimer was a tactic designed to "prompt the good contractors into action" and "permit the individual employers to grant recognition to Local 340 on an individual basis and to bargain on a single employer basis."

It appears that the Union and the Employers assumed that the replacements needed more training and supervision than the members of Respondent whom they replaced. Thus, the Union intended to withhold supervision from the Employers in order to force the Employers to come back to the Union. The Union would then be in a position to bargain with the Employers on an individual basis rather than on a NECA multiemployer basis. Thus Chewelah is distinguishable because the Union continued to desire to represent the employees of the Employers albeit not in the multiemployer unit. More importantly, one of the Union's purposes was to force the Employers out of multiemployer bargaining and into bargaining on a single employer basis. A union's attempt to force an employer to resign from a multiemployer bargaining association was recognized as an 8(b)(1)(B) violation by the court in Chewelah, 621 F.2d at 1036, citing Roofers Local 36 (Roofing Contractors), 172 NLRB 2248 (1968). Thus, even under the rationale of Chewelah, Respondent's fining of the supervisors as part of a course of conduct designed to cause the "good" employer-members of NECA to abandon multiemployer bargaining and to bargain on a single employer basis is a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) and Section 8(b) of the Act.

2. Hulse, Peters, Rex Moore, McCubbin, Amos Walker, and M & M are employers engaged in commerce and in business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. By imposing fines on employees Dale Pettit, Don Verga, and Doyle McDaniel, who had effectively resigned from union membership, for their postresignation conduct, Respondent restrained and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. Robert Hogan (McCubbin), Curtis Watson (M & M), John Reese (Amos Walker), Gary Wheeler (Rex Moore), Ted Barlow (Rex Moore), Don Sutton (Rex Moore), Tim Bailey (Rex Moore), Dale Zicarelli (Rex Moore), Robert Slack (Rex Moore), and Francisco Orden (Rex Moore), at all times material, were supervisors for their respective employers within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and employer representatives within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

5. By preferring charges against Hogan, Watson, Reese, Wheeler, Barlow, Sutton, Bailey, Zicarelli, Slack, and Orden, and imposing fines against them, Respondent restrained and coerced the above-named Employers in the selection and retention of their representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances, and thereby has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respodnent has engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[30]

ORDER

The Respondent, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 340, AFL–CIO, Sacramento, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Bringing charges against or imposing fines upon employees who have resigned from and are no longer members of Respondent or its sister locals because of postresignation conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act.

[30] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

(c) Restraining or coercing May-Han Electric, d/b/a M & M Electric, Clint McCubbin, Inc., Rex Moore Electric Company, or Amos J. Walker, Inc. in the selection of their representatives for purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by preferring charges, holding a trial, fining, or otherwise disciplining any such representative performing supervisory, managerial, or grievance-adjustment functions for these Employers.

(d) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing M & M, McCubbin, Rex Moore, or Amos Walker in the selection of their representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Rescind and expunge from its records all disciplinary actions taken against Pettit, Verga, and McDaniel because of their postresignation conduct and notify Pettit, Verga, and McDaniel, in writing, that the fines levied against them have been rescinded and that all records of disciplinary actions against them have been expunged.

(b) Rescind and expunge from its records all disciplinary actions taken against Hogan, Watson, Reese, Wheeler, Barlow, Sutton, Bailey, Zicarelli, Slack, and Orden, including the fines, because of their working as supervisors and employer representatives, and notify Hogan, Watson, Reese, Wheeler, Barlow, Sutton, Bailey, Zicarelli, Slack, and Orden, in writing, that the fines levied against them have been rescinded and that all records of disciplinary actions against them have been expunged.

(c) Post at its business office and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[31] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Mail to the Regional Director signed copies of the notice for posting by the Employers, if those Companies are willing, in places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Copies of the notice to be furnished by the Regional Director, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be returned forthwith to the Regional Director.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT bring charges against or impose fines upon employees who have resigned from and are no longer members of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 340, AFL–CIO, or its sister locals, because of postresignation conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce May-Han Electric, d/b/a M & M Electric, Clint McCubbin, Inc., Rex Moore Electric Company, or Amos J. Walker, Inc. in the selection of their representatives for purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by preferring charges, holding a trial, fining, or otherwise disciplining any such representative performing supervisory, managerial, or grievance adjustment functions for these Employers.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce M & M, McCubbin, Rex Moore, or Amos Walker, in the selection of their representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

WE WILL rescind or expunge from our records all disciplinary actions taken against Dale Pettit, Don Verga, and Doyle McDaniel because of their postresignation conduct and notify Pettit, Verga, and McDaniel, in writing, that the fines levied against them have been rescinded and that all records of disciplinary actions against them have been expunged.

WE WILL rescind and expunge from our records all disciplinary actions taken against Robert Hogan, Curtis Watson, John Reese, Gary Wheeler, Ted Barlow, Don Sutton, Tim Bailey, Dale Zicarelli, Robert Slack, and Francisco Orden, including the fines, because of their working as supervisors and employer representatives, and notify Hogan, Watson, Reese, Wheeler, Barlow, Sutton, Bailey, Zicarelli, Slack, and Orden, in writing, that the fines levied against them have been rescinded and that all records of disciplinary actions against them have been expunged.

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel has considered objections and determinative challenges to an election held on 28 May 1982 and [pertinent portions of] the attached hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots showed 203 for and 165 against the Union with 41 challenged ballots, including 3 ballots which had been declared void and challenged at the count. The challenged ballots were sufficient in number to affect the results.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions[1] and briefs and has adopted the hearing officer's findings[2] and recommendations,[3] as modified.[4]

We agree with the hearing officer that the campaign here was not designed to inflame racial hatred or to engender conflict between black and white workers. Rather, the comments were obviously designed to express the view that blacks had not been treated fairly by their employer and that they needed to join forces to do something about it. Unlike the situation in Sewell Mfg. Co., 138 NLRB 66 (1962), which involved the exacerbation of racial prejudices and tensions without regard to an employment relationship, the remarks were directed to the black employees' perceived relationship with their employer as employees and their dissatisfaction with the terms and conditions of employment. In that regard, the comments are similar to other types of campaign assertions relating to an employer's treatment of its employees.

In the instant case, union representative Sidney Chism's stating to employee Henry Gilley, that the Company had kept blacks down for a long time and now they had a chance to take care of it, represents nothing more than a view that the black employees had been mistreated in their employment with this employer—a legitimate issue for discussion during a union campaign. References to "plantation" and "Martin Luther King" simply put these matters in a historical setting well understood by all, blacks in particular. Chism's telling an employee either that material being handed out was white man's material or that the distributor was just a white man doing white man's work indicates

[1] The Employer has excepted to some of the hearing officer's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule a hearing officer's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Stretch-Tex Co., 118 NLRB 1359, 1361 (1957). We find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In her report, the hearing officer relies on Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 NLRB 221 (1962), and General Knit of California, 239 NLRB 619 (1978), to support her recomendation that the Employer's objections that allege the Petitioner made material misrepresentations warranting setting aside the election are without merit.

In Midland Life Insurance Co., 263 NLRB 127 (1982), the Board ruled that it will no longer probe into the truth or falsity of the parties' campaign statements, and that elections will no longer be set aside on the basis of misleading campaign statements. We rely on that case in finding that these objections concerning misrepresentations are without merit.

In its exceptions the Employer contends that the Union made certain misrepresentations concerning 119 strikers and the manner of reinstatement of the strikers, which constituted an abuse of the Board's processes. The Employer would have us apply the standards in Formco, Inc., 233 NLRB 61 (1977), to these allegations. However, the Board overruled Formco, Inc. in Riveredge Hospital, 264 NLRB 1094 (1982), holding that alleged misrepresentations of the Board's processes will be treated the same as all other alleged misrepresentations.

Applying the principles enunciated in Riveredge Hospital, we adopt the hearing officer's recommendation to overrule this allegation of objectionable conduct.

In finding no merit to the Employer's allegation that the Union engaged in objectionable activity by threatening employees with physical violence if they did not join, support, or select the Union as their bargaining representative, we do not rely on Hickory Springs Mfg. Co., 239 NLRB 641 (1979) (or its progeny), which has been overruled in Home & Industrial Disposal Service, 266 NLRB 100 (1983).

In adopting the hearing officer's finding that alleged threats made to employees Valentine and Gilley did not warrant setting aside the election, we do not rely on the hearing officer's statement that the threats did not deter Valentine and Gilley from their efforts to campaign against the Union. As the hearing officer correctly stated, the proper test for evaluating such conduct is an objective one: whether the conduct involved was "likely to coerce prospective voters to cast their ballot in a particular manner." Great Atlantic Tea Co., 177 NLRB 942 (1969).

Finally, in dismissing the Petitioner's Objection 2 and the Employer's Objection 3, the hearing officer, inter alia, found none of the alleged incidents described by Sammy Davis Jr. in his testimony objectionable. We adopt these findings solely on the ground that Davis' testimony was not credited. Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to pass on the remainder of the hearing officer's rationale for finding that the incidents involving Davis did not constitute objectionable conduct.

[3] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt, pro forma, the hearing officer's recommendation that (1) the challenge to the Board agent's ruling that the ballot identified at the hearing as R.D. Exh. 3(b) be overruled and that said ballot be declared void; (2) the challenge to the Board agent's ruling that the ballot identified at the hearing as R.D. Exh. 3(d), a mail-in ballot, be sustained and that said ballot be counted consistent with the procedure adopted for all other mail-in ballots; (3) the challenges to the ballots of Alexander Cannon, Paul Turner, Bryant Randolph, and Houston Bramlett be overruled; and (4) since no determination can be made as to the validity of Gregory E. Blake's challenged ballot, in the event Blake's challenged ballot becomes determinative of the results, the election be set aside and a new election held.

[4] Thirty-three of the forty-one challenged ballots were cast by unfair labor practice strikers whose reinstatement rights were determined by the Board in Case 26–CA–4991, et al. (269 NLRB 1101 (1984)). As the Board in that decision found that only six of these strikers were unlawfully denied reinstatement by the Employer, the challenged ballots cast by eligible voters are no longer sufficient in number to affect the election results. Accordingly, there being no need to open and count any of the overruled challenged ballots or take further into account the challenged ballot of Gregory E. Blake, we shall issue a certification of representative to the Union.

a distrust of the motives of the distributing employee because of a perceived advantage resulting from his race.

Again, such comments represent the view that black employees have not been fairly treated because of their race. Whether this view is accurate with respect to a particular employer, thereby making it a "legitimate campaign issue" in our dissenting colleague's words, is of little consequence.

The right to raise the issue in a union campaign is not limited to situations where a white employer, or even the NLRB, believes that blacks have been unfairly treated. Nor is it any more necessary for blacks to establish the truth of the claim before they raise the issue than it is for any other employees to establish the truth of their claims of unfair treatment, for any reason, at the hands of their employers. The question of whether employees have been unfairly treated, for whatever reason, is always a legitimate topic of discussion in a union campaign.

This is not to say that all racial remarks involving the employer-employee relationship will be tolerated. But unless such racial remarks rise to the level that they are so inflammatory as to make a fair election impossible, we will not find them objectionable. Here the racial appeals do not rise to that level. We therefore overrule these objections.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots has been cast for International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union 1196 and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees at the Employer's plant located at 499 South Hollywood Street, Memphis, Tennessee, including route merchandisers, delivery drivers, helpers, pre-mix, advertising, garage, cooler and forklift drivers. Excluded: All account representatives (tel-sel, advance salesmen and sales merchandisers), clerical employees, guards, professional and technical employees, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would find that the Union destroyed the election's laboratory conditions by making irrelevant, inflammatory appeals to racial prejudice.

The hearing officer found that, during a union meeting 3 days before the election, union representative Chism told approximately 75 assembled employees[1] that the Employer's president Pidgeon ran his business like a "plantation." During the campaign the Union also distributed a leaflet to employees which stated: "If you believe that it's time to get off Pidgeon's plantation—Then Vote Yes." The Union also distributed an additional leaflet which included the following statement: "Tell the folks Pidgeon wants everyone back on his plantation with you as overseer."

The record further establishes that, 3 weeks before the election, Chism told antiunion employee Gilley that the Employer "had kept the blacks down for so long" that Gilley should not help the Employer do so, and that the employees now had a chance to take care of the problem. Two weeks before the election, antiunion employee Cullen heard Chism say that Cullen was "just a white man doing a white man's work," and that the antiunion literature which Cullen was distributing was "white man's material."

In YKK (U.S.A.) Inc., 269 NLRB 82 (1984), the Board reaffirmed the principle of Sewell Mfg. Co.,[2] that an election will be set aside where a party launches a campaign to exacerbate racial feelings by making irrelevant, inflammatory appeals to racial prejudice. In my view, the circumstances herein are sufficiently analogous to those in YKK to warrant setting aside the election. In YKK the Board noted the Union's references to beating the "Japs" at Pearl Harbor, and emphasized that there was "no conceivable way" that such comments could be relevant to a legitimate campaign issue.[3] Similarly, I am unable to discern the connection between the Union's repeated "plantation" remarks and the legitimate issues which arose during the campaign in this case. I also view the Union's accusations as inflammatory because it is clear that their purpose was to spotlight the race of the Employer's president and to exacerbate racial tensions.

The Board in YKK further emphasized that the union's comments were not isolated since they were uttered at a meeting before 75–100 employees. Here, Chism's "plantation" remarks were made during a meeting of 75 employees only 3 days before the election, and similar statements were printed on leaflets distributed to an undisclosed number of employees.

Consequently, I would find that the Union made irrelevant, inflammatory appeals to racial prejudice. I would therefore sustain the Petitioner's Objections 1(a) and 3 and the Employer's Objection 1, [1] The tally indicated that there were approximately 449 eligible voters.

[3] 269 NLRB 84.

and I would set aside the election and direct a new election.[4]

[4] Because I would set aside the election on this issue, I find it unnecessary to reach the other objections considered by the hearing officer.

APPENDIX

HEARING OFFICER'S REPORT ON CHALLENGES AND OBJECTIONS

Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election approved by the Regional Director for the Twenty-Sixth Region on May 7, 1982, an election was conducted on May 28, 1982, among certain employees[1] of the Employer, at its Memphis, Tennessee, location. Upon the conclusion of the election, a tally of ballots was furnished the parties in accordance with the Board's Rules and Regulations. The tally of ballots revealed that of approximately 449 eligible voters, 203 were cast for the Union and 165 were cast against the Union. There were 41 challenged ballots which are sufficient in number to affect the results of the election.

On June 7, 1982, the Petitioner and Employer filed timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election, copies of which were duly served upon the other parties. The objections of both parties are attached hereto.

On June 9, 1982, the Regional Director issued his Notice of Hearing on Challenges and Objections in which he ordered a hearing to be held on June 29, 1982, to resolve the issues raised by the Challenges[2] and the Employer's objections. On June 14, 1982, the Employer filed its motion to postpone Hearing and on June 17, 1982, the Regional Director issued an Order Rescheduling Hearing to July 6, 1982.

Pursuant to the Notice of Hearing on Challenges and Objections, said hearing was held on July 6 and July 7, 1982, at Memphis, Tennessee, before the undersigned hearing officer, duly designated for that purpose. All parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross examine witneses, and to introduce evidence on the issues. My findings are based upon the entire testimonial record including exhibits and from my observation of the witnesses, including but not limited to their general demeanor as they testified under oath, partisan interest, guarded or indirect answers, conclusional and conflicting testimony, conclusionary statements as distinguished from fact, argumentativeness, self-serving answers, power of recall or lack thereof, responses to leading questions by Counsel, general attitude, memory for detail, and ability to comprehend the nature of the questions and answers thereto.

PETITIONER

OBJECTION NUMBER ONE

From approximately May 4, 1982, until a day before the election, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union 1196 (hereinafter referred to as the Union) passed out objectionable campaign propaganda to employees. The various union handbills were all designed to create and foster several false impressions, including:

(a) the idea that the Company owner and his staff were prejudiced against the black employees and would not treat them fairly, this impression was fostered through literature using analogies of the plant as a "plantation," its owner wanting "everyone back on his plantation," and the personnel director being the plantation "overseer." The literature made further racial pitches by referring to the employees as "folks," calling the personnel director's meetings with employees "captive audience meetings," making repeated references to company attempts to "keep you back," "hold you down," "keep you down," "insult you," "keep you under their thumb," and other racially charged phrases designed to support the impression that the Company policy was based on anti-black sentiments.

PETITIONER OBJECTION NUMBER THREE

At the Union meeting held the Tuesday before the election, the Union President, Mr. Sidney Chism, made the same racially slanted argument that was promulgated by the Union literature, i.e., that the Company owner did not like blacks, that he would do anything to keep them in their place, and that he did not want them working for him. Mr. Chism made the same analogies used in the Union literature concerning the plant being a plantation with the Personnel Director being the overseer, etc.

EMPLOYER OBJECTION ONE

The Union, its agents, and others, engaged in a deliberate and sustained campaign of appeals to racial emotions and prejudices designed to inflame racial hatred and to engender a conflict between black and white workers at the Employer's operations, and also between black workers and white managers.

DISCUSSION

Petitioner Objections 1(a) and 3 have been joined with Employer Objection 1 for examination and discussion as they relate to various allegations of racial appeal. Employee Henry Gilley testified that approximately three weeks before the election, Union Representative Sidney

[1] All production and maintenance employees at the employer's plant located at 499 South Hollywood Street, Memphis, Tennessee, including route merchandisers, delivery drivers, helpers, pre-mix, advertising, garage, cooler and forklift drivers. Excluded: All account representatives (tel-sel, advance salesmen and sales merchandisers), clerical employees, guards, professional and technical employees, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[2] The challenges which are the subject of hearing do not include 33 of the 41 challenges. Thirty-three of the challenges represent ballots cast by individuals whose reinstatement rights have been litigated but not resolved in Case No. 26–CA–4991, et al. The Board in its Ruling on Administrative Action dated April 21, 1982, directed that these persons vote by challenge. Thus, the challenge ballot issues are limited to 8 ballots, 3 ballots declared void and challenged at the count, 4 persons challenged by the Board because their names did not appear on the list, and 1 individual challenged by the Board as the name had already been marked off the list.

Chism called him over to the fence outside the Employer's facility during lunch time. As Gilley and Chism walked up the sidewalk, Chism asked Gilley what he had against the Teamster Union and Gilley responded that he didn't have anything against them. Gilley testified that Chism had stated that the company had kept the blacks down for so long and now they got a chance to take care of it and don't help keeping them down. Gilley responded that he was just against the Teamster Union. He testified that no one else had heard Chism's statements.

Employer/witness Patrick Cullen, who, as well as Henry Gilley, passed out campaign literature for People Against Teamsters, herein referred to as P.A.T., testified concerning one particular day when he handbilled some two weeks prior to the election. Cullen testified that Chism, who was handbilling Teamster campaign literature while Cullen was handbilling P.A.T. literature had told four employees in a car that "there was no reason to take mine, that they might as well take his because his was the truth. Mine was a white man's material." When asked to repeat the conversation in later testimony, Cullen testified that Chism had said "there is no need to take his stuff." Cullen further testified that Chism had followed with a comment that Cullen was just a white man doing a white man's work. After the employees had passed in the car, Chism had told Cullen that there was no offense. There was no one present with Cullen when this occurred.

Two Employer witnesses testified concerning remarks made in a union meeting held on May 25, 1982. Employee Charles Odom testified that during the union meeting, Chism, in speaking to the approximately 75 persons present, had said that "if we lose, you lose." Odom also said that Chism has stated in the meeting that President Pidgeon runs his plant like a plantation and he has Personnel Director Donaldson the head of it. Odom also described the comments of union representative Fiveash in the meeting. Odom testified that Fiveash had used Martin Luther King as an example and talked on the issue of blacks going in the back and white in the front. According to Odom, Fiveash has also said that "Martin Luther King had fought for our rights as blacks and we were about to let it go down the drain." Odom also testified that Fiveash had said that "Pidgeon was trying to take your rights away from you." Odom also talked about a black union representative who had told the employees in the union meeting that he had a tape that he wished that they could hear. The tape was described as having some Coca-Cola supervisors talking about the employees and using the term plantation.

Employer/witness Jeffrey Battle testified that during the meeting, Chism had said Mr. Pidgeon had wanted "to get it back the way it used to be and compared that to a plantation." Battle testified that another unidentified union representative talked about Martin Luther King and discussed that King had come to Memphis to help the trashmen get better jobs and better benefits.

Battle confirmed on cross-examination that he did not think of Dr. King as a racist. He said that when someone mentions Dr. King, he has an image of a good man trying to do right. On cross-examination, Odom testified that when he heard Dr. King's name, he thinks about black against white and Dr. King's name means blacks speaking up for themselves without violence.

The Union distributed 11 pieces of literature to employees during the election campaign. In union handbill Judgment Day (Employer Exhibit 1(c)) there is one line which contains the words "If you believe that it's time to get off Pidgeon's Plantation—Then Vote Yes." In the union handbill entitled Pidgeon's Pigeon Grounded, (Employer Exhibit 1(h)), the Union ends a six paragraph statement with the words "Tell the folks Pidgeon wants everyone back on his plantation with you as overseer."

The Board has held privileged campaigns which consisted of racial propaganda designed to encourage racial pride and concerted action.[5] While in the present case, there are clearly references to racial pride, the evidence does not reflect that the Union's campaign was designed solely to inflame racial hatred and to engender a conflict between black and white workers.[6] Racial comments in the Union's literature and the Union meeting do not establish that the Union's campaign was a racially oriented campaign deliberately seeking to invoke the hatred of black employees for white people.[7] Additionally, I find that Chism's individual comments to potentially six voters[8] out of some approximately 449 eligible voters would not support Employer's contention that the Union engaged in a deliberate and sustained campaign of appeals to racial emotions and prejudices. Accordingly, I recommend that Petitioner's Objections 1(a) and 3, and Employer's Objection 1 be overruled.

EMPLOYER OBJECTION SEVEN

The Union, its agents, and others, made material misrepresentations at a time which Respondent did not have an adequate opportunity to respond.

Both Petitioner and the Employer allege misrepresentation by the Union in its use of the number of 119 employees in its handbills and which was introduced into evidence as Employer's Exhibits 12(a) and 12(i). Petitioner and Employer assert that the union misrepresented the number of strikers who could have been reinstated at the company and additionally the manner of reinstatement for those strikes. In Employer Exhibit 12(a) the critical words are "The facts are the 119 employees of P.A.T. (Pidgeon Against Teamsters) talks about having charges filed against the Company and if any of these people win their case, the Company may put them anywhere they want to."

In Employer Exhibit 12(i), the significant section dealing with this alleged misrepresentation is "We also want the 119 employees that Coca-Cola has refused to rehire to have their jobs back—that's why we appealed the election and because we know this is another J.R. scheme to take your union from you."

Chism testified that during the union meeting held on May 25, 1982, he talked about the history of Coca-Cola and the fight that the Union had experienced in organizing them. He said that in 1975, the company had fired one of the employees had there had been a strike and 119 people had lost their jobs because of the strike. He testified that he had told the employees in the meeting that these strikers had filed charges with the Board, and that they were still in litigation with these employees and he did not know their destiny or whether they would come back to the company.

On cross examination, Chism stated that he had used 119 as the number for his handbill as that was the original number of employees discharged after the strike, although he admitted that he might be off five or six people one way or the other. Chism said that the information was gathered for the handbills after the filing of the decertification petition. Chism said that from the time that the decertification petition was filed until the Union started handbilling, it was his understanding that there were 119 charges pending. Chism confirmed that he had talked with one of the Board Agents of the NLRB who had told him that there were possibly 90 as some of these cases had settled and some were still being litigated and some pending.

On further cross-examination, Chism testified that he had used the figure 119 because that was the number who had filed charges in 1976 after the strike. He said that he had attended a hearing in November, 1981 concerning those strikers but contended that he did not know the number of employees in that hearing who were still seeking reinstatement.

Personnel Manager Donaldson testified that he had represented the company for the hearing held in November 1981 and which dealt with the strikers' reinstatement. Donaldson testified that at the conclusion of the hearing, there were 48 strikers' reinstatement rights still in issue. Donaldson further testified that the Administrative Law Judge had issued a decision in the case within the last two weeks and the Employer had been ordered to reinstate five of the strikers. Donaldson further testified that the statement in Employer Exhibit 12(a) is not correct when it states, "The company may put these 119 employees anywhere they want to." He said that the employees to whom they would offer reinstatement according to the Judge's Order, would be placed in the same position that they left the company in.

The Petitioner and the Employer would, therefore, argue that the union has misrepresented the manner of strikers who could have been reinstated at the company and they would also contend that the union has misrepresented the manner of reinstatement for these strikers. The dates when Employer's 12(a) and 12(i) were distributed to employees are not clear to the record but the record evidence indicates that the distribution occurred during the campaign period. The Petitioner, however, distributed a handbill which has been identified as Petitioner 5(a) and which specifically deals with these 119 strikers and their reinstatement rights, and would appear to be in response to the union handbills on the strikers. The Petitioner would estimate that the date of the distribution was May 6 or 7 in the a.m.

When the Board overruled Shopping Kart Food Market, Inc.,[14] with its 1978 General Knit of California, Inc.[15] decision, it returned to the standards set forth in Hollywood Ceramics.[16] One of the important elements of the Hollywood Ceramics test is that the misrepresentation occur "At a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply."[17] In the present case, one of the parties did, in fact, make a response to the union's handbills which related to the "119 employees" and their reinstatement rights. I would note, however, that even though Petitioner addressed these 119 employees' rights, there was no attempt to correct the number from 119 to 48 or any other more accurate number. The Employer, however, apparently made no attempt to correct any alleged misstatement as to the number of strikers who could be reinstated. As the Petitioner had an opportunity and did, in fact, make a response in its handbill distributed on May 6 or 7, the Employer could have also have had time to respond accordingly. Additionally, I note that Petitioner's handbill was distributed some 21 to 22 days before the election, thus, indicating sufficient time for either the Petitioner or the Employer to respond to the alleged misrepresentation. Accordingly, I recommend that the objections relating to misrepresentation of the number of strikers for reinstatement and the manner of reinstatement be overruled.

EMPLOYER OBJECTION TWO

Employees were coerced, restrained and intimidated by threats of loss of jobs if they did not join, support or otherwise select the Union as their bargaining representative.

DISCUSSION

Employer presented no direct evidence concerning this objection. A review of the union literature which was presented into evidence by the Employer has been made. The Union makes reference in two handbills to subjects which could possibly be construed as pertaining to job availability and changes in the present work force. In Employer 12(a), the Union mentions the 119 employees who have filed charges against the company and states that if they win their case, the company may put them anywhere they want to. This same phrase is also dealt with the discussion of an alleged misrepresentation. For purposes of this objection, however, I have limited my discussion to the phrase as it relates to a threat of job loss. Additionally, the Union makes reference to these 119 employees in Employer 12(i) and states "We also want the 119 employees that Coca-Cola has refused to rehire to have their jobs back—that's why we appealed the election and because we know this is another J.R. scheme to take your union from you."

[17] Lipman Motors, Inc. v. NLRB, 451 F.2d 823, 78 LRRM 2808 (3d Cir. 1971).

A review of the Petitioner's campaign handbills reflects that in its handbill identified as Petitioner Exhibit 5(a) and which was distributed on May 6 or May 7, 1982, the Petitioner specifically addresses any job threat associated with these 119 employees who have been displaced because of the strike. In response to the above-cited union statement in the handbill, employer 12(i), the Petitioner replies,

> THEIR JOBS?? WHAT DOES "CHISM" MEAN BY THEIR JOBS?
> WE DON'T SEE ANY 119 VACANT JOBS AROUND HERE. IN FACT, WE DON'T SEE ANY VACANT JOBS.
> WHAT "CHISM" REALLY MEANS IS THAT HE WANT 119 PEOPLE WHO NEVER GOT BACK TO WORK AFTER HIS STRIKE TO COME IN HERE AND TAKE OUR JOBS!!! THIS IS ANOTHER ONE OF SIDNEY'S CHISELS.
> HE TAKES AND USES OUR DUES MONEY AND USES IT TO HIRE LAWYERS TO TRY TO GET HIS BUDDIES BACK IN AND 119 OF US OUT!!

The Petitioner's handbill further asks of the union the legal requirement of the Company to keep employees presently working at the plant if the 119 employees get back and also asks if the union will guarantee that none of the present employees will be fired if the union succeeds in getting the 119 employees back in.

In response to the Petitioner's handbill cited above, the Employer distributed a handbill dated May 11, 1982, and introduced into evidence as Employer Exhibit 18(d). In that handbill, the Employer confirms that the Company has stopped taking applications and that there is a freeze on hiring. The Employer clarifies that since January 1, the Company has cut 22 jobs and that sales are down nearly 5 percent this year. The Employer further tells its employees that "This means you and your company need to work together better than ever before to protect your job security.

The Union clearly expresses its intent for the return of the strikers to the work force and through its literature it has provided the vehicle for inferences to be drawn by the employees as to the consequences of their return. The Employer and the Petitioner, however, have by comparison, gotten to the heart of the matter and clearly pointed out to the employees the potential for job loss if the strikers return to the work force. Any threat of job loss with respect to the returning strikers could just as easily have come from the campaign of the Petitioner, with added support of the Employer's campaign literature, as it could have come from the Union campaign. Based upon the foregoing, I do not find that the Union has interfered with the election by threats of job loss. Accordingly, I recommend that Employer's Objection Two be overruled.

PETITIONER OBJECTION NUMBER TWO

Approximately two weeks before the election, Jerry Valentine received a phone call at his home. The caller asked "Are you the one responsible for the Coke election?" to which Jerry answered, "I'm one of the ones responsible," to which the caller responded, "If this election goes against the Teamsters, you'll be sorry." Then on the Monday or Tuesday before the election when Mr. Valentine was handing out literature at the plant's north drive, the Union campaigner standing next to him said words to the effect that "You'd better give this up or you're going to get hurt." Other employees, including Mr. Henry Gilley, were the victims of threats. The effects of the coercive activity were apparent, for instance, when one afternoon during the election week at the south gate of the plant, employees changing shifts refused Mr. Valentine's literature while taking that of the Union campaigners while the Union campaigners were present; however, when the Union campaigners left, employees came back to get Mr. Valentine's literature and ask him questions.

EMPLOYER OBJECTION THREE

Employees were coerced, restrained, and intimidated by threats of physical violence, if they did not join, support, or otherwise select the Union as their bargaining representative.

DISCUSSION

Petitioner Jerry Valentine testified that two to three weeks before the election, he received an anonymous telephone call at his house one evening. When Valentine answered the telephone, he was asked "If I was the one that had gotten the petition against the Union at Coca-Cola." Valentine responded by saying that he was one of a group of people that had circulated the petition. Valentine said that the calling party had then told him "that if there was an election and it went against the Union that I could get hurt." Valentine testified that the caller had then hung up after the comment. Valentine said that the call occurred about 8 p.m. in the evening. Valentine testified that he did not immediately tell anyone about this telephone call. He said that he did tell his attorney, Frank Cantrell, about the call, but did not tell any other employees, Personnel Manager Donaldson, or any other members of the P.A.T. association. Valentine also confirmed that after receiving this telephone call, he did not quit his anti-union campaign.

Employer in its brief contends that Valentine also received other threatening telephone calls at his home where no one said anything at all. I fail to comprehend the certainty of a threat in these telephone calls as perceived by Employer's counsel when Petitioner acknowledges that nothing was said.

Petitioner also testified that during the week prior to the election he was passing out literature at the north entrance of the plant. Valentine testified that he was told by a white man in his early 40's that if he continued his activity against the union he could get hurt. Valentine testified that he did not know the man who made the threat to him but he had seen this same man on two or three previous occasions passing out literature and talking to people who were walking into the entrance. Valentine testified that this threat was made to him in the morning between 6:00 and 6:30. Valentine also confirmed that an unidentified black man was present at the time that the threat was made. Valentine said that the two men were passing out union literature and were there distributing their literature when he had arrived that morning. Valentine also testified that he had been present passing out his literature for about 15 to 20 minutes before the threat was made to him. After the threat was made, Valentine continued to distribute his literature for another half hour. Valentine said that he had five or six conversations all together with the man who had threatened him, and in one conversation, the man had told him that he was retired but Valentine could not recall from what or where. This particular conversation about the retirement had occurred some two or three mornings before the morning of the alleged threat. During these other conversations with the man, Valentine had been asked why he had left the union, why he was passing out literature against the union, and why had he not remained loyal to the union. Valentine admitted that he did not tell any other employees about this threat but had told his attorney Cantrell about a week later. Valentine testified that he had not discontinued his anti-union campaign after receiving the threat because he was not intimidated.

Employer witness Henry Gilley testified that he passed out campaign literature on behalf of the P.A.T. organization and did so some eight to ten times. He said that he distributed the literature at the north and south gates of the plant and in the morning before work and in the afternoon after work. Gilley also described two men who he identified not to be Coke employees who were also distributing literature outside the plant. He described the men as a big white guy and a short black guy. Gilley testified that one morning the black had asked his name and then had said "why don't I come on and get with them, you know, and leave the white people alone; and if I didn't, I would get hurt like that." Gilley said that he had taken this statement as a threat. Gilley affirmed that no one else had heard this comment by the black guy and he was unable to give the black man's name. Union Representative Sidney Chism testified that no one distributed union literature who was not an official of the local or with another part of the Teamsters Union. Chism identified those who handbilled for the union as Larry Doyle, Vice-President; Nathaniel Jackson, Trustee; Tony Civalich, Southern Conference Organizer; Joe Allgood, Organizer for the International; and Wesley Fiveash who is the Treasurer of the local union as well as himself. He clarified that Fiveash, Doyle Civalich, and Allgood are all white and Jackson is black.

Employer witness Sammy Davis, Jr. testified that on the day before the election he was threatened, pushed, and called bad names by another employee who was identified as Arthur Crutcher. Davis said that he was leaving work and intended to get a handbill from both Chism and from one of the P.A.T. supporters. When Davis started to get the literature from the P.A.T. handbiller, Davis recounts that "Arthur told me to get my black ass back up there where I was that I didn't need that P.A.T." Davis contended that Crutcher had started shoving him and Davis went back into the guard house to wait for Crutcher to leave. Davis later went back out to the area of the handbilling and Crutcher had not left. Davis said that he had asked the white guy who was passing out union literature to ask Arthur to leave him alone. Davis' testimony is somewhat confusing in that he recounts that the white man said something but Davis does not repeat it at that point in his testimony. Davis then describes that he began to talk with Chism who was also handbilling that particular day. Chism had talked with him and had asked Davis why the people believe that Chism is against the union and asked Davis if there was anything Chism was doing to make the people believe that. Chism made a comment about being accused of what he was not. Chism had also allegedly asked what was it in him that had the people believe that he was really working "for the people in the office" and he assured Davis that he was not. On cross-examination, Davis testified that Crutcher had left Davis alone and was leaving when Chism had called Davis over to talk with him. Davis said that when Chism first called him over, he had not wanted to go because he knew Crutcher was still there. Davis then testified that the unidentified white man who was passing out literature had said "you had just better go ahead on up there because you could feel sorry for them and turn a loose the union." He also admitted that while Chism in handing out handbills had been facing Crutcher and Davis, they were turned away from Chism and were not facing Chism. Davis named three other employees who were present during his altercation with Crutcher and said that they were rooting Crutcher on. Chism testified that he had seen present during the incident with Crutcher and Davis. He said that he had seen Davis and he had thought that the employees were just jiving and joking because Davis was dancing around, shadow boxing and the other guys were hollering and playing with him. Chism said that the entire incident lasted about 10 or 15 minutes. He said that Davis had come over and talked with him and had, in fact, come over to Chism on three separate times to talk with Chism as he handbilled. Chism said that Davis had told him that he (Davis) believed in God and he didn't need a union in order to take care of his beliefs because he paid his tithes. Chism said that Davis would talk with him for a while and then would run over and shadow box for a while, but he had not seen anyone push or shove Davis.

Chism testified that Tony Civalich had been handbilling with Chism on that day and had been about one or two feet away from Chism. Chism denied hearing Civalich threaten Davis and recalled that Chism and Civalich had been laughing at the way Davis was acting out on the lot. Davis had first said that Crutcher probably was clowning around, then later testified that he thought Crutcher was serious because Crutcher knew Davis was not in the Union.

Davis testified that also on the day before the election, he had been threatened by union steward Neely Dodson. Dodson, who was accompanied by another steward Leland Tatum, had approached Davis outside the plant premises. It was Davis' testimony that Dodson had told him that if he didn't vote for the union that "he would be the first black something out of the gate." Davis went on to say that Dodson had said "if he voted for the union or didn't vote for the union, either way it goes, he would be the first black something out of the gate." She had also told Davis that she was going to bust his head. Tatum had not said anything but had just laughed. There was no evidence presented that other employees were present during this conversation. Davis confirmed that he is 5'11' tall and he was not sure how tall Ms. Dodson was. On cross-examination, he was asked if he thought that Ms. Dodson was going to bust his head and he replied "I never underestimate nobody." The record reflects that Ms. Dodson is black and I take notice that Mr. Davis is black.

Davis testified that there was an employee meeting at the company approximately May 18, 1982. He said that he spoke up in the meeting and he let the employees know that he was not for the union. Davis recounted a conversation which he had with steward Leland Tatum and employee Floyd Smith after this meeting. Davis was coming out of the bathroom and Tatum had said to him that he could be hurt and Smith had said that he could wind up with a knife in his back. Davis said that he did not say anything but just kept going. There were no other employees present during this conversation. While Employer in its brief contends that Tatum had said that Davis could be hurt because of his statements against the union, the record does not reflect that Davis' testimony included any mention of the union but only the threats of harm to Davis.

Davis' testimony also included a description of a conversation between Davis and the supervisor of the shell lot, Maurice Alexander. Davis claims that he had gone out to the shell lot to clean up the lot. It was Davis' testimony that when Alexander had spoke to him he "had told me just to get my black ass away from there and get back to them white-son-of-a bitches." Davis did not reply but went back into the plant to clean up. He said that this conversation had occurred after he had spoken up in the employee meeting. There was no evidence that the union or the employee meeting was mentioned by Alexander to Davis. Davis said that three or four employees working in the lot had been present during this comment but he could only remember two names; Willie and Frank.

Davis testified that about a week before the election, he had a conversation with employee Johnny Guy. This conversation had occurred at the north end of the plant and Guy had said "What in the hell is this that I heard that you stand up in them people's face?" Guy had also said "On May 28, if you don't act right, I am going to kick your black ass." Davis had asked if that was a threat. Guy had said "You damn right, and what do you want to do about it?" Davis ran. Davis confirmed that Guy is black. Davis went on to explain that prior to this incident, Guy had been "talking about me before my face to his other friends. They were making games of me." Davis described these friends as other forklift drivers and said that Guy had also tried to turn some of Davis' friends against him, and named Willie Stewart as one of those friends that Guy had tried to turn against Davis. Davis had clarified that Guy had not explained to him what "acting right" meant. Davis said, however, that in his interpretation, acting right means to vote for the union. He said that he was a person who reads through lines and as Guy was in the union and Davis was not, this was his impression.

Davis further testified that on the same day that Neely Dodson had threatened him, employee William Stewart had threatened that Davis had better keep his mouth closed or else he was going to bust Davis' head.

Davis continued to testify about threats made to him and recounted an incident that occurred after the election where employee Wesley Faulkner had told Davis that he had made a complete ass out of himself by making his speech in the company meeting. Faulkner was accompanied by employee Johnny Johnson who began grabbing and pushing Davis. Johnson talked about what he was going to do and was "talking about we was cool, we was friends, we was this, and we was that." Johnson then thumped a cigarette on him. Davis said that he reported these incidents to the company and that certain of these employees named above were called into the office. Davis said that he knew that they were because he heard their names being called over the intercom. He said that their names were all called at the same time and he recalled hearing the names of Johnny Johnson, Johnny Guy, William Stewart, and Arthur Crutcher being called into the office. Davis said that he did not know whether Tatum or Dodson had been called into the office. He also said that he could not remember the date when these persons were called to the office and was not able to recall whether this occurred before or after the election.

DISCUSSION

Petitioner and Employer present evidence concerning allegations of 10 threats to employees during the campaign period. Two threats were made to the Petitioner, one threat to a member of the P.A.T. association and seven were alleged to have been made to one employee. For clarity of discussion, I shall address my findings on the alleged threats in total.

Both Valentine and Gilley testified that they were threatened while they [were] handbilled by unidentified persons who were also handbilling campaign literature. Chism's testimony that only union representatives and officials of the local or Teamsters organization handbilled supports the conclusion that the unidentified men described by Gilley and Valentine may have been Teamster representatives. Valentine was allegedly threatened by a man with whom he had handbilled and conversed on five or six occasions. Some two or three mornings before the alleged threat this same man had been talking with Valentine about his retirement. On the day of the alleged threat, Valentine had been handbilling in this person's presence for 15 to 20 minutes before the threat occurred and Valentine testified that he continued to handbill after the threat and in the presence of this man for another 30 minutes. Valentine told no other employees about threat and only told his attorney a week later. Valentine said that he did not discontinue his anti-union campaign after the threat and, in fact, was not intimidated by the threat.

Gilley testified that he handbilled some 8 to 10 times on behalf on the P.A.T. organization of which he is a member and one of the founders. The threat he alleges to have been made to him on one of these days of handbilling was not overheard by any other employees. There is no evidence that Gilley discontinued his handbilling or his anti-union efforts after the threat was made. Gilley did, in fact, serve as an observer for the Petitioner in the election on May 28, 1982.

Assuming that the threats, as alleged by Valentine and Gilley, were made by union representatives and assuming that they were, in fact, made to both Valentine and Gilley, I do not find that these isolated threats by the union sufficient to set aside the election.[20] Where union conduct is involved, the Board has cited the test to apply to be "Conduct upon which an election is set aside must be found to have affected the outcome of the election, i.e., likely to coerce prospective voters to cast their ballot in a particular manner."[21] The record does not support the conclusion that Valentine and Gilley were deterred from their efforts to campaign against the union, much less to alter their support for Petitioner and the P.A.T. organization, nor is there evidence that the threats to Valentine and Gilley were even communicated to other employees or coerced other employees. The Employer in its brief cites Congreso De Uniones Industries De Puerto Rico, 237 NLRB 1406 (1978), for the proposition that where threats are made by union officials to the opposition, the election must be set aside. The above cited case involves a campaign with two opposing labor organizations identified as the S.I.U. and Congreso. The circumstances of that particular campaign included the organizer for the Congreso drove an automobile toward an S.I.U. supporter and appeared to be attempting to run down the employee. Threats were made by one organization against another during an employee gathering of some 400 employees assembled in front of the plant and the union. Representatives of one of the labor organizations on a daily basis told employees as they entered the plant that they (the union) would break the employees' face if the other union won the election. Additionally, a union delegate was blocked by a group of some 30 to 40 employees at the plant entrance during her lunch period and another group of employees surrounded her car and began striking it with their fists and yelling "out with the S.I.U." The group included the organizer of the opponent union and this attack occurred for some 15 minutes. I find no difficulty in distinguishing Congreso with the present situation involving two isolated and unpublished threats to two P.A.T. supporters and organizers. The other threat alleged to have been made to Valentine involved the threat in the anonymous telephone call.

Except in aggravated situations, the Board has applied the same rationale to anonymous telephone calls as it has to rank-and-file employees and other persons who are not parties to the election.[22] The record reflects that only one out of 449 eligible voters received an anonymous telephone call. Valentine through his own testimony confirms that this alleged threat was not communicated to any other employees or the Employer. Valentine also admitted that he did not stop his anti-union campaign after receiving the telephone call. The record does not support a finding that the anonymous telephone call to Valentine "created an atmosphere of fear and reprisal which rendered a free expression of choice of representation impossible and thus destroyed the laboratory conditions for the election."

The remaining seven allegations of threat involve but one employee, Sammy Davis, Jr. Davis testified about two alleged threats made by union stewards, three alleged threats by employees, one threat by a supervisor, and a threat by an unidentified person who may have been a union representative. Davis contended that on the day before the election, female steward Neely Dodson told him that if he voted for the union or if he didn't vote for the union, either way, he was going to be the first black something out of the gate. While Dodson's comment may have been a threat, the very wording denies that it was made to coerce Davis to vote for the union. If Davis were to be credited, Dodson was threatening him but letting him know that the threat stood no matter how he voted.

Davis also contends that a union steward Tatum accompanied by employee Floyd Smith threatened him as he passed them after he exited from the bathroom. Davis gave no testimony that these threats were prefaced by any comment or reference to the union election.

Davis also testified about a comment from an unidentified white man who was passing out literature on the day before the election. Union representative Chism had called Davis over to talk with him as Chism was handbilling in front of the plant. Davis testified as being hesitant to go because he had just had an altercation with another employee in the same area. When he hesitated, the unidentified white man had said, "You had better go ahead on up there because you could feel sorry for them and turn a loose the union." By Davis' own testimony, he describes that he did, in fact, talk with Chism and, in fact, engaged in a lengthy discussion where Chism asked Davis about how employees perceived Chism and enlisted Davis' advice about how to convince the employees of Chism's true interests. The conversation as described by Davis did not have the appearance of a coercive or intimidating discussion.

While Davis has testified concerning three separate incidents and threats which are alleged to have been made by union representatives and stewards, I do not find these threats as a basis for setting aside the election.

The Board has held that statements made to employees by union representatives which are reasonably calculated to interfere with the employees' exercise of freedom of choice exceed the permissible bounds of preelection activities.[23] The Board has also, however, agreed with the Fifth Circuit finding that "For conduct to warrant setting aside an election, not only must that conduct be coercive, but it must be so related to the election as to have had a probable effect upon the employees' actions at the polls."[24] I do not find that these statements as allegedly by Davis rise to the level of interference which would have have affected the outcome of the election. Additionally, I note that the Board has also held that in certain circumstances employees hearing such threats may be more likely to vote against, rather than for, the Union.[25]

Davis also testified concerning threats made by employees Arthur Crutcher, Johnny Guy and William Stewart. There was no evidence presented that any of these three employees were acting as agents of the union or at the command or urging of union officials.[26] The Board has applied a somewhat different standard to conduct of employees who are not union representatives and has looked to whether the character of the conduct was so aggravated as to create a general atmosphere of fear and reprisal rendering a free expression of choice of representatives impossible.[27] Petitioner in its brief cites Steak House Meat Company, Inc., 206 NLRB 28 (1973) to support its contention that the "conduct alleged had created a general atmosphere among the voting employees and fear of reprisal for failing to vote for or to support the Union." While it is true that in the Steak House Meat Company, Inc., the threat was made to only one employee, I find the circumstances distinguishable to the present case. In the Steak House case, the employee threatened was a 16 year old part-time employee who was threatened that he would be killed. I do not find that the threats made by Crutcher, Guy or Stewart had the same coercive effect upon Davis, or rose to the level of confusion and fear of reprisal as cited by the Board in the Steak House case. While Davis describes the comment by supervisor Alexander as a threat, there was no evidence that Alexander's comment was directed to the union or concerning the union. Davis gave no other testimony concerning anything which Alexander said to influence Davis' vote. I do not find that this isolated comment by Alexander which may have been perceived by Davis as a pro-union comment to be sufficient to set aside the election.

In summary, I do not find that the threats as alleged by Davis created a general atmosphere of fear and confusion nor do I credit in their entirety Davis' versions of the threats allegedly made. Petitioner would contend that due to the fact that there was not rebuttal of all the threats as alleged by Davis, that an adverse inference must be drawn, citing Dynacor Plastics and Textiles Division of Medline Industries, Inc., 218 NLRB 1404, 1410–11 (1975). Regardless of Petitioner's contention, however, I find Davis' testimony is not without ambiguity or inconsistency.[28] Based upon his demeanor as a whole, I do not credit the testimony of Davis.

Petitioner further contends that one clear indication of the confusion and fear is the allegation that on some occasions when both Union and non-Union parties were present and engaged in handbilling, employees would take the Union literature and then wait until the Union organizers had left to return and take the non-union literature. Please see a discussion as to this allegation in this report as it deals with Employer's Objection Number 8.

On the basis of the foregoing, I do not find that the incidents as described above created a general atmosphere of fear and confusion or interfered with the employees' actions at the polls and thus I find no basis for the setting aside of the election. Accordingly, I recommend that Petitioner's Objection Two and Employer's Objection Number 3 be overruled.

[28] I note Davis' testimony of being allegedly coerced by the unidentifed union representative to talk with Chism and the incredibly personal discussion which Davis alleges to have resulted therefrom. Additionally, I find it incredible that after Davis testified about all the employees who had threatened him, he recalled that they had been summoned to the office on the same day but he could not remember whether this occurred before or after the election. These same employees he had identified as being called to the office were employees who had allegedly threatened him both before and after the election, according to his previous testimony.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISON AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 13 January 1981 the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order in this proceeding,[1] in which it adopted Administrative Law Judge David G. Heilbrun's findings that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employees Palma and Hernandez and Section 8(a)(1) by interrogating, threatening, and promising benefits to several of its employees. On 28 January 1982 the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit denied enforcement of the Board's Order and remanded the case to the Board for the limited purpose of permitting the Respondent to cross-examine three witnesses regarding affidavits they submitted to the Board.[2]

On 11 August 1982 the Board remanded the case to the judge to reopen the hearing to permit the required cross-examination and to issue a supplemental decision following the reopened hearing.

On 30 August 1983 the judge issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the original and supplemental decisions and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions[4] and to adopt the supplemental decision's recommended disposition.

ORDER

Based on the judge's decision and supplemental decision and the entire record, the National Labor Relations Board reaffirms its Order issued 13 January 1981 and orders that the Respondent, Doral Building Services, Inc., Los Angeles, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in that Order.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I cannot adopt the judge's credibility findings in this case.

In crediting the testimony of employees Palma and Hernandez, the judge indicated that he gave "major weight" to demeanor because of the problems which he considered inherent in the translation of testimony. The judge quoted extensively from law review articles analyzing the difficulties of translation, and he concluded that "the entire mechanism of interpreting a witness' answers is open to some question." The judge noted the numerous inconsistencies in the employees' testimony, but he attributed those inconsistencies to complications created by "the translation patterns of one language into another."

Even accepting the premise that there are inherent difficulties in translation, I conclude that the judge's lengthy discussion of these difficulties misses the mark. What is most apparent from the testimony of Palma and Hernandez is not that they misinterpreted or failed to understand the questions being asked, but that they were unable consistently to remember the significant events which transpired in this proceeding. Subtle differences of meaning surely arise during translation, but those differences have no relation to the question of whether a witness has the ability to remember a particular event. In my view, the judge's heavy

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In the initial decision, the judge found that employee Donado's testimony corroborated employee Palma's claim that Palma had discussed unionization of the Respondent's employees with General Manager Gamboa at a party in early September 1979. The decision also suggests, however, that Donado testified only to speaking with Gamboa at the party about possible employment and that Donado "could not testify as to any details" of the conversation between Gamboa and Palma. The record clearly shows and we find that Donado credibly testified that he heard Palma and Gamboa discuss unionizing at the party. Contrary to the dissent, the judge in several instances did reject the Respondent's allegations of inconsistency in the employees' testimony and affidavits. Moreover, we agree with the judge that the inconsistencies that do exist are minor and do not diminish the employees' credibility as established in part by their demeanor. Nor do the minor inconsistencies render credible the rejected testimony of the Respondent's witnesses.

[4] In the supplemental decision, the judge reaffirmed his conclusion that the Respondent interrogated employees in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1). The original decision, however, did not clearly identify those unlawful interrogations. The record discloses the following unlawful interrogations: (1) several days before 20 September 1979 General Manager Gamboa asked employee Ramiro Aleman if he had signed a union card; (2) on or about 13 September 1979 Gamboa asked employee James "what we thought about the union"; and (3) on 20 September 1979 President Alan Flores asked a group of assembled employees if they had signed union cards and if they knew those cards belonged to the Union. We note that the interrogations occurred against a background of other unfair labor practices and that there is no evidence the interrogated employees had openly proclaimed support for the Union. See generally Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984). Member Zimmerman, who dissented in Rossmore House, does not rely on that case, although he agrees with his colleagues that these interrogations violate Sec. 8(a)(1).

emphasis on the difficulties of translation is not dispositive of the issues in this case.

Apart from the issue of translation, I am not persuaded by the judge's reliance on demeanor. The Board has recently emphasized that "the invocation of the demeanor factor is not a substitute for a complete review and analysis of all the record evidence."[1] The judge set forth the employees' numerous inconsistencies, but instead of analyzing their testimony he simply stated that the inconsistencies were of "insufficient significance" and that the Respondent's contentions were "most sterile." In addition, the judge labeled Palma's extensive memory lapses as "personal musings during an extraordinary experience not fully understood as to purpose." The judge has simply obfuscated the issues, and I see little to distinguish his conclusional statements from the failure of the judge in Jewel Bakery to analyze the "internal ambiguity" and "confusion" of the testimony of a credited witness.[2]

In view of the foregoing, I would reverse the judge's credibility resolutions. As the judge noted, those findings were crucial to the General Counsel's prima facie case, and consequently I would dismiss the 8(a)(3) and (1) allegations with respect to Palma and Hernandez.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

DAVID G. HEILBRUN, Administrative Law Judge. Following hearing on an 8(a)(1) and (3) complaint in May 1980, the Board issued its Decision and Order (254 NLRB 105) on January 13, 1981, adopting conclusions that certain unfair labor practices had been committed by Respondent and expressly finding no basis to disturb certain credibility findings made in the decisional process. Thereafter on January 28, 1982, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit rendered an opinion (666 F.2d 432), denying enforcement of the Board's Order and remanding the case with directions to reopen the record and permit Respondent a described measure of cross-examination. The Board accepted the court's remand after duly considering the matter and, on August 11, 1982, issued its Order reopening the record to permit cross-examination in reference to the affidavits of Abel Palma, Juan Hernandez, and Isaias Donado on the basis of official English language translations of prehearing Spanish language statements.

Pursuant to this reopening and remand Order of the Board, the matter was set for further hearing on April 5, 1983, at Los Angeles, California. This transpired with each of the three named individuals being cross-examined by Respondent respecting their original testimony in May 1980, based on official English translations of their investigatory affidavits as originally written in Spanish and in that form attested thereto. Following this the matter was reopened on June 2, 1983, at which time Board Agent Frank Kazsimer, the person investigating the unfair labor practice charges on which the complaint issued, was examined by Respondent concerning his affidavit-taking practices with foreign-speaking witnesses, and in particular reference to a witness response of Donado that notwithstanding the typical jurat to his own Spanish language statement he could not, in fact, read Spanish.

On the entire record as now made, my observation of witnesses, and consideration of the General Counsel's oral summation made on June 2, 1983, as well as Respondent's posthearing brief, I make these further findings, conclusions, and recommendation.

I. FULFILLMENT OF COURT REMAND

A. Introduction

In writing its opinion the Ninth Circuit noted that since "no one at the hearing understood Spanish" a proper cross-examination was rendered "impossible and unhelpful to a Judge charged with making credibility determinations." It was this factor which led the court to require that "Official English translations of the original Spanish statements should be prepared" and furnished in connection with reopening.

The reality of this proceeding, as would be expected in a modern polyethnic urban setting, is that language comprehension of persons involved had adumbral characteristics. This is exemplified by the situation of Ramiro Aleman, a witness for the General Counsel whose original testimony covered 46 pages of transcript. Aleman's testimony was assessed in my original decision, and he was specifically named as a "credible" witness[1] insofar as merits of the case were concerned. Aleman testified through an interpreter and initially negated any understanding of English (Tr. 188), but later modified this to say that he understood "A little bit" (Tr. 206). This raises the obvious question of how this "little bit" of comprehension manifests in the thought processes of an individual as he functions on the witness stand being asked questions about events of the past, and is a matter in harmony with my observations and those of counsel. Respondent expressly sought to have the record reflect that Aleman "was responding to the question prior to it being translated" (Tr. 167), while the General Counsel both expressly agreed to "making that representation" and further observed that Aleman "begins to answer some questions prior to the time the translater has completed the interpretation" (Tr. 191). I am on record as agreeing that Aleman "does seem to be anticipating some of these questions as though he has some command of the language [and] seems to understand the thrust of some of [Mr. Kaplan's] questions, or part of them. It's one of these gray areas." (Tr. 167). And for this reason I asked the interpreter to instruct him "simply to hold his answer until he has heard the question in Spanish" (Tr. 167). This highlights the problem of dual-language comprehension at a given moment in time, separate and apart from the question of whether and to what extent an individual has increased (or decreased) such comprehension with the passage of time, and at a later point being questioned, again through an interpreter, about claimed inconsistencies in his or her previously translated testimony.

[1] The pattern of Aleman's testimony was the same as Palma, Juan Hernandez, and Donado, inasmuch as Respondent requested prehearing statements and was provided the Spanish version and unofficial English translation (Tr. 175–175). Following Aleman's testimony a return of this material was requested by the General Counsel (Tr. 268). Nevertheless Respondent has not apparently included Aleman in its arguments to the Ninth Circuit, nor was his situation treated in the court's opinion.

A further matter of significance is that during investigation and pretrial of an unfair labor practice case a witness (Palma being an example) is questioned at different points in time, for different purposes, and by different individuals. Initially such interrogation is to ascertain whether sufficient evidence exists in support of the charge for issuance of complaint in the matter. Once this threshold point is passed, the Government is advocating allegations of the charge and preparing its witnesses accordingly. Thus Palma was twice interviewed by Kazsimer and had his responses reduced to a version recorded in his native language. However, he was subsequently spoken with by trial counsel about factual circumstances (Tr. 1042–1043), and he expressly recalled that this involved "different" questions. In this general context some observations are in order, both from the standpoint of common experience and as focused on in literature concerning this phase of jurisprudence.

B. Bilingualism

Roberto Tschudin authored an article posing the question of whether a Federal court could impart the best kind of justice in Puerto Rico, a Spanish society. The answer, so termed by the author, "as I learned, is no." Essence of this article was a proposal for an intricate formula based on language fluency of defendants and counsel insofar as the United States District for the District of Puerto Rico was concerned, with proceedings that might be conducted in Spanish, English, or in both languages. In developing this idea the author pointed to a learned study which had identified "three kinds of bilingualism" relative to the Spanish language. The least fluent type is termed "incipient Bilingualism," and attaches to a populace other than "upper strata of . . . society" or "English-speakers, particularly those in the middle class." The resultant "large number" of persons to whom this sort of "pidgeon English" pertains are described as "incapable of forming complete sentences in English." In this context the author posits that "[u]se of interpreters delays proceedings, is rarely perfect, and interferes with effective cross-examination." Tschudin, The United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico: Can an English language court serve the interest of justice in a Spanish language society?, 37 Revista Del Colegio de Abogados de Puerto Rico 41–86 (Feb. 1976).

It has also been observed as part of fundamental "Problems of Interpreting and Translating" that "Interpreting or translating a foreign language is a complex task. . . . Some nuances of language may escape all but expert linguistic interpreters." This article[2] also noted:

> In this country, numerous external and individual factors result in wide varations in the Spanish and English a person ultimately learns to speak. Such factors include the amount of education received in either language and the extent to which a family becomes acculturated into American society. Social and financial problems beyond individual control can also affect the amount of education and acculturation attained.
> Wholly distinct from linguistics are personal considerations such as pride and a desire to save face or family honor. These are frequently strong cultural aspects which can inhibit many from requesting an interpreter in court or from seeking other legal help. This presents a problem for those who must supervise interpreter personnel, since interpreters themselves may be too proud or too embarrassed to declare that they are unable to translate a given word or phrase. It is much easier to bluff or to pass over the matter. After all, who will know? Interpreters are usually the only bilingual persons in the courtroom.
> Among the uneducated, especially in the Southwest, a mixture of English and Spanish words has evolved which cannot be understood in any Spanish-speaking country and which can present a problem for many interpreters.

In a general sense this writer believed that (Attorneys Guide, supra at 472–473):

> Interpreting is not a mechanical substitution of words in one language with their verbatim equivalent in another. . . . An extensive vocabulary and a sure grasp of the meaning of words is necessary to translate scientific, technical, or legal transactions. Less obvious to many is that a similar linguistic skill is necessary to translate slang, dialects and everday idiomatic expressions. Such linguistic elements exist in every language. They pose a special problem for the courts because most courts are not prepared to evaluate the competency of interpreters with these elements in mind.

These observations are but a prelude to a second troubling aspect insofar as ferreting out what a person has seen, heard, or generally experienced as a matter of mature adult awareness. The aspect is directly that of the link that is provided by interpreters in an administrative proceeding such as this, or for that matter in any general legal setting.

C. Interpreters

The fundamental quality of conveying the essence of what an individual has once heard is compounded when the experience was in one language and it is to be evaluated by its attempted translation into another. This was exactly the theme of a recent article in which the following passage appears:

> Of course it does not follow, once a non-English speaker is provided with the services of a competent interpreter, that his chances in the courtroom situation are now as good as his English speaking counterpart. Nothing could be further from the truth. . . . The frailties of any evidence or arguments are so much more readily grasped when one is hearing them directly in one's own language.

[Crouch, Interpreters, Translators and Legal Services Toward a Better Understanding, 55 Law Journal Institute 264 (1981).] It also has been noted how it is "impossible" to equalize the position enjoyed by an English-speaking witness with a non-English-speaking one, because when the latter is "assisted by a competent interpreter [language], chameleon-like at its inception, may lose many of its fine distinctions when filtered through the additional medium of an interpreter." (The Right to an Interpreter, 25 Rutgers L. Rev. 145 (1970–1971).)

This conundrum goes even deeper as reflected in this insightful quotation:

> Yet behind the questions of competency of the interpreter and the quality of the interpretation lies the question of what the [witness] heard and agreed to. . . . The trial record often reveals almost nothing of what an interpreter has in fact communicated to the defendant or whether the defendant has understood.

[Safford, No Comprendo: The Non-English Speaking Defendant and the Criminal Process, 68 J. Criminal Law & Criminology 15 (1977).] Relatedly, another authoritative publication has identified and evaluated, "19 major dialectal forms of Spanish . . . and numerous minor forms. . . . It is very important for the interpreter to know the context within which the translation is made. Words, of course, change meaning within given context." (Rainof, How to Best Use an Interpreter in Court, 55 Cal. St. B. J. 196 (1980).)

In summation the entire mechanism of interpreting a witness' answers is open to some questions, and this is compounded when it is further realized that the "official" English language translations of this proceeding have been completed by a person not necessarily sharing the same etymological, semantic, or idiomatic frame of reference as the guiding court interpreter.[3]

[3] In the instant case a replacement interpreter was obtained during the very course of cross-examining Palma at the original trial, when illness prevented continuation by the one that had translated up to that point for Spanish-speaking witnesses (Tr. 395). Aside from the fact that the notion of "so-called literal or strict method rather . . . than a paraphrasing of witnesses' answers" was structured for the replacement interpreter after off-the-record conferring with counsel (Tr. 396–397), there is total uncertainty about whether the second interpreter had a parallel level of communication with Palma or later witnesses, as compared with the first interpreter. This concern is exactly at the root of what was written in the Rainof article, supra, where the author followed his point with an example about an "interpreter [being] replaced in the afternoon session."

D. Methodology

For these reasons I have given major weight to demeanor characteristics of the several witnesses cross-examined pursuant to the court's remand. This is not to infer that literal disparities, or unexplained aspects of testimony, as set forth in the record itself, are not fully considered. It does mean, as harmonized in another writing,[4] that the palpable effort at speaking truth has been fully assessed in the overall factfinding process.

II. CONTENTIONS

The nature of this supplemental proceeding is such that Respondent's contentions are set forth in advance of those by the General Counsel. This is so because Respondent marshaled its arguments more comprehensively and the General Counsel's role is essentially a responsive one, plus that the original trial attorney is no longer available to the Government.

A. Respondent's Argument

Here it is asserted that the testimony of Palma and Juan Hernandez should not now be credited. As to these witnesses it is argued, respectively, that their testimony is "rife" and "riddled" with contradictions, inconsistencies, and omissions. In support of these assertions Respondent points out various aspects of their testimony as given on April 5, 1983. With respect to Palma, Respondent's posthearing brief on remand makes these detailed observations (transcript references and footnotes omitted):

> At hearing, Palma testified that his cousin Donado was present when he had a conversation with Gamboa in September, 1979, during which Gamboa allegedly promised him certain benefits if he gave up his support of the Union. However, after twice reading over his pre-trial afidavit he was unable to point to any reference to Donado, and had to admit to the omission. Nevertheless, he adamantly claimed that he told the Board agent who took the affidavit that Donado was with him when he spoke to Gamboa. Palma did concede that the agent had him read the affidavit over before he signed it, and told him that he could make changes and additions to it. He attempted to explain his failure to add Donado to the affidavit by saying that he must have forgotten to tell the agent that Donado had been omitted.
> In his affidavit, Palma stated that during the conversation with Gamboa he understood that he was being offered certain benefits, "so that I would leave the Union, Gamboa did not say it with words but that was how I understood it." [Emphasis added.] And he confirmed this by his testimony at the reopened hearing. However, this is in direct conflict with Palma's testimony in the initial hearings that Gamboa said, "that in LA they were going to get a building, and that he would give it to me so that I could make more money. But that I should stop going back and forth to the Union." [Emphasis added.] When asked to explain this conflict, Palma answered, "Maybe it's something that I forgot." Pressed as to what he forgot, Palma said, "It's been so long ago. So much time." Finally, Palma attempted to rationalize his different responses by claiming that he didn't actually understand the question asked of him in the prior hearings.

At hearing, Palma testified that he told Gamboa that he "could not back off from the union, because my co-workers had elected me to go pick up those cards." But this does not appear in his pre-trial affidavit. Palma's only explanation for this omission was that it "could have been something that I forgot."

In his affidavit, Palma averred that other than the conversation he had with Gamboa in early September, 1979, "I was not interrogated, nor did I talk to the supervisors about the union." Yet he testified at both the initial and reopened hearings that he had not one, but three conversations with Gamboa about the Union. When this inconsistency was pointed out to him, Palma claimed that he recalled telling the Board agent who took the affidavit about all three conversations. But pressed on this point, he backed off and testified, "I don't recall very well if I told him." Palma's explanation for not telling the Board agent about all three of the supposed conversations was, once again, that he forgot.

At hearing, Palma testified that he had two conversations with his supervisor Ruben Hernandez about the Union. But these conversations are not reflected in his pre-trial affidavit. Asked to explain this omission, Palma cryptically answered, "If I can recall, perhaps I thought that it wasn't important." Upon further examination, Palma responded, "I don't recall. I am very confused." Finally, Palma fell back upon what had become his standard answer: "Forgot. Perhaps I forgot."

At the initial hearing, Palma testified that he had two conversations with supervisor Oscar Sanabria about the Union. However, at the reopened hearing he was only able to recall one of these conversations. And no such conversations were mentioned in his affidavit. Once again, Palma's only explanation for this omission was, "Perhaps, something that I forgot. I don't remember."

In his pre-trial affidavit, Palma stated that on September 10, 1979, when he and Ruben Hernandez were found in an office looking at magazines during working time, "Gamboa only told me that he ordered Ruben to do something with me. Gamboa did not say anything about a warning . . . ." [Emphasis added.] And he confirmed this by his testimony at the reopened hearing. But at the initial hearings, Palma testified that Gamboa told him that "he had given Ruben Hernandez an order so that he could give me a warning." [Emphasis added.] When asked to explain this contradiction, Palma's only answer was, "I can hardly recall well. I don't recall that. I don't recall."

During the initial hearings, Palma testified that on September 10 Ruben Hernandez told him that he had been ordered by Gamboa to prepare written warning notices for both himself and Palma. However, this is not mentioned in Palma's pre-trial affidavit. Queried about this omission, Palma's only response was "I don't recall why I didn't mention it."

According to Palma's affidavit, on September 17, 1979, Gamboa told him that he was fired. That same night, Gamboa also told Ruben Hernandez to prepare a warning notice for Palma. At the reopened hearing, Palma testified that he was told that he was fired before Gamboa directed that a warning be written. But in the initial hearings, Palma had testified that he was fired after Gamboa told Hernandez to write the warning. Palma tried to explain away this inconsistency by saying that perhaps he hadn't been asked about the order of events when he was originally called to testify. However, it was pointed out to him that he had been asked that very question. Again asked to explain the inconsistency in his testimony, Palma answered, "It could be, because up to this date I don't recall well." Pressed to explain further, Palma could only say, "I need words at this moment in order to explain."

At the reopened hearing, Palma testified that he refused to sign the warning that Ruben Hernandez prepared on September 17. However, he didn't tell Hernandez why he wouldn't sign it. But at the initial hearings he testified that he told Hernandez that he wouldn't sign because "I did not see any reason for them to fire me." Questioned about this inconsistency Palma stated, "I don't recall well. If was Mr. Hernandez. I don't recall."

According to Palma, after he refused to sign the warning notice prepared by Hernandez, Gamboa directed that he be given a second warning notice. So he actually received two notices on September 17, both of which he refused to sign. Yet at the initial hearings he had testified that he was only given one warning notice on his final day of work. When asked to explain why if he was given two warnings he only testified to one of them, Palma's response was, "I forgot. I forgot."

The comparable observations with respect to Juan Hernandez are:

> In his pre-trial affidavit, J. Hernandez stated that, "I was never given any warning about my work. Gamboa told me once that I was a good worker. . . ." at the reopened hearing, J. Hernandez confirmed that he was only complimented by Gamboa on one occasion. And yet at the initial hearings he testified that he was thus praised two or three times. Asked to explain this inconsistency, J. Hernandez first claimed that "In the statement, it doesn't exactly indicate that it was just once." However, the official translator of the proceedings contradicted this, stating that the original Spanish language affidavit reflected that Gamboa made the statement attributed to him by J. Hernandez just once. Hearing this, J. Hernandez said, "when they asked me about that in my statement, I told them once. Now, when I gave testimony, I recalled that one time, and the other times." Of course, this doesn't explain his original answer at the reopened hearing that Gamboa only praised him once.

When he gave his affidavit, J. Hernandez was unable to remember when he had been praised by Gamboa. But at the initial hearings he testified that this occurred a few days before his transfer. And he tendered no reason whatsoever for his spotty recollection.

In his affidavit J. Hernandez quoted Florea as saying that, "If the union wins, you will lose your job." At hearing, he testified that Florea also said, "that they could get other buildings, in other places, and would not give us any jobs." But this is not reflected in the affidavits. When questioned about this omission, J. Hernandez first answered, "Because they didn't ask." Then he conceded that the Board agent who took his affidavit had asked him about what Florea had said. And he sought to explain the omission from his affidavit by claiming that "at that moment I didn't remember." However, when queried about what had happened between the time he gave his affidavit and the time he originally testified which had helped him to remember additional "facts," J. Hernandez could only say, "I started remembering more things."

In his pre-trial affidavit, J. Hernandez said that on his final day of work he sat down in a chair and fell asleep. When asked at the reopened hearing if he hadn't actually lain down on a sofa, J. Hernandez said, "No." Pushed on this matter, he conceded that he wasn't certain if it was a chair or a sofa. But, he was sure that he wasn't laying down. However, at the initial hearings he testified that he "laid down in a sofa and I fell asleep." J. Hernandez tried to explain this inconsistency saying, "I didn't think there was much of a difference."

In his affidavit, J. Hernandez stated that Gamboa said nothing to him when he found him asleep and awakened him. And he confirmed this at the reopened hearing. But at the initial hearings, he testified that Gamboa asked him what happened when he woke him up. J. Hernandez explained this inconsistency by claiming that he simply didn't recall Gamboa saying anything when he gave his affidavit. Yet, he offered no explanation at all for the change in his testimony from the initial to the reopened hearings.

B. The General Counsel's Argument

Here the assertion that original credibility findings should be adhered to is summarized under four principal arguments made in this regard. As orally delivered upon close of the hearing these were:

First, although Respondent has pointed to a number of instances wherein Palma testified at the 1980 hearing herein to facts which did not appear in his pre-trial affidavits, the Board has held that such circumstance does not constitute a sufficient basis for impeachment.

It is common for a Board agent to fail to ask questions while taking a statement which questions are later asked by a field attorney during trial preparation. And sometimes witnesses recall for the first time on the stand matters previously forgotten. See Civic Center Sports, 206 NLRB 428 at 431; Intl. Union of Electrical Workers, Local 601 (Westinghouse Electric Corporation), 180 NLRB 1062 at 1066.

Secondly, although Respondent has pointed to a number of instances of discrepancies or inconsistencies between witness testimony and the presumably corresponding pre-trial affidavit, most of these instances involve minor variances, such as for example, whether Gamboa told Juan Hernandez that he was a good worker once or two or three times, and whether at the end of his shift on September 25th, 1979, Juan Hernandez fell asleep on a chair or a sofa. And where the discrepancy is of that type the Board has held it to be too minor to vitiate a witness' general credibility. See Federal Copper & Aluminum Co., 193 NLRB 819; Westinghouse Electric Corporation, supra.

Thirdly, Respondent pointed to one major discrepancy between Palma's 1980 testimony and his 1979 pre-trial affidavits. In this connection, Palma testified tht Gamboa told him—I emphasize "told him"—quote, "In Los Angeles they were going to get a building and that he could give it to me so that I could make more money, that for me to stop going at the union in relation to the union."

In his affidavit, Palma said that when he talked with Gamboa at his home in September 1979, he understood that Gamboa was offering him benefits, such as a new building in Los Angeles, so that he would not support the union. And Gamboa did not say it in so many words, but that's how Palma understood it.

However, an affidavit inconsistent with subsequent testimony is not completely dispositive of the credibility issue, particularly where as here the affiant did not draft the statement and failed to give it close scrutiny before signing it. See Trailways, Inc., 237 NLRB 654.

In this connection, it need hardly be mentioned that the witnesses here were nowhere near as sophisticated as the lawyer who was cross-examining them.

Moreover, major discrepancies may be resolved on the basis of a comparison of demeanor on the stand as between the witness who testified inconsistently with his affidavit and the witness who testified contrary to the testimonial version of the inconsistent witness. See Mangurian's, Inc., 227 NLRB 113. Such comparison of demeanors may well serve as the basis for concluding that the discrepancy or inconsistency was the result of a faulty memory rather than a deliberate effort to conceal the truth.

Moreover, a witness may properly be generally believed notwithstanding that he is somewhat confused in his testimony on particular items. See Maximum Precision Metal Products, 236 NLRB 1417.

Fourth, although Palma, Juan Hernandez, and Donado were generally unable to explain why there were some inconsistencies between their 1980 testimony and their 1979 affidavits, such inability should not be held against them. Even sophisticated persons may be hard put to articulate their motivations, and the witnesses here were in particular difficulty because of the differences in language and the use of different translators or interpreters at every step in the Board's procedures. [Emphasis added.]

III. ANALYSIS

The perspective of this case must remain firmly in mind for purposes of assessing what has been educed during the principal remand hearing. This perspective includes the fact that pure timing of discharges at issue was a factor in inferring unlawfulness to Respondent's actions, that Gamboa as a significant figure in the eventful employment dynamics of September 1979 had, deliberately but inexplicably, set out to "catch" at least Palma in an offense, and that Gamboa's own credibility was extremely poor both as a matter of demeanor and as contradicted by Respondent's own witness Miguel Murillo.

A. Palma's Testimony

Regarding the omission from Palma's pretrial affidavit of any reference to Donado being at the Gamboa home in early September 1979, I find insufficient significance to this standing alone or as an aggregate matter with other details to which Respondent points. Trailways, Inc., 237 NLRB 654 (1978).This evaluation also applies to the matter of whether Palma had told Gamboa how he would not back off from supporting the Union because his coworkers were counting on him to take this lead. It similarly applies to the matter of how many conversations Palma had about the Union with both Ruben Hernandez and Sanabria, the supervisor for another building. Finally, I also apply the same evaluation to the point of whether on September 10, 1979, Ruben Hernandez had been ordered by Gamboa to prepare certain written warnings.

Regarding the exact mode of how Gamboa communicated an enticement that if Palma forsook the Union he would obtain a more beneficial assignment to a new building to be maintained, Respondent has raised little of substance at which to point. Palma's prehearing affidavit (as officially translated) and his original testimony are merely a routine synopsis of the gist of what he credibly recalls being outlined to him by Gamboa during party atmosphere. The claimed "rationaliz[ation]" whereby Palma supposedly commented on his "differing responses" of the time cannot be taken as more than an unsophisticated attempt to respond about something which the individual only dimly comprehends. This specific area was one that I termed an "extremely fine distinction" at the remand hearing, and I find nothing in the laborious cross-examination of Palma on the point which casts doubt on his general credibility.

In regard to the number of conversations had with Gamboa that were relevant to issues of this case, Respondent notes that Palma's prehearing affidavit states, in essence, that he had only one such conversation with Gamboa. However, the context of this statement is that it is part of a discretely marked paragraph with a time frame "beginning" in September 1979, whereas Palma ultimately testified, as expectably so after pretrial witness preparation, that he recalled earlier conversations of 1 to 2 months prior to the September time period. Thus neither in a literal or likely sense has Palma been shown to be inconsistent on the point.

In regard to whether or not Palma had inconsistently first testified that he was told of being fired after Gamboa told Ruben Hernandez to write a warning and then at the remand hearing testified that advice of being fired occurred before, I find this entire subject area to be only an illusory point that Respondent has constructed on an erroneous premise. Palma's original testimony was plainly that Gamboa told Ruben Hernandez to make a written notice "after" Gamboa told him he was fired (Tr. 230), which conversely establishes that such advice was, as Palma reiterated on April 5, 1983, before the directive that he receive such a warning. Respondent's reference to transcript page 393 on this point is insufficient, for the responses there to questions as posed are inconclusive to establish any later inconsistency.

As to circumstances surrounding the warning notice given Palma on September 17, 1979, I find little significance to any discrepancy of recall insofar as whether he faced one or two notices that day, or whether he actually uttered a refusal to sign one from Ruben Hernandez versus his testimony being taken only as a personal value judgment with respect to the distasteful termination from employment that had materialized.

Thus, none of the points raised by Respondent are sufficient to shake the essential veracity of Palma's testimony. Federal Copper & Aluminum Co., 193 NLRB 819 (1971). The overriding consideration is that of demeanor, for at all stages he impressed me as one vouching the truth and his frequent lapses into confessing forgetfulness during the searching, if not scathing, cross-examination is taken only as personal musings during an extraordinary experience not fully understood as to purpose, and complicated by the translation patterns of one language into another. On this basis I reaffirm my belief that Palma rendered credible testimony in regard to the essentially important issues on which an inference of unlawful discrimination was drawn.

B. Juan Hernandez' Testimony

The first point made by Respondent here is that the prehearing affidavit refers to praise from Gamboa "once," while testimony referred to several such instances as subsequently recalled by the witness. This is a variation of only the slightest moment affording no reason to doubt the essentials of other testimony. A similar outlook obtains insofar as cross-examination at the remand hearing produced a minor refinement in what Juan Hernandez remembered in expanding on remarks made by Florea (as interpreted by Gamboa) during an interrogation in mid-September 1979. I find nothing unusual about this witness testifying in fuller detail about such an episode, particularly because it was specifically alleged as an 8(a)(1) violation in the complaint. Predictably the General Counsel would attempt to enlarge on the supporting witness' version of the incident, and this in essence is all that Juan Hernandez has done in credibly having "remember[ed] more things."

The only other subject pointed to by Respondent here is that of circumstances when, on September 24, 1979, Juan Hernandez fell asleep on an article of furniture and was awakened by Gamboa. Considering the remoteness of these details to issues of the case, coupled with a natural uncertainty when sleep or drowsiness has affected an experience, I discount any claimed significance to what Respondent argues as inconsistencies in this regard.

Essentially Respondent has a most sterile basis to contend that basic credibility findings respecting Juan Hernandez should be varied, and with a repetition of satisfactorily impressive demeanor on his part during the remand hearing I am not influenced to reach any changed outlook for this witness.[5]

C. The Record as a Whole

Section 10(c) of the Act provides that the Board may properly find unfair labor practices to have been engaged in "upon the preponderance of the testimony taken." This associates to Section 10(e) and (f) in which such findings shall be conclusive "if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole."

On June 15, 1983, the United States Supreme Court issued its opinion in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). This holding reversed the First Circuit Court of Appeals, resolved decisional conflicts among the courts of appeals and relatedly approved the Board's 1980 decision in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). To the extent that Respondent may not have had the benefit of this recent opinion in briefing the instant matter, I observe that the reaffirmed credibility findings establish a prima facie case which it is the General Counsel's burden to prove, and that in such a situation it is proper to require an employer seeking to avoid such a conclusion that it meet or neutralize such a showing by "demonstrating by a preponderance of the evidence that the worker would have been fired even if he had not been involved with the Union." Transportation Management, supra. Respondent has not done so in this situation for the very reason that evidence as a whole shows hostility toward union activities among its employees, and that it seized upon implausible reasons to effect the discharge at issue. Respondent has not, therefore, met its burden of persuasion, and on the contrary its affirmative defense does not elevate from merely a pretext level. Since the protected conduct of Palma and Juan Hernandez was a substantial or motivating factor in these adverse actions, and Respondent has not shown they would have nevertheless resulted, both discharges remain violative of Section 8(a)(3) as originally found by the Board on the Wright Line doctrine as now settled by the Supreme Court's construction of the statute.

Disposition

Having reaffirmed my original credibility findings in this matter, I again reach the same conclusions of law as previously made and adopted by the Board, determining now that Respondent take the remedial action set forth in my original recommended Order.[6]

[5] Respondent did not assert in its brief that the testimony of Donado, as given at the remand hearing, contained contradictions, inconsistencies, or omissions as would warrant discrediting him in any material regard.

[6] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 15 November 1983 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order.

The judge concluded that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing or refusing to bargain with the Union about its decision to close its egg processing facility located in Wabash, Indiana, and the effects of that decision. We agree with the judge's conclusions, but we do so for the following reasons.

The Board recently held in Otis Elevator Co.[2] that management decisions which affect the scope, direction, or nature of the enterprise are excluded from the limited mandatory bargaining obligation of Section 8(d). The Board stated that the critical factor in determining whether a management decision is subject to mandatory bargaining is "the essence of the decision itself, i.e., whether it turns upon a change in the nature or direction of the business, or turns upon labor costs; not its effect on employees nor a union's ability to offer alternatives."[3] Applying that analysis to the facts of the instant case, we find that the Respondent's decision to close its egg processing facility and to subcontract its egg processing operation to others turned not upon labor costs but upon a significant change in the nature and direction of the business and therefore was not subject to mandatory bargaining.[4]

The Respondent is one of the largest food chains in the United States, operating retail food and grocery stores in 20 States. The Respondent also operates, through its agri-products division, 30 manufacturing or food processing plants which supply goods for sale at its retail stores. At issue in this proceeding is an egg processing facility located in Wabash, Indiana, which the Respondent began operating some 25 years ago and which it closed on 9 April 1982.

The Respondent's Wabash plant was a "nest run" facility, meaning that eggs were purchased from others and then transported in flats to the Wabash plant, where they were washed, inspected, graded, boxed in egg cartons, and shipped to the Respondent's distribution warehouses. As found by the judge, "nest run" egg processing operations are distinguished from "integrated" egg processing operations where the production and processing of eggs are accomplished at the same location. Thus, in an integrated operation, the laying hens are owned by the processor and the eggs are immediately transported by a conveyor belt to the processing area when laid. The integrated operation enjoys many advantages over the nest run, including avoidance of double packing and transportation, less handling and processing time, and a higher yield of fresh, good quality eggs. Because an integrated operation has no expenses connected with egg gathering, storage, and refrigeration prior to being transported to a grading plant, and no loading and transportation costs related to bringing the ungraded egg to the grading plant, it is also generally less costly and more profitable than a nest run operation.

The Wabash plant was the Respondent's last remaining nest run operation. A trend toward integrated operations in the egg processing industry had resulted in a growing scarcity of nest run eggs and rapidly rising prices for nest run eggs that were available. Although the Respondent had once owned nine nest run plants, all except three had been closed down by 1980. In 1980 the Respondent closed its two other nest run plants because of the lack of raw materials at competitive prices, leaving only the Wabash plant in operation as a nest run facility.

In early 1982, the Respondent made a decision to close the Wabash facility as well. Its supply of nest

[1] The General Counsel and the Charging Party have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] 269 NLRB 891 (1984). Otis Elevator issued after the judge's decision in this case.

[4] The Respondent contends in its exceptions that its action was not a subcontracting, but a closing of its egg grading business, and a partial closing of its agri-products division. As we noted in Otis Elevator, the appellation of the decision is not important, particularly where, as here, the decision involves elements of several types of actions.

run eggs was dwindling, and the outmoded nest run operation could no longer compete with integrated egg producers and operators. In recent years the Respondent had made efforts to salvage the Wabash plant. It had purchased its own flock of laying hens which it contracted out to farmers in the Wabash area in an attempt to keep the plant supplied with eggs, and it spent substantial amounts on new equipment. It also had negotiated with the Union[5] productivity agreements whereby employees received increases in wages only in relationship to increased productivity. Despite all this, the Respondent had reached a point where it could purchase cartoned eggs from integrated operators for less than it could produce them at the Wabash plant. This was the case not because of labor costs arising under its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, which constituted a relatively insignificant amount of the production costs,[6] but rather because of the lack of raw materials at a competitive price.[7] As noted by the judge, the fundamental basis for the Respondent's action in closing the plant was that its nest run operation was outmoded.

Following the plant's closure, the Respondent no longer operated any facility at which it simply graded and cartoned nest run eggs.[8] It is thus apparent that the Respondent's closure of the Wabash plant constituted a significant change in the scope, nature, and direction of the business.

Otis Elevator, as stated, now provides the method of analysis for determining whether management decisions are subject to mandatory bargaining. We find here that the essence of the Respondent's decision to close the Wabash plant did not turn upon labor costs. It centered, rather, upon the scarcity of raw materials and the inability of the Respondent to operate this outmoded grading facility to compete with integrated egg producers. These facts establish that the Respondent's decision to close the operation, no matter what it is labeled, clearly turned on a fundamental change in the nature and direction of the Respondent's business. See Columbia City Freight Lines, 271 NLRB 12 (1984). Accordingly, since we conclude that under Otis Elevator the Respondent had no duty to bargain about its decision to close its Wabash plant, we affirm the judge's dismissal of this portion of the complaint.

We also agree, for the reasons stated by the judge, that the Respondent met its obligation of notifying the Union of its intention to close the plant and that it offered the Union an opportunity to bargain regarding the effects of that decision upon the Respondent's employees. Accordingly, we affirm the judge's dismissal of the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, concurring.

I agree with my colleagues that the management decision in issue here was not a mandatory subject of bargaining. Several factors influenced the Respondent's decision, but the fundamental basis for that decision was the fact that the Respondent's nest run operation was simply outmoded. This was a factor over which the Union had little or no control. I therefore conclude that the Respondent's decision to alter its operation was not amenable to resolution through collective bargaining and agree that this portion of the complaint should be dismissed. See my dissent in Milwaukee Spring, 268 NLRB 601 (1984), and my concurrence in Otis Elevator, 269 NLRB 891 (1984). I also agree with my colleagues, for the reasons stated by the judge, that the Respondent satisfied its obligation to bargain about the effects of its decision, and that the complaint should be dismissed in its entirety.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Adminstrative Law Judge. Since the late 1950s or early 1960s, Local 119, United Food and Commercial Workers Union, AFL–CIO and CLC, the predecessor to Local 37 (the Union),[1] has represented the production and maintenance employees at the egg processing facility of Respondent The Kroger Co. in Wabash, Indiana. On April 9, 1982, Respondent terminated its egg processing operations and discharged its 70–75 employees. The General Counsel and the Union allege that Respondent did not merely close its facility; it subcontracted its work to others, without bargaining with the Union either as to the decision to subcontract or the effects thereof, all in violation of Section 8(a)(5)

[5] Local 37, or its predecessor, has represented a unit of production and maintenance employees at the Wabash plant since the late 1950's or early 1960's. The Respondent and Union have been parties to a series of collective-bargaining agreements, with the most recent agreement being effective from 27 July 1980 to 30 July 1983.

[6] The Respondent's direct labor costs comprised only approximately $.0381 of its $.7396 cost of producing each dozen eggs in 1982.

[7] In addition, the Respondent was presented at this time with an opportunity to sell its laying flock. The Respondent's flock alone did not keep the plant supplied with nest run eggs.

[8] It sold its flock of laying hens for $812,000; sold the plant and realty for $525,000; sold machinery, equipment, and other personalty for $300,545; transferred assets valued at $113,736 to other locations; and scrapped various items worth $27,522.

[1] Effective January 1, 1983, Local 119, the Charging Party herein, and Local 10 merged into the Union. The caption of the proceeding was amended at the hearing.

and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.[2] They rely on Fibreboard v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964). Respondent, however, contends that it did not engage in subcontracting; rather, it partially closed its business and had no duty to bargain about its decision to close, citing First National Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981). Further, it contends that it bargained both about the decision to close and the effects of the closing.

As of the end of 1981, Respondent, an Ohio corporation, operated 1258 retail food and grocery stores in 20 States—the second largest food chain in the United States.[3] In addition to selling name-brand items at its stores, it also operates, through its agri-products division, 30 manufacturing or food processing plants which supply goods for sale at its retail establishments, such as cheese, delicacies, catfish and trout, pet food, and eggs, the source of the instant controversy.

Until April 9, 1982, Respondent operated a "nest run" facility in Wabash, Indiana, so-called because eggs were purchased from others and then shipped in flats to the Wabash facility, where they were graded, inspected (or candled), boxed in egg cartons, and shipped to Respondent's distribution warehouses. The nest run operation is distinguished from an integrated egg operation, where the laying hens are owned by the processor, so that the production and processing of eggs are accomplished at the same location. Because the integrated operation involves no additional costs of placing the eggs on flats and then transporting them from where they are laid to the place of processing,[4] the nest run operation was claimed by Respondent to be more costly. Furthermore, because additional transportation involves more handling and time, there is a lower yield of good, fresh,[5] and undamaged eggs, which result adversely effects the profitability of nest run eggs.

In 1980, when Respondent and the Union were negotiating for a new collective-bargaining agreement, Ken Gordon, Respondent's director of labor relations, stated that the future of the Wabash plant might depend on the result of negotiations because integrated operations were continuing to grow and Respondent's labor costs were no longer competitive. As a result, in the agreement executed by the parties for the period from July 27, 1980, to July 30, 1983, there was included, for the first time, a productivity clause, which was further amended and refined in 1981 when Respondent's plant manager, Gary Florent, convinced the Union of Wabash's continuing need to compete with the economically less costly integrated egg operations.

Florent also raised the spectre of a further problem of the Wabash facility, the increasing difficulty obtaining ungraded eggs for processing because more egg producers were changing to integrated operations. Apparently, rumors about the continuing viability of the plant began to take hold but in January 1982 General Foreman Gary Stull informed the employees that he desired to squelch rumors that the plant was going to close, that it was not, and that, while Respondent would be losing a source of nest run eggs in February or March, Respondent had some new contracts and 1982 would be a good year.

On March 2, however, Gordon informed Local 119 President Thomas McCall that they should meet soon because Kroger was considering closing the Wabash plant.[6] Florent was also advised by Gordon the same day, and both he and McCall relayed to the employees, in separate meetings, what each had been told. On March 3, McCall met with Gordon and George "Wes" Archiable, Respondent's personnel manager for the agri-products division and manufacturing. What was said is somewhat at issue, but I find that Gordon mentioned that the Wabash plant was obsolete, that the nest run operation involved double transportation costs, that the Wabash facility could not compete with integrated operations,[7] and that increasingly farmers were converting to integrated operations. He reminded McCall that earlier shortages of nest run eggs had prompted Respondent to buy its own flock of approximately 900,000 laying hens[8] to keep the Wabash plant supplied with eggs and that the productivity agreements had been entered into with the Union to meet the competition of the integrated operators. McCall left the meeting believing that Gordon had asked him for concessions that the members would give in order to keep the plant in operation. Gordon testified, however, that he merely wanted to give McCall the opportunity to suggest any thoughts or ideas that might have some impact on Respondent's decision. The different implications of the testimony indicates that McCall thought he could give back some previously won benefits, but Gordon was looking for some suggestions as to how to compete with an inherently more effective method of producing marketable eggs.

In any event, McCall met with employees on March 5 and represented to them that Respondent was looking for concessions, but that Respondent would not commit itself to stating what concessions would be helpful. The employees were responsive in suggesting that they might be willing to accept a four 10-hour day workweek and a reduction of certain wages, benefits, and contributions, but they expressed unwillingness to go too far before knowing what was Respondent's position. On March 7, [2] The relevant docket entries are as follows: Local 119's charge was filed on April 14, 1982, and complaint issued on November 29, 1982. The hearing was held in Wabash, Indiana, February 14–16, 1983.

[3] Respondent was the fifth largest retailing chain in the United States on the basis of sales, which in 1981 were in excess of $11.2 billion. I conclude, as Respondent admits, that it is an employer within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. I also conclude, as Respondent admits, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[4] In the integrated operation, the eggs, when laid, go onto a conveyor belt where they are immediately transported to the processing area. Respondent also employed at its Wabash facility clerical employees who are involved in the purchase of integrated eggs.

[5] Nest run eggs are normally refrigerated prior to shipment to the processors and, because days might pass until delivery, dirt becomes imbedded into the shells.

[6] By letter dated March 1, Gordon wrote to McCall that Harold Wall, vice president of Respondent's agri-products division, which included the Wabash plant, was giving "serious consideration" to closing the plant "due to business reasons."

[7] McCall did not recall this specifically, but testified that Gordon mentioned it at a later meeting on March 31. I find it likely that Gordon also made the same statement on March 3, as he testified.

[8] This flock was contracted out to various farmers in the Wabash area and is referred to as the NK flock.

McCall telephone Gordon and told him of some of the items the employees had discussed but explained their problem of wanting to know what Respondent wanted. Gordon agreed to contact McCall after he had discussed the matter with his people.

On March 15, Gordon telephoned McCall but, McCall not being in his office, left a message stating that he had not heard from top management about the Wabash plant; that he was leaving for California; that, if McCall needed to contact him, he should call Gordon's office and leave a message; and that, if Gordon heard anything from top management, he would contact McCall. On March 23, McCall received a letter from Gordon, dated the previous day, stating that Respondent had decided to close the Wabash egg processing plant on April 10, for the reasons previously discussed with McCall. On the same day or the next, McCall called Gordon to try to work out something to keep the plant open, but Gordon said that the decision had been made and that he wanted to meet for impact bargaining.

The Union and Respondent met on March 31. Gordon proposed that Respondent would maintain coverage for employees for health and welfare benefits and would make various payments for severance, holidays, and vacations. The Union would have to agree that an agreement on these offers would encompass the Union's forgoing of any legal action in connection with the closing.[9] McCall tried to negotiate concessions to keep the Wabash facility open, but Gordon refused to do so, insisting that bargaining commence on the effects of the closing and that, if the Union did not agree to bargain over the impact of the closing, the employees might lose some benefits. The Union refused to reply to Respondent's offer. Some time thereafter a meeting was set up for April 7, but McCall canceled the meeting at the very last moment. No further meetings were requested by either party; the plant closed on April 9 and the employees were terminated; and the unfair labor practice charge followed a week later.

In First National Corp., supra, the Supreme Court concluded that a decision by an employer to terminate part of its business is not a mandatory subject of bargaining under Section 8(d) of the Act and, thus, it was unnecessary for the employer to give notice of the partial closing to the union prior to effectuating it or to bargain with the union about the decision. 452 U.S. at 686. It left untouched Fibreboard, supra, in which it had held that subcontracting of bargaining unit work is a mandatory subject of bargaining, but it noted, at footnote 22, that each case must be considered on its particular facts. Since First National Corp., 264 NLRB 1369, 1370 (1982):

> [I]t is incumbent on the Board to review the particular facts presented in each case to determine whether the employer's action involves an aspect of the employer/employee relationship that is amenable to resolution through bargaining with the union since it involves issues "particularly suitable for resolution within the collective bargaining framework.[9] If so, Respondent will be required to bargain over its decision. If, however, the employer action is one that is not suitable for resolution through collective bargaining because it represents "a significant change in operation,"[10] or a decision lying at "the very core of entrepreneurial control"[11] the decision will not fall within the scope of the employer's mandatory bargaining obligation. A determination of the suitability to such factors as the nature of the employer's business before and after the action taken, the extent of capital expenditures, the bases for the action and, in general, the ability of the union to engage in meaningful bargaining in view of the employer's situation and objectives

The nature of the business before and after the action taken: In order to determine whether the business closed or was subcontracted in Bob's Big Boy, the Board first examined the scope of the employer's business. There, the employer operated a commissary composed of five departments—shrimp preparation, meat, salad dressing, produce, and bakery—at which food was prepared and thereafter distributed to the employer's restaurants. In particular, the processing of shrimp had been the work of 12 of its employees, who were terminated when the employer contracted with an outside firm to supply it with package shrimp. The administrative law judge characterized the employer's business as packaging and breading shrimp and concluded that, when the employer contracted with another to supply the shrimp and then dismantled its own shrimp processing operation, the employer ceased its business of preparing shrimp.

The Board disagreed,[10] finding that the judge too narrowly construed the employer's business, which it characterized as providing prepared foodstuffs to its individual restaurants. The Board stated (264 NLRB at 1371):

> More accurately, Respondent is in the business of providing prepared foodstuffs to its individual restaurants. Thus, shrimp preparation existed as a component part of Respondent's business along with the preparation of meats, salad dressing, produce, and bakery goods and did not constitute a separate and distinct business enterprise.

To the same effect, Respondent's agri-products division provides foods to Respondent's individual retail stores and, thus, egg processing is a component part of its business along with the preparation of other foods at its 30 manufacturing facilities. Its Wabash facility did not constitute a distinct and separate business enterprise. But even this is a restricted application of what Respondent does. One does not look at The Kroger Co. as egg processor or as a producer of foodstuffs. More properly, it is the second largest grocery food chain in the country. When the Wabash facility was open, Respondent was a food chain; and when the facility was closed, Respondent was still a food chain.[11] Of equal significance, both before and after April 10, 1982, Respondent's stores sold eggs—earlier, some were processed at its Wabash facility; later they were produced at other facilities.

The distinction between partial closing of a business and subcontracting is not a fine one. When an employer closes its business, it ceases to transact that business. When it subcontracts its business, it does not directly conduct that business but, instead, has someone else do it. Whether the subcontractor sells the employer normal stock or has an item produced on specifications supplied by the employer makes no difference. The ultimate fact is that the employer is having work performed not its own facility by its own employees, but in the facility of its subcontractor and by employees of the subcontractor. One example of Respondent's subcontracting was its sale of its NK flock, from which Respondent obtained about 41 percent of its nest run eggs, to Croton Egg Company, a sale which was orally agreed on several months before March 10, 1982, when a written agreement was executed by the parties. Commencing in April, Respondent purchased from Croton each month approximately a million dozen cartoned eggs in excess of what it had purchased before. These purchases of integrated eggs replaced the nest run eggs which Respondent had earlier processed. Similarly, Respondent also had committed itself to buy cartoned eggs from an affiliate of Midwest Poultry Services, Inc., from whom it had previously purchased nest run eggs.

Respondent, therefore, ceased production of eggs for sale in its retail stores only in Wabash, where it laid off its employees. Otherwise, its hens were producing eggs for an integrated operator who then sold eggs to Respondent, and eggs previously supplied to it as nest eggs were being supplied in cartons. Unlike First National Corp, where the employer terminated its contract with a nursing home to provide maintenance work, here Respondent has not ceased doing business, but merely fostered the production and processing of the very same item by others. I conclude, therefore, that based on Respondent's continuation of its business of retail food markets, where it sells eggs, Respondent has subcontracted its egg processing operation.

The extent of capital expenditures: In Bob's Big Boy, the Board noted that, when the employer began to subcontract shrimp processing, the employer was not required to engage in any substantial capital restructuring or investment. Some 5 months later, however, the employer sold some of its machinery to the subcontractor for $30,000, but other machines were returned to a lessor. The plant area where the employer formerly processed the shrimp remained part of its facility, as did certain other equipment. The Board found (264 NLRB at 1371) that: "[N]o immediate restructuring of capital was necessitated by the decisions to subcontract and the subsequent capital transactions, while not de minimus, occurred at a leisurely pace with Respondent retaining possession of the basic facility and certain of the equipment used in shrimp processing." Accordingly, it held that "the capital transactions undertaken . . . are not substantial enough to remove the decision from the scope of Respondent's mandatory bargaining obligation," adding in the Board's footnote 14 in Bob's Big Boy, "We note that in First National Maintenance, supra, the Court indicated that the extent of investment or withdrawal of capital was not crucial. 452 U.S. at 688."

There can be no question that the capital transactions involved in the subcontracting herein were substantial on their face. Respondent sold its NK flock hens, feed, and flats for more than $812,000. It sold its Wabash realty for $525,000. It sold its machinery, equipment, and other personalty for $300,545.44. In addition, it transferred to its other locations various assets valued at $113,736.35 and scrapped various items worth $27,521.75. Many of these sales were of assets originally purchased by Respondent over a period of years in an attempt to keep its Wabash facility in operation, including the purchase of its own flock of hens to make up for the unavailability of nest run eggs elsewhere and the installation of new grading machines and other equipment.

The General Counsel and the Union contend, however, that, when the amounts cited above are compared with Respondent's 1981 sales of $11 billion; investments in property, plant, and equipment of over $1 billion; and capital expenditures of $260 million, the amounts are de minimus. The General Counsel argues, for example, that the sale of the NK flock amounted to only .08 percent of Respondent's total assets. However, if the scope of Respondent's business is limited to its agri-products division, as both the General Counsel and the Union have contended, the percentage is greater; but the record is barren of the worth, investments, and sales of that division, and so it is impossible to state what comparative amounts are involved.

Although I recognize the Board's footnote 14 in Bob's Big Boy about expenditures not being crucial, it would appear that the extent of capital expenditures must have at least some significance. If it does, it leans in the direction of a finding that Respondent need not bargain further over the closing of the Wabash facility, which clearly affected the scope of Respondent's enterprise and involved substantial divestitures. General Motors Corp., 191 NLRB 951 (1971), petition to set aside denied 470 F.2d 422 (D.C. Cir. 1972).

The basis for the action and, in general, the ability of the Union to engage in meaningful bargaining in view of the Employer's situation and objectives: Before reaching the issue of whether prior notice of and bargaining about the closure is required, I conclude, as a matter of law, that there was no bargaining in good faith about Respondent's decision to close its Wabash facility.[12] Gordon's notice to the Union on March 2, 1982, that Respondent was considering the closing of that facility and the subsequent discussions were merely ruses, because the decision to close was a foregone conclusion. The contract to sell the NK flock to Croton Egg Company had been discussed in late January 1982; Croton made a formal proposal on February 26 and a contract was signed on March 10. In June 1981 Respondent agreed to purchase processed and cartoned eggs from Midwest Poultry Services, Inc. Based on that agreement, Midwest formed a partnership, Hi-Grade Egg Producers and Processors, which sought economic development revenue bonds to build an egg processing plant in North Manchester, Indiana; obtained financing and began construction of its egg facility in October 1981; and executed a formal agreement with Respondent on February 6, 1982, to sell its cartoned eggs to Respondent and withdrew its supply of nest run eggs.

Accordingly, by the time Gordon notified McCall of Respondent's "consideration" of closing the Wabash facility, the loss of approximately 15–16 percent of Respondent's supply of nest run eggs previously sold by Midwest[13] and the soon-to-be loss of 41 percent of its nest run eggs from the NK flock was a fait accompli, which may give at least some insight as to why negotiations in March lacked meaning. However, it is also apparent that by March Respondent had exhausted its imagination in devising new methods to salvage the Wabash plant and its request of the Union was merely to come up with something that the Respondent had not thought of, thus presenting squarely the issue of whether the Union was able in these circumstances to engage in meaningful bargaining.

In this connection, First National Corp., a partial closure case, recognizes that an employer "may have no feasible alternative to the closing, and even good-faith bargaining over it may both be futile and cause the employer additional loss." 452 U.S. at 683. Although the Supreme Court rejected the Second Circuit's test that Section 8(d) of the Act creates a presumption in favor of mandatory bargaining over a decision to partially close a business and that the presumption is "rebuttable 'by showing that the purpose of the statute would not be furthered by imposition of a duty to bargain,' for example, by demonstrating that 'bargaining over the decision would be futile,'" the defense of futility appears to be imbedded into the court's decision in determining whether the issue is peculiarly suitable for resolution within the collective-bargaining framework.[14]

The General Counsel notes that Wall had stated early in his testimony that Respondent's labor cost was not significant enough to make much difference in his decision and that Wall had contended that Respondent had lost $220,000 in its Wabash operation.[15] Thus, the General Counsel contends, labor costs could have made some difference and, once Respondent stated as one of its reasons for closing the Wabash facility its profitability compared with buying eggs from integrated operators, Respondent made production costs an issue, which creates a duty to bargain over wages, fringe benefits, and other employment costs, over which the Union can exercise substantial control, citing Bob's Big Boy, supra.

In the abstract, this is clearly true. Indeed, in both 1980 and 1981, the Union and Respondent had bargained for and negotiated provisions intended to relieve Respondent from the excess costs involved in the nest run operation; but those provisions, intended to increase productivity, were not effective in making the operation competitive. By the time Respondent made its first moves toward subcontracting, labor costs constituted a minimal portion of its total costs,[16] and it has been adequately demonstrated that the Union no longer could give back sufficient reductions to make up for the difference that it cost Respondent to produce cartoned eggs above its cost of purchasing them. Thus, in 1980, Respondent purchased cartoned eggs for $.5998 per dozen, but produced them for $.6123, $.0125 more. Yet its direct labor cost was $.0279, a little more than double the amount of the difference. In 1981, its labor cost of $.0322 was less than the $.0394 difference between purchased and self-produced eggs; and, in 1982, its labor cost of $.0381 only slightly exceeded the purchase price difference of $.0325. McCall's attempt to "give back" nominal benefits could not be of any aid, a fact recognized on March 31 by Gordon who, when asked whether there was anything that the Union could do to keep the facility open, replied with amusement—only if the employees wanted to work below minimum wages and that was against the law.[17]

[12] I also reject Respondent's contention that it was relieved of any duty to bargain because it had engaged in a longstanding unchallenged practice of purchasing cartoned eggs from others with the tacit approval of the Union. It cannot be said that the subcontracting of all its work, the closure of the Wabash facility, and the layoff of all the production and maintenance employees were agreed on past practices, excusing or justifying Respondent's unilateral action. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 150 NLRB 1574, 1576 (1965).

[13] The loss of the Midwest nest run eggs caused the layoff of eight of Respondent's employees.

[14] The dissenting opinion of Justice Brennan, although disagreeing with the majority as to the result of First National Corp., agreed that "a showing that bargaining would be futile" can relieve an employer of its duty to bargain. Id. at 691.

[15] Wall later testified, however, that labor costs had nothing to do with his decision to close the Wabash facility and that the unprofitability of the facility related to the costs of the entire operation, including the purchase of cartoned eggs, and not just the processing of eggs.

[16] I recognize that vacation pay, unemployment taxes, and workmen's compensation were omitted from Respondent's calculations of its labor costs. On the assumption that the omissions increase its costs by 20 percent, which may be quite inflated, my conclusions would be no different.

[17] This testimony was related by one of Respondent's laid-off employees and is fully credited. By so crediting, I find it incredible that Gordon would have used the word "concession" in his March 3 meeting with McCall, although the words Gordon used could have conveyed the idea to McCall that he was being asked for concessions. In discrediting McCall, I rely, among other things on his denial of a later conversation with Gordon concerning McCall's letter to Respondent's president and, specifically, to his averment that he alone wrote the letter. From McCall's speech and use of words on the witness stand, I find the language of the letter was prepared by union counsel, just as Gordon testified that McCall had claimed in a conversation with Gordon. I further do not believe McCall's denial that Gordon specifically stated that wage costs were not a reason for the closing of the Wabash facility. Gordon's credited statement on March 31 demonstrates the truth of Gordon's testimony.

Accordingly, I find that labor costs were not the source of Respondent's decision nor was there any meaningful proposal which could have been made by the Union. The supply of nest run eggs was diminishing;[18] and it was simply a fact that Respondent could purchase cartoned eggs for less than it could have produced eggs in Wabash, paying its employees nothing. Respondent made efforts to salvage its Wabash plant: faced with a shortage of nest run eggs, it bought its own flock of hens; it spent over $300,000 on new equipment; it negotiated new productivity agreements—all to no avail.

The fundamental basis for Respondent's actions was that its nest run operation was outmoded. Its doubled transportion costs and lower yield of quality eggs could not have been resolved within the framework of 8(a)(5) obligations because Respondent could purchase integrated eggs for less than it could process them. Indeed, in 1980, Respondent closed its last two (except for Wabash) nest run facilities, which were located in Coldwater, Michigan, and Jackson, Missouri, because Respondent's supply of nest eggs dwindled or it could purchase integrated eggs for less than it could process them. If there were any remote possibility that the Union could have influenced the final decision, I would find a bargaining obligation; but the facts and circumstances herein convince me that the Union was powerless to offer any reasonable alternative to Respondent's action. Brooks-Scanlon, Inc., 246 NLRB 476 (1979). Accordingly, I conclude that the Union could not engage in meaningful bargaining about the decision and that Respondent was under no obligation to engage in bargaining under the Act.

I further conclude that Respondent did not refuse to bargain about the effects of the closure or subcontracting of its egg processing operation. Rather, it initiated negotiations and made an offer. It did not condition its offer on the Union's agreement not to file unfair labor practice charges and did not insist to impasse that the Union must give up its right to file such charges.[19] Rather, Respondent made an offer to pay certain benefits to the affected employees, an offer which the Union elected not to reply to at the meeting of March 31. Later, McCall arranged for a meeting to be held on April 1 in South Bend, Indiana, to make it convenient for International Union representative Sam Delfino to attend.[20] While Respondent was present for that meeting (Gordon driving 6 hours from Cincinnati, Ohio), McCall refused to discuss the effects of the closing because Delfino could not be present, and only Delfino had the authority to bargain. McCall told Gordon that Delfino would call Gordon the following day. Delfino did call and asked about setting up another meeting. Gordon agreed to do so, with the sole qualification that he was not going to drive to South Bend again. Delfino then told Gordon that unfair labor practice charges against Respondent would be filed that day, and the request for another meeting apparently was not pursued. The Union thereafter made no further attempts to negotiate the effects of the closing. Respondent was utterly blameless, and I find no violation of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record,[21] I issue the following recommended[22]

ORDER

The complaint herein is dismissed in its entirety.

[18] In 1980, Respondent was unable to renegotiate a favorable price to purchase nest run eggs from Triangle Feed, a supplier of 20 percent of the eggs to the Wabash facility in 1979 and 1980; as a consequence, 10 of Respondent's employees were laid off. However, I acknowledge that part of the reason for the diminishing supply was Respondent's sale of the NK flock.

[19] Peerless Food Products, 231 NLRB 530 (1977), cited by the General Counsel, is thus distinguishable. It holds that the "insistence on the dropping of" a lawsuit as a "precondition" to signing an agreement violates Sec. 8(a)(5).

[20] To the extent that the General Counsel's case is grounded on testimony that the Union threatened on March 31 to file unfair labor practices and Gordon replied that he would meet again after the charges were settled, I discredit such testimony. Despite the alleged threat, Gordon agreed to meet in South Bend on April 7. Contemporaneous notes of Archiable support Gordon's denial of this testimony.

[21] The General Counsel moved to add G.C. Exh. 16, p. 2, thereof, which was inadvertently omitted. There being no opposition, the motion is granted.

[22] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF ELECTIONS

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On petitions duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Michael J. Belo. Following the hearing and pursuant to Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Regional Director for Region 27 transferred this case to the Board for decision. The Employer and the Union filed briefs.

On the entire record in this case, the Board finds

1. The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization which was certified as the majority representative of certain of the Employer's employees.

3. A question of representation affecting commerce exists within the meaning of Section 9(c) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Employer is a Colorado corporation engaged in the retail sale of groceries in Colorado, Utah, and Wyoming. The Union is the certified bargaining representative of four separate geographical units of the Employer's employees in Colorado. One unit encompasses the Employer's stores in Grand Junction and Clifton, one the store in Steamboat Springs, one the store in Aspen, and one the store in Glenwood Springs. The Union and the Employer were parties to a separate collective-bargaining contract for each location, all of which expired on 4 September 1982. When the old contracts expired, the parties were bargaining over the terms of new contracts but had not yet reached agreement.

Between 7 September and 8 November 1982 decertification petitions were filed by employees from each of the four Colorado units. Meanwhile, as a result of charges filed by the Union, the General Counsel issued a complaint on 15 October 1982 alleging, inter alia, that since 5 September 1982 the Employer had been violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by conditioning its contract offer on employees' refraining from engaging in protected activity such as handbilling and picketing. By letters dated 19 October 1982 the Regional Director informed the Petitioners from the Aspen, Steamboat Springs, and Grand Junction units that their petitions were being dismissed because the alleged violation of Section 8(a)(5), unremedied at the time the petitions were filed, precluded the finding of a question concerning representation. The letters further informed the Petitioners that the petitions were subject to reinstatement if appropriate upon their application after the disposition of the unfair labor practice allegations. An identical letter was sent to the Petitioner from the Glenwood Springs unit on 16 November 1982.

The Union and the Employer continued to negotiate over new contracts while the unfair labor practice allegations were pending. On 16 February 1983 they entered into collective-bargaining agreements covering each of the four units. The agreements were to be effective retroactively from 5 September 1982 and to expire on 1 March 1986.

After the agreements were executed, the Union requested withdrawal of the charges that prompted the 15 October 1982 complaint. The Regional Director approved the withdrawal of the charges and dismissed the complaint on 21 March 1983. Thereafter, on various dates in March, April, and May 1983 the Petitioners from all four of the above-described units asked the Regional Director to reinstate their petitions.

The Union contends that the current and valid collective-bargaining agreements executed on 16 February 1983 prevent the subsequently requested reinstatement of the decertification petitions under the Board's discretionary contract-bar doctrine.[1] The Board has established the general rule that where, as here, a contract of definite duration is reduced to writing and executed by both parties, it will act as a bar for up to 3 years of its term to an election petition filed by an employee or rival union after the contract is executed. General Cable Corp., 139 NLRB 1123 (1962); Appalachian Shale Products Co., 121 NLRB 1160 (1958); Pacific Coast Assn. of Pulp Manufacturers, 121 NLRB 990 (1958). If, on the other hand, a petition is filed before the execution date of a contract effective either immediately or retroactively and is otherwise timely, the contract subsequently entered into will not bar the processing of the petition and the holding of an election. Deluxe Metal Furniture Co., 121 NLRB 995 (1958). If the incumbent union prevails in the election held, any contract executed with the employer will be valid and binding; but if the union loses, the contract will be null and void. See RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982) (certification petition filed by rival union) (same rule applied to decertification petitions in Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982)).

[1] The Board has held that in circumstances in which a contract will normally act as a bar it will be disabled from doing so if, for example, it does not contain substantial terms and conditions of employment or embrace an appropriate unit. The parties do not contend that the contracts in themselves lack the requisites established by the Board for valid contract-bars.

Here, the decertification petitions were timely when originally filed according to the Board's contract-bar rules. Each was filed after the prior contracts had expired and before the new contracts were executed. The new contracts therefore would not normally act as a bar to the petitioned-for elections. The Union urges, however, that the new contracts do operate as a bar to the elections because they were executed after the Regional Director had dismissed the petitions and before the requests for reinstatement were made; in other words, during the hiatus in the processing of the petitions caused by the Regional Director's determination that, in view of the pending unfair labor pratice litigation, no question concerning representation could exist. We reject the Union's contention because it attributes undue significance to the Regional Director's dismissal of the petitions here.

As the Union points out, the Regional Director dismissed the petitions pursuant to the Board's "blocking charge" policy as exemplified by Big Three Industries, 201 NLRB 197 (1973). In that case the Board weighed the right of employees under Section 9(c) of the Act to decertify their bargaining representative against the employer's obligation to bargain in good faith. The Board concluded that where a complaint has issued alleging that the employer has refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act and the appropriate remedy if the allegation be proved is an affirmative bargaining order, the employees' opportunity to decertify the union must be postponed pending litigation of the bona fides of the employer's bargaining efforts in order to preserve the orderly procedure of collective bargaining contemplated by the Act. Accordingly, the Board will sustain the Regional Director's dismissal of a decertification petition in the face of unremedied refusal-to-bargain charges under its authority granted by Section 9(c) of the Act to determine if a question of representation warranting an election exists. The Regional Director's dismissal of an election petition in these circumstances does not operate as a determination that the petition itself is defective, i.e., that it does not raise a real question concerning representation because, for example, it lacks a sufficient showing of interest or is tainted by employer support. It merely indicates that the petitioner must await the outcome of the unfair labor practice litigation, at which time he is entitled to request reinstatement of the petition, and that there is no point in processing the petition further because the disposition of the alleged violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act may lead to the issuance of an affirmative bargaining order which would preclude an election for a certain period of time in any event. A dismissal of this kind does not in itself extinguish the employee right to an election invoked by the timely filing of a valid decertification petition.[2]

The unfair labor practice proceedings in anticipation of which the Regional Director dismissed the petitions will not take place since the charges have been withdrawn and the complaint dismissed. Moreover, the Employer and the Union have returned to the bargaining table and agreed upon new contracts. The countervailing considerations that compelled the Board to sustain the dismissal of the decertification petition in Big Three Industries are thus no longer present.[3] Therefore, in accord with the Board's avowed intent to process valid petitions and conduct elections as expeditiously as possible, RCA Del Caribe and Dresser Industries, we will direct reinstatement of the petitions and the holding of elections in each of the designated units.[4]

[2] The Union contends that the Regional Director's determination that no question concerning representation existed became final upon the failure of the Petitioners to request review of the dismissal of their petitions. The Union thus seeks to equate the requests for reinstatement with the untimely filing of new petitions after the current contracts were executed. While the Union's contention that the dismissals were final would be correct had the petitions been dismissed on their merits, there is no requirement that the Petitioners here request such review in order to preserve their ultimate right to request reinstatement of their petitions following the unfair labor practice proceedings. Moreover, for the purpose of applying the Board's contract-bar rules the original filing date of a petition will control where the petition is dismissed on its merits and later reinstated pursuant to a favorable ruling on appeal. Deluxe Metal Furniture, supra at 1001. A fortiori, the original filing date of a petition which is dismissed subject to reinstatement after blocking charges have been resolved, as were the petitions here, controls in determining timeliness.

[3] Member Zimmerman finds no merit in the Union's contention that the withdrawn complaint precludes reinstatement of the petitions. The Union argues that the complaint alleging a violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) involved a substantive refusal to bargain. Therefore, it urges that it is impossible to say whether absent the Employer's refusal to bargain a collective-bargaining agreement would have been signed prior to the filing of the petitions. The chief difficulty with the Union's position is that it in effect urges the Board to find that 8(a)(5) allegations are meritorious solely on the basis that the Regional Director issued a complaint. The Union has withdrawn the charge; as a result the complaint has been dismissed, and no evidence has been presented indicating that the Employer engaged in conduct which would require a finding that the petitions should not be processed. In these circumstances I find no basis for concluding that the Employer engaged in unfair labor practices which preclude reinstating the petitions.

[4] Member Hunter agrees with his colleagues that the circumstances of this case warrant reinstatement of the petitions. In doing so, however, he does not pass on the continued viability of the Board's decision in Big Three Industries.

The parties stipulated at the hearing on the requests for reinstatement that, should an election be directed, the four existing single location units as described in the documents comprising the collective-bargaining agreements entered into on 16 February 1983 are appropriate units.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, concurring.

The Employer contends that RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963 (1982), is controlling. That case holds that an employer must continue to bargain with an incumbent union after a representation petition is filed, but should the parties execute a contract, its validity will rest on the outcome of the petitioned-for election. The same rule was applied to the filing of a decertification petition in Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982). While I do not pass on the wisdom of the rule in RCA Del Caribe and Dresser, which effectively converts a Board-conducted representation election into a ratification vote on an existing contract, I do agree with my colleagues that the circumstances here do not deprive the petitioning employees of their prerogative under Sections 7 and 9(c) of the Act to indicate in a secret-ballot election whether the Union continues to be the majority representative. I therefore concur in the reinstatement of the decertification petitions and the direction of prompt elections.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 30 March 1984 Administrative Law Judge Peter E. Donnelly issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order[4] as modified.

The issue presented in this case is whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by announcing and implementing its last contract offer without having reached a valid impasse in its contract negotiations with the Union. We conclude that the parties never reached that point in their negotiations which warranted the assumption that further bargaining would have been futile.

When the Respondent implemented its last contract offer on 6 June 1983, the parties had not communicated to each other the paramount importance of any of the issues presented at the bargaining table, or that one party's failure to achieve a desired degree of concession on such issues would necessarily deadlock the entire bargaining process. Rather, the parties were continuing to negotiate several significant issues, reaching agreement as to some, exchanging concessions as to others. In the meantime, numerous lesser issues were settled. Indeed, on 2 June, when the Respondent contended impasse was reached, the parties held a lengthy session during which agreement was reached on several items. We agree with the judge, therefore, that the bargaining history does not support the Respondent's claim of impasse and its unilateral implementation of contract terms. Accordingly, the Respondent circumvented its duty to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Henry Miller Spring & Manufacturing Company, Inc., Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b) and reletter subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

"(b) Maintain the terms described in the collective-bargaining agreement with the above-named Union which expired 3 June 1983 until such time as the parties have bargained in good faith and have reached a new agreement or a valid impasse."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(c) Make whole its employees, with interest, for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's implementation on 6 June 1983 of unilateral changes in their wages and working conditions."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

My colleagues have decided to adopt the judge's finding that, during the course of collective-bargaining negotiations, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally implementing its most recent contract proposals at a time when no valid impasse existed.[1] In reaching this conclusion however, my colleagues find it necessary to disassociate themselves from the judge's attempt to justify his no-valid impasse finding on subsequent events which demonstrated that the Respondent continued to bargain in good faith with the Union. I can well understand my colleagues' desire to reject the faulty reasoning offered here by the judge, but in so doing, they have removed the very

[2] In his discussion of the 10 May 1983 bargaining session between the parties, in sec. III,A, par. 6 of his decision, the judge stated, "The Purpose and Intent of the parties provision was modified to eliminate language stating that the 'no-strike' language applied to strikes 'of any kind or nature.'" The Respondent's exceptions correctly assert that the "Purpose and Intent" proposal which it submitted to the Union on 10 May specifically applied the no-strike language to strikes "of any kind or nature."

[3] In affirming the judge's conclusion that no valid impasse existed, we do not rely on his discussion and analysis of the parties' bargaining history after 6 June 1983 in sec. III,B, par. 2 of his decision.

[4] We will modify the recommended Order and notice to require the Respondent to bargain to agreement or until a valid impasse is reached.

We will also extend the Order to require the Respondent to make whole the employees for any lost wages or benefits incurred as a result of the Respondent's unilateral changes in their terms and conditions of employment on 6 June 1983 as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[1] The majority also adopts the judge's finding that the subsequent strike by employees was an unfair labor practice strike.

basis for his finding that a valid impasse did not exist.

In analyzing the issue of whether a valid impasse existed prior to the Respondent's implementation of its contract proposals, it is not necessary to detail the give-and-take that occurred during each of the numerous bargaining sessions. A brief history of the negotiations will suffice.

The Respondent and the Union have been parties to a series of collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which had an expiration date of 30 April 1982. By agreement of the parties, the contract expiration date was first extended until 1 May 1983 and, thereafter, it was extended on a day-to-day basis subject to termination by either party upon a 24-hour written notice. The Respondent served such notice on the Union on 2 June 1983 and the contract terminated the following day.

From the commencement of these negotiations on 21 March 1983 until the implementation of the Respondent's contract proposals on 6 June 1983, the parties held 15 bargaining sessions. During these meetings the parties tentatively agreed on many significant issues and, for all practical purposes they were engaged in good-faith bargaining. However, throughout these meetings the parties experienced little success in resolving certain issues raised in the Respondent's proposals which called for a reduction in wages and benefits, the Respondent's control of the scheduling of work, and a broad management-rights clause. There matters stood until the meeting of 2 June when the Respondent accused the Union of submitting regressive proposals; i.e., pulling back from previously expressed positions. At this juncture, the Respondent notified the Union that it was giving notification of the termination of the contract and of its intention to implement on 6 June the proposals which had been tentatively agreed to as well as the Respondent's latest proposals which had not been agreed on. The Union countered by requesting that the contract be extended for 90 days, but the Respondent refused. The Respondent offered to continue with the negotiations, but the Union declined because it wished to confer with its counsel concerning "the new developments." The next contact between the parties was on 5 June when the Union again urged the extension of the contract and the Respondent refused. The Union then asked if implementation of the Respondent's proposal meant working with reduced wages and benefits and the Respondent answered that it did. This meeting then closed with the understanding that the parties would meet the following morning, 6 June. As found by the judge, the meeting of 6 June was unproductive, the parties merely restating their previously expressed position. On 6 June the Respondent implemented its proposals and the employees went out on strike.

As previously mentioned, my colleagues have correctly rejected the erroneous notion that the Respondent's willingness to continue good-faith bargaining after the implemention of its proposals serves to demonstrate that no impasse was actually arrived at. I presume also, although they have not so indicated, that my colleagues' no-impasse finding does not in any way rest upon the judge's finding that the parties reached agreement on many significant issues. If that is so, what then does their finding rest on? The answer is there is nothing that will support a finding of no-valid impasse.

There is undisputed evidence that the parties were unable to reach agreement on wage and benefit reductions, work scheduling, and a management-rights clause. When the Respondent announced its intention to implement these among other proposals, the Union's only response was that it was their desire that the contract be extended. Even when the Union inquired as to whether the implemented proposals would require that the employees work at reduced wages and benefits and the Respondent answered yes, the Union did not offer anything by way of a counter or suggest that new proposals would be forthcoming. In fact, the Union's actions at these crucial meetings, on 2, 5, and 6 June, would lead one to believe that the Union had decided that it had gone as far as it wished to go and that the only further action it contemplated was a strike.

In such circumstances, I would find that the parties arrived at a valid impasse on or before 6 June and, as a consequence, I would dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with District Lodge 63, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of our employees in the appropriate unit by unlawfully announcing and implementing our last contract proposals, without a valid impasse having been reached. The appropriate unit is:

All production and maintenance employees including working foreman and truckdrivers of Henry Miller Spring & Manufacturing Company, Inc., Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; excluding all office clerical employees, watchmen and guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively in good faith with District Lodge 63, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of all the employees in the above-described unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL maintain the terms described in the collective-bargaining agreement with the above-named Union which expired 3 June 1983 until such time as the parties have bargained in good faith and have reached a new agreement or a valid impasse.

WE WILL make whole our employees, with interest, for any losses they may have suffered by reason of our unlawful implementation on 6 June 1983 of unilateral changes in their wages and working conditions.

WE WILL, on application, offer immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, to all those employees who went out on strike on or after 6 June 1983, dismissing, if necessary, any persons hired on or after that date, and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of pay they have suffered as the result of our refusal, if any, to reinstate them within 5 days of such application.

HENRY MILLER SPRING & MANUFACTURING COMPANY, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

PETER E. DONNELLY, Administrative Law Judge. The original charge in the above-captioned case was filed on June 9, 1983 by District Lodge 63, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union or Charging Party). The charge was amended on July 28, 1983, and on July 29, 1983, a complaint issued alleging that Henry Miller Spring & Manufacturing Company, Inc. (Employer or Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by, during negotiations for a successor contract, announcing the implementation of its last contract offer without a valid impasse having been reached. An answer thereto was timely filed. Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held before me on December 15, 1983. Briefs timely filed by Respondent and the General Counsel have been considered.

I. THE EMPLOYER

The Employer is a Pennsylvania corporation with a facility in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where it is engaged in the manufacture and sale of coil springs. During the year ending June 30, 1983, Respondent purchased and received at its Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

The Union and Respondent have been parties to a series of collective-bargaining agreements. The most recent of these was a 3-year agreement with an expiration date of April 30, 1982. The contract was extended by the parties to May 1, 1983.[1] Upon failure to reach agreement by May 1, the contract was extended for a short period of time and finally extended on a day-to-day basis subject to termination by either party upon 24-hour written notice. Respondent served on the Union the written notice terminating the contract on June 3, and a strike began on June 6.

During the period from March 21 until the beginning of the strike on June 6, a series of some 15 meetings took place at which agreement was reached on many contract provisions and others modified after negotiation, but without final agreement. At these sessions, Respondent was represented by R. Mark Solano, attorney-negotiator, while the Union's spokesman was James L. Elnyszky, directing business representative. At the initial negotiating session on March 21, Respondent presented to the Union, as its proposal, a full blown collective-bargaining agreement. This contract differed substantially, in both form and content, from the agreement then in effect. The language of the management-rights clause of the proposed contract was quite comprehensive.[2]

[2] It reads as follows:

ARTICLE 31–MANAGEMENT RIGHTS

Continued

In addition, the proposed contract provided for a 20-percent reduction in wages from the wage rates then in effect. The existing contract also provided for a 5-day workweek, Monday through Friday. The Company, desiring greater flexibility in that regard, proposed a work schedule within its sole discretion.[3] The March 21 meeting accomplished little more than the submission of the Company's proposal to the Union. A second meeting was held on April 13, at which there was general discussion devoted primarily to differentiating the Company's proposal from the existing contract.

April 25, the parties met for the third time. The Union submitted its first written proposal, which essentially provided for a 1-year contract with various improvements from the existing contract. Those improvements included a 20-percent wage increase, cost-of-living adjustment, and with respect to "Hours of Work," sought a guaranteed 35-hour workweek of 5 consecutive days at 7 hours per day, Monday through Friday. Solano testified that this proposal was not "responsive" to the Company's proposal. However, progress was made as to other contract provisions and by the end of this session tentative agreements had been reached on provisions dealing with recognition, union shop, checkoff, military service, savings clause, and arbitration.

At the next negotiating session on May 5, the parties continued to bargain and succeeded in reaching tentative agreements on several more contract provisions, i.e., bulletin boards, alteration of agreement, and leaves of absence.

At the May 10 bargaining session the Company submitted to the Union revised management-rights, hours of work, and "Purpose and Intent" proposals. The management-rights section was modified to add language limiting the right of discharge for cause to add "or other legitimate reason." As to hours of work, language was added to reflect that the Company would attempt to schedule workdays Monday through Friday and hours of work for the daylight shift to between 7 a.m. and 4 p.m. The Purpose and Intent of the parties' provision was modified to eliminate language stating that the "no-strike" language applied to strikes "of any kind or nature."

The next bargaining session was held on May 13. Discussion took place and agreement was reached at this meeting on several contract proposals dealing with the Purpose and Intent provision, shop committee, grievance, discharge and discipline, and picket line. The Purpose and Intent provision, as agreed to, includes the broad "no-strike" language contained in the Company's proposal of May 10, while Respondent accepted language defining the Union's responsibility in strike situations.

At the next negotiating session on May 19, negotiations continued and much of the discussion involved the workweek issue. The Union retreated from its written submission of April 21 and proposed scheduling 5 days on and 5 days off so as to meet the problem of a split workweek, and expressed a willingness to accept a guaranteed workweek of fewer days, as few as 3 days per week. Respondent also backed off previously held positions on the matter of paid holidays by adding an additional paid holiday; on the matter of severance pay, by improving it; and the matter of call-in pay and reporting pay by agreeing to provisions as they were in the existing contract.

The meeting on May 20 produced tentative agreement on those provisions involving reporting pay, visitation, availability of agreement, and discrimination. The Company also agreed to add dependent coverage as it had appeared in the existing contract and to eliminate that portion of its proposal that eliminated dependents coverage.

The next meeting on May 24 was spent discussing, without significant progress, the hours of work provision. As to the management-rights provision, the Union expressed its desire to return to the language of the existing contract. Solano, however, maintained the Company's position that it wanted to retain the management-rights proposal as it appeared in its original proposal.

The rights of management described above and all other inherent rights of management not expressly limited by a specific provision of this Agreement are vested exclusively in the Company.

31.2 With respect to hirings, firings, lay-offs, recalls, transfers, and work assignments, the Company shall be the sole and final judge as to the qualifications of its employees, unless otherwise specifically provided for in this Agreement.

31.3 The Company and the Union agree that this Agreement contains their full and complete understanding and that any prior practices, benefits or oral agreements, except as specifically referred to in this Agreement, are superseded by the terms of this Agreement. The Company and the Union further agree that no oral understandings, practices or benefits will be recognized or regarded as binding unless committed to writing and signed by the parties as a supplement to this Agreement and that the Company may, in its discretion, discontinue or modify the provision of any benefit or privileges not required under this Agreement.

ARTICLE 6–HOURS OF WORK

6.1 The Company shall establish a work schedule in accordance with the Company's need to satisfy the delivery requirements of its customers and the overall dictates of business. This work schedule shall be established at the Company's sole discretion and shall include the number of days per week, the number of shifts per day, the starting time of each shift and the number of hours to be worked on each shift. Starting time, lunch period and quitting time in the various classifications shall be established by the Company in order to achieve a high level of uninterrupted productivity and employee performance.

At the May 26 session, further discussion ensued concerning the management-rights proposal. The Union offered to accept, as the management-rights provision, the first nine lines of the Respondent's management-rights proposal, adding "just" before "cause" on line seven and a period after "work" on line nine, so as to read:

ARTICLE 31–MANAGEMENT RIGHTS

31.1 Except as expressly limited by a specific provision of this Agreement, the Company reserves and retains and shall continue to have the sole and exclusive right to manage its business and direct the working forces, including, but not limited to, the right to plan, direct, and control operations, the right to hire, suspend, discipline, discharge for just cause or other legitimate reasons, the right to maintain order and efficiency, transfer or promote, or to relieve employees from active duty because of lack of work.

On May 27 the Union offered several modifications to previous positions, as did the Company. The Union agreed to accept a 3-year contract, as proposed by the Company. The Union also agreed essentially to abandon its proposal on hours of work and overtime and to accept the existing contract language as to those items. The Company agreed to reduce its wage reduction demand from 20 percent to 15 percent and also agreed to schedule workdays beginning with Monday, with the understanding that employees could be recalled later in the workweek as dictated by production needs.

On June 2, the last meeting before the strike, continuing give-and-take in discussion led to agreement being reached as to the matters of nonbargaining unit employees, statute of limitations, jury duty, and overtime. It was also at the June 2 meeting that the Union made new proposals with the view to reaching agreement on a management-rights provision. These were a provision prohibiting the subcontracting of bargaining unit work; a "coverage" provision generally providing for contract coverage in the event of mergers, sales, transfers, etc.; and a provision defining the Company's right to establish reasonable work rules. Solano summarily rejected these proposals as "unresponsive." Solano testified, "My feeling at this point is that this was not responsive to the Company's request on the management rights proposal and that in fact the Union had made new proposals which were in fact going backward, pulling away from the position that they had already come to and in fact were putting additional burdens on the Company in this regard. This also resulted in the termination of the contract at that time, serving a letter which is in evidence."

Thus Solano presented the Union with a typed letter giving the requisite written 24-hour notice terminating the day-to-day extension of the contract, to be effective the following day at 3 p.m. Elnyszky, who testified that he was "shocked," requested a further 90-day extention of the contract to pursue negotiations, which Solano rejected. Elnyszky inquired about the availability of work the following week beginning Monday, June 6. Solano told him that work would be available; however, such work would be performed under the terms of those contract provisions on which tentative agreement had been reached, and Respondent's last proposal as to those provisions on which no agreement had been reached. Solano did, however, express a desire to continue the negotiations on June 2, but the Union declined further negotiations on that date because it wanted to consult counsel about the new developments. On June 3, Solano wrote a letter, apparently hand-delivered to the Union, confirming the terms under which work would be available on June 6 and expressing a willingness to continue negotiations.

Elnyszky next contacted Solano on Sunday, June 5. Elnyszky told Solano that the union members were ready and willing to work under the terms of the terminated contract, and that the Union was willing to extend that contract. Elnyszky asked if Respondent's proposal meant working with the reduced wages and benefits of the most recent company proposals and Solano replied affirmatively. During this conversation, a meeting was arranged for the morning of Monday, June 6. Elnyszky and Solano met about 7 a.m.; however this meeting was unproductive, both parties reiterating previously expressed positions. The employees did not report to work on June 6 since they were unwilling to accept the reduced wages and modified working conditions put into effect by the Company at that time. They have been on strike since that time.

The parties did, however, continue to meet. On June 15, they reached agreement on a seniority clause. On August 10 they reached agreement on a management-rights clause, including a provision limiting the subcontracting of unit work. The management-rights provision was one of the items which precipitated the Company's termination of the contract on June 2. Including the meeting on June 6, 12 bargaining sessions have been held since the strike began on various dates in June, July, August, October, November, and December 14, the day before the hearing in the instant case which produced agreement on call-in pay and pension provisions.

One of the most vexing negotiating items involved the temporary transfer of unit employees from one job to another. The existing contract provides for temporary transfers to be paid the higher wage rate. Also, as a matter of past practice, and not any specific contract provision, when an employee was so transferred from one job to another, the job from which he was transferred could not be filled for the day. In some of the earlier discussions, particularly May 5, and as a part of a more comprehensive discussion about management rights, Respondent proposed to modify that practice to permit the Company to fill the transferee's job for the day. The Union opposed this proposal, and a discussion on that subject in various subsequent meetings failed to produce agreement. After the strike began, in negotiations on July 25 the Company submitted a proposal dealing with temporary transfers and the Union responded thereto on August 10; however, despite discussions through December 14, the day before the hearing in the instant case, agreement has not yet been reached on that aspect of the temporary transfer issue regarding the Company's right to replace the transferee, although agreement was reached as noted above, on a management-rights provision on August 10.

B. Discussion and Analysis

The General Counsel contends that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by announcing and implementing its last contract offer despite the fact that no invalid impasse in contract negotiations had been reached. Respondent argues that impasse had been reached and accordingly it was entitled to implement its last contract offer.

Applicable precedent makes it clear that the parties in this case had an obligation to bargain in good faith over the terms of a new contract. However, this obligation does not run to infinity, and if a valid impasse had been reached in the negotiating process, Respondent would have been free to announce and implement its last contract offer. Presto Casting Co., 262 NLRB 346 (1982). Thus the controlling question is whether or not a valid impasse existed at the time Respondent announced and implemented its last contract offer, together with the other contract provisions tentatively agreed to at that time. Having carefully examined the entire record herein, I am convinced that no valid impasse existed.

First, a review of the sessions prior to June 2 discloses that substantial progress had been made and agreement had been reached on 22 contract provisions, many of which were significant, including union shop, checkoff, arbitration, discharge, and discipline, and reporting pay. The last of the sessions on May 27 produced substantial concessions from the Union in agreeing to modify its proposal from a 1-year contract to a 3-year contract, as proposed by the Respondent, and proposing to substitute the language of the existing contract for its proposal as to overtime and hours of work. Respondent also showed a willingness to compromise by reducing its wage reduction demand from 20 percent to 15 percent, and agreeing to a workweek beginning on Monday.

These sorts of substantial and productive negotiations certainly do not suggest the existence of an impasse. Similarly, on June 2, the day on which Respondent contends that an impasse was reached, parties held a lengthy and productive negotiating session during which agreement was reached on several more contract items.

Even as Respondent terminated the contract and declared the existence of an impasse, Respondent expressed its intention to pursue negotiations and negotiating sessions were held all during the period of the strike and continuing until the day preceding the hearing in the instant case. Not only were negotiating sessions continued, but agreement was reached on several outstanding contract items, including one which had proved most troublesome during prior negotiations, namely a management-rights article, including a paragraph limiting Respondent's right to subcontract work.

In summary, nothing in this record suggests that continued bargaining would have been futile. Rather quite the opposite, where the facts show that continued bargaining could, and did result in agreement on several contract provisions. In these circumstances I cannot conclude that an impasse in negotiations existed at the time Respondent announced and implemented its contract proposals.

The General Counsel also contends that Respondent refused to bargain, violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, by proposing and continuing to insist on an overly broad management-rights clause. The Supreme Court has held that the mere insistence on a management-rights clause is not a per se violation of the Act. NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395 (1952). However, the General Counsel argues that, by submitting to the Union a predictably unacceptable management-rights proposal, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I do not agree. The record herein discloses that the management-rights proposal begins with the phrase, "Except as expressly limited by a specific provision of this agreement". Such language provides the parties with the opportunity to negotiate other contract provisions in derogation of and limiting the effect of the management-rights proposal as written. The fact is that there was substantial negotiation, modification, and eventual agreement on a management-rights proposal. In these circumstances I conclude that, despite the comprehensive language of the Respondent's management-rights proposal, it was not submitted in bad faith and no 8(a)(5) violation can be predicated thereon.

2. The unfair labor practice strike

There remains for resolution the question of whether Respondent's unfair labor practices caused the Union to strike on June 6. The record supports this conclusion.

On June 2, Respondent terminated the existing contract and, as I have concluded, committed the unfair labor practice of announcing that, as to the contract items still open, it would implement its most recent contract proposals. While work was available on June 6, it was available only under those conditions. The Union suggested continuing to work under the terms of the existing contract, but Respondent refused. Respondent reiterated its position on June 5 and 6, and the Union, unwilling to work under those reduced conditions, went on strike. Clearly the reason for the Union's refusal to work was Respondent's unfair labor practices. The cause-and-effect relationship between the Respondent's labor practices and the Union's refusal to work is manifest, and I conclude that Respondent's unfair labor practices caused the strike in the instant case.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent as set forth in section III, above, in connection with Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close and intimate relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices, I recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having concluded that the strike which began on June 6, 1983, was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception, I find that it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to order Respondent to offer to all strikers who make unconditional offers to return to work immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, dismissing, if necessary, any person hired on or after June 6, 1983, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may suffer as a result of Respondent's refusal, if any, to reinstate them in a timely fashion, by payment to each of them a sum of money equal to what they would have earned as wages during the period commencing 5 days after the date on which each one unconditionally offers to return to work to the date of Respondent's offer of reinstatement, less any net earnings during such period, with backpay and interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[4] The Board has found that the 5-day period is a reasonable accommodation between the interests of the employees in returning to work as quickly as possible and the employer's need to effectuate that return in a orderly manner. Accordingly, if Respondent herein has already rejected, or hereafter rejects, unduly delays, or ignores any unconditional offer to return to work, or attaches unlawful conditions to its offer of reinstatement, the 5-day period serves no useful purpose and backpay will commence as of the unconditional offer to return to work.

Any dispute as to who is to be offered reinstatement and what backpay if any is due shall, if necessary, be determined at the compliance stage of this proceeding.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. District Lodge 63, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees including working foreman and truckdrivers of Henry Miller Spring & Manufacturing Company, Inc., Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; excluding all office clerical employees, watchmen and guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. At all times material herein District Lodge 63, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act for all of Respondent's employees employed in the unit described above in Conclusion of Law 3.

5. The strike which commenced on June 6, 1983, was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception.

6. By unlawfully announcing on June 2 and implementing on June 6 its last contract proposals, without a valid impasse having been reached, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(l) and (5) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

Respondent, Henry Miller Spring & Manufacturing Company, Inc., Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain in good faith with District Lodge 63, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate unit set forth herein above by unlawfully announcing on June 2 and implementing on June 6 its last contract proposals, without a valid impasse having been reached.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Bargain collectively and in good faith with District Lodge 63, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of all the employees in the above-described unit and embody any understanding reached in a signed agreement.

(b) Honor and enforce the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement with the above-named Union which expired June 3, 1983, until a new agreement is reached.

(c) On application, offer immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, to all those employees who went on strike on June 6, 1983, or thereafter, dismissing if necessary any person hired by the Respondent on or after that date, and make them whole for any loss of pay which they may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's refusal, if any, to reinstate them in conformity with the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(e) Post at its premises at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 18 July 1983 Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge concluded that the Respondent's failure to sign and implement a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. He found that Union Negotiator John Gonzales' misrepresentation to Respondent Negotiator Steven Laiderman regarding the status of a competitor's wage and pension offer was insufficient basis to warrant avoidance of the contract upon which oral agreement had been reached. The Respondent excepts to the judge's finding and contends that the Union's misrepresentation regarding the outcome of the ratification vote by employees of the Respondent's competitor justified avoidance of the agreement. For the reasons set forth below we agree with the Respondent's contentions.

The Respondent is engaged in the wholesale and retail sale of automobile tires in the Belleville, Illinois area. It was a party to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union which was effective from 1 July 1979 to 30 June 1982.[2] On 17 June the Respondent along with 10 other tire dealers in the area began negotiations with the Union. The Respondent's counsel Steven Laiderman represented the employer group and John Gonzales represented the Union. However, the Employers did not bargain as an association and each bargained for its own agreement.

By 28 September the Union and the employer including the Respondent reached agreement on all bargaining issues except for wages and pension plan contributions. On 28 September the employees, excluding the Respondent, proposed to the Union an annual raise of 40 cents per hour for each of the 3 contract years and pension payments of $16, $18.50, and $21 a week during the 3 successive years. That same day the Respondent's major competitor in the area, the Wells Tire group[3] (hereinafter Wells) which was conducting separate negotiations and had also reached agreement on remaining bargaining issues, offered the Union a wage and pension package. The Wells proposal called for a wage increase of 20 cents per hour in each of the 3 contract years and weekly pension contribution of $13, $13, and $16 over the 3 contract years.

On 30 September Gonzales called Laiderman. He advised Laiderman that he would be conducting a union meeting that night so that the various employers' employees could vote on the wage and pension proposals. Laiderman told Gonzales that if the Wells employees voted for a 20-cent package that is what he wanted and that he would not accept a package that was different or for more money and pension benefits than Wells. He further advised Gonzales that if the Wells employees rejected the 20-cent package then he would probably go along with everyone else. Gonzales was then instructed to call Laiderman that evening to inform him how the employees voted.

That evening at approximately 7 p.m. Gonzales did call Laiderman and advised him that the Respondent's employees had rejected the 20-cent package. Laiderman then asked how the Wells employees voted. Gonzales responded that Wells had nothing to do with the Respondent because they were in a different area and that all of the employers in the Respondent's area had accepted the 40-cent package. After Laiderman repeated his question regarding the Wells vote Gonzales told him that the Wells employees had rejected the 20-cent package. Laiderman then stated that "he would go along with the rest of them," referring to the 40-cent package.

Gonzales' statement to Laiderman that the Wells employees had rejected the 20-cent offer was a misrepresentation. The Wells employees did not vote on any proposal until after the completion of the above telephone conversation and they voted to accept the 20-cent offer.[4]

In December Gonzales sent Laiderman a copy of the contract with the 40-cent package. Laiderman

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is hereby denied as the record, the exceptions, and the briefs adequately present the issues and positions of the parties.

[3] This group of five stores was bargaining as an association.

[4] At the hearing, Gonzales admitted that the Wells employees did not vote until after his conversation with Laiderman.

refused to sign the contract after learning that the Wells employees had accepted the 20-cent offer.[5]

The judge found that Gonzales' statement regarding the Wells employees' rejection of the 20-cent offer was a misrepresentation. However the judge concluded that it was not a material misrepresentation reasoning that, if the Respondent wanted parity with Wells, the material fact would have been what wage and pension proposal Wells agreed to rather than what the Wells employees rejected.

Contrary to the judge, we conclude that Gonzales' misrepresentation to Laiderman was not made in good faith and justifies the Respondent's refusal to sign or implement the agreement. The misrepresentation that the Wells employees had rejected the 20-cent package goes to the ultimate issue of whether the Respondent desired to reach agreement on the 40-cent package. Here Gonzales was told specifically that the Respondent wanted the same wage and pension contract as its competitor and Gonzales as union negotiator was in a superior position to know how the competitors' employees voted on the package. It follows that Gonzales' deliberate misrepresentation regarding the Wells employees' vote was intended to and had the effect of inducing the Respondent to accept the 40-cent package. In view of the good-faith considerations which underscore Section 8(d) affecting all parties' dealings in the collective-bargaining framework, the Respondent's refusal to sign or implement an agreement which was the direct result of the Union's deceit is not unlawful. We shall therefore dismiss the complaint in its entirety.[6]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[5] Laiderman became aware of the Wells employees' ratification of the 20-cent offer after receiving a copy of an unfair labor practice charge in late December which had been filed by Wells against the Union for its refusal to sign the contract. The claim was settled by the Union agreeing to accept the 20-cent package.

[6] Member Zimmerman notes that agreement by the Wells group to the same package that the Union proposed to the Respondent was not a condition precedent to a collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union. Even if it were a condition precedent, he notes that, in a collective-bargaining context such as in the instant case, the Board is not strictly bound by technical rules of contract law, including, for example, strict notions of condition precedent. See generally Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co., 251 NLRB 187 (1980), enfd. 659 F.2d 87 (8th Cir. 1981). See also NLRB v. Donkins Inn, 532 F.2d 138 (9th Cir. 1976), enfg. 214 NLRB 1 (1974). It is true that, where parties have actually reached agreement, the Board normally will require that the agreement be incorporated in writing and signed. However, in the instant case, Laiderman had explicitly stated that "if Wells got a 20 cent package, that's what I want." Knowing this, when Laiderman asked Gonzales what the Wells employees had done, Gonzales told Laiderman that they had rejected the 20-cent package, when in fact they had not yet even voted. Gonzales obviously felt that the only way he could get what he wanted from Laiderman was to consciously mislead him. In such circumstances, Member Zimmerman agrees with his colleagues that the Board cannot condone such tactics in bargaining.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on May 24, 1983, in St. Louis, Missouri, based on an unfair labor practice charge filed by Teamsters, Automotive, Petroleum and Allied Trades, Local Union No. 50, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America (Local 50 or the Union), on January 7, 1983, and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 14 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board), on February 10, 1983. The complaint alleges that Banner Tire Company, Inc. (Banner or Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by failing and refusing to execute and implement an agreed-to collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent's timely filed answer denies that any agreement to the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement was validly reached.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent.

Based on the entire record,[1] including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS AND THE UNION'S LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Respondent is a Missouri corporation, engaged in the wholesale and retail sale and distribution of automobile tires and related products and services, with an office and place of business in Belleville, Illinois, and other places of business in the State of Missouri. Only its Belleville, Illinois facility is involved in this proceeding. The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that Respondent is an employer, engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Background

The Union, and its predecessor, Teamsters Local 971, which merged into Local 50 in June 1980, have represented Respondent's Belleville employees in the following unit, appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act, for a number of years:

[1] The General Counsel's unopposed motion to correct the record is granted.

> All vulcanizers, recappers, tire repairmen, tire changers, wheel balancers, front end men, brakemen, tune up men, road and pick-up men, battery men and glass installers at Respondent's Belleville, Illinois store excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The collective-bargaining agreement between Teamsters Local 971 and Respondent, which was assumed by Local 50, was effective from July 1, 1979, to June 30, 1982.[2]

Negotiations were opened by a timely letter from the Union and the first bargaining session was held on June 17. Respondent bargained jointly with a number of other employers in the same industry. However, they did not bargain as an association; each bargained for its own agreement. Steven Laiderman, Respondent's in-house counsel, was Banner's spokesman and, together with a representative of the Bond Stores, was the principal spokesmen for all of the employers. Business agent John Gonzales was the Union's negotiator. Separate negotiations were being conducted between the Union and the Wells group of five stores, which, it was ultimately determined, were bargaining as an association. The Wells group, Laiderman testified, was Respondent's competitor in the wholesale tire market.

By September 28, after a series of meetings, the Union and the employer group which included Banner had agreed on all of the terms of their collective-bargaining agreements except wages and the welfare and pension plan contributions. On September 28, Bond and the other stores, except Banner, offered the Union a package which included a 40-cent-per-hour wage increase in each of the 3 years of the contract plus welfare and pension fund contributions of $16 per week per employee in the first year of the agreement, $18.50 per week in the second year, and $21 per week in the third. At the same time, the Wells group was offering a contract package which included wage increases of 20 cents per hour in each of the 3 years and pension and welfare fund contributions of $13, $13, and $16 weekly.

B. The Disputed Conversations

On the morning of September 30, Gonzales called Laiderman and told him that the Union would be meeting with the employees that evening to consider the employers' offers. He told Laiderman what Bond and the other Belleville tire stores had offered, i.e., the 40-cent package, and asked Laiderman what Banner was going to do. According to Gonzales, Laiderman asked what the Wells group was offering and was told of the 20-cent package. Laiderman asked that Gonzales first present the 20-cent package to his employees for a vote and asked further that Gonzales call him at home that evening to let him know how the employees voted. Laiderman's version is slightly different. On direct examination he testified that he asked Gonzales what the Wells group was offering, saying that "if Wells got a 20 cent package, that's what I want." Responding to a leading question and in conclusionary terms, he further testified that "ratification of the same package as the Wells group" was "a condition precedent to any agreement between Banner and Local 50." More specifically, when questioned by the judge, he claimed to have told Gonzales that he "was not going to accept a package any different or for more money and pension than the Wells group," that "it would come down to if Wells rejects the 20 cent package, then I would probably go along with everyone else."

Gonzales met with the employees of the various tire companies on September 30. The employees of Bond and Kenny each voted to accept their employers' 40-cent contract package offers. Gonzales then presented the 20-cent package to the Banner employees and they rejected it.

As Laiderman had requested, Gonzales called him immediately after the vote. Listening to their conversation on a speaker phone was Robert Yock, a Banner employee. As Laiderman recalled this conversation, Gonzales told him that his employees had rejected the 20-cent package. Laiderman asked, "What did the Wells people do?" Gonzales replied, "The Wells people had nothing to do with us because they were in a different area, that all the people in Belleville had accepted the 40 cent package," and asked what Banner was going to do. Laiderman repeated his question, "What did the Wells people do?" Gonzales told him, "The Wells people had rejected the 20 cent offer" and, when he was again asked what he would do, Laiderman told Gonzales that "he would go along with the rest of them," i.e., the Belleville employers.

The version of this conversation presented by Gonzales and Yock varies in only one particular. As they described it, when Laiderman asked what the Wells people had done, Gonzalez only said that the Wells offer was of no concern to him and did not tell Laiderman that the employees of Wells had rejected the 20-cent package. Laiderman then asked what Bond, Kenny, and the others with whom Banner had been bargaining had done and was told that Bond and Kenny had agreed to the 40-cent package. To this, Laiderman allegedly stated, "I guess if those people offered that, I have to offer the same thing."

Gonzales confirmed that Laiderman was offering the Banner employees the 40-cent package, took that package to the employees, and received their assent to it.

According to both Gonzales and Yock, the Wells group employees did not vote on their employer's proposal until after the conversation between Gonzales and Laiderman. Moreover, when they voted, two ballots were taken. Initially, all of the Wells stores' employees voted as a single group and accepted the proposal. Then, on objection by some of the employees, separate votes were taken for each of the five Wells stores. The employees of some stores accepted the 20-cent package; others rejected it. The ratification of the Wells group offer became the subject of unfair labor practice charges filed by both Wells and the Union. An unfair labor practice complaint issued on the basis of the employer's charge which alleged that the contract had properly been ratified by the vote of all five stores' employees voting as an associationwide unit. That complaint was settled when the Union signed a contract with Wells, providing for the 20-cent package in the associationwide unit.

C. Refusal to Sign or Implement

In November, Gonzales sent Laiderman a letter setting forth the terms of the agreement which the Union believed had been reached on September 30, i.e., the 40-cent package. Subsequently, Gonzales asked Laiderman when he intended to pay the employees their backpay. Laiderman acknowledged his obligation to make those payments but asked whether he could do so in two payments. Gonzales checked with the employees and informed Laiderman that they would not agree to such a payment plan. Laiderman made no reference at this time to there being any error in the Union's interim agreement.

In early December, the Union sent each of the employers, including Banner, the contract for signing. On December 6, Gonzales called Laiderman to ask whether he had received and reviewed the contract. Laiderman stated that he had reviewed it, that it looked to be in order, and that he would sign it after he had his attorney look it over. He would pay the backpay, he said, as soon as the contract was approved by that attorney.

In December, Laiderman saw a copy of the complaint against the Union which was based on Wells' unfair labor practice charge. This was his first knowledge, he said, that the Wells employees had accepted the 20-cent package. Laiderman then told Gonzales that he was not prepared to sign the contract unless the Union gave Banner the wages and welfare and pension fund agreements reached in the Union-Wells negotiations. Gonzales told Laiderman that he could not do that because the Banner employees had rejected that offer while the Wells employees had accepted it.

Respondent has not signed the 40-cent package agreement proffered by the Union, and it has not implemented the wage, pension, or welfare fund contributions called for in that agreement.[3]

D. Discussion

The General Counsel contends that the testimony of Gonzales and Yock must be credited and that, based on their testimony, I must find that there was complete agreement to the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent, arguing the credibility of Laiderman, asserts that "ratification of the same contract by Wells" was an unfulfilled "condition precedent to an agreement with Banner" and that, therefore, "there was no agreement." Respondent further argues that, even if an agreement was reached, it was avoidable because it was based on a material misrepresentation.

While I have essentially found Laiderman's recollection of the conversations to be more accurate than those of either Gonzales or Yock, I find that full agreement had been reached and that there had been no material misrepresentation justifying avoidance of that agreement. I find, as Laiderman testified on direct examination, that Laiderman told Gonzales that he wanted to know what the Wells group was "going to do because if Wells got a 20 cent package, that's what I want." However, I do not find that Laiderman told Gonzales specifically or in haec verba that agreement to the same package as the Wells group was a "condition precedent" to their reaching an agreement. Parity with the wages and benefits paid by the Wells group was obviously and understandably Laiderman's goal and Laiderman expressed this to Gonzales. However, his statement to Gonzales was merely the expression of a bargaining position and, I find, did not establish achievement of that position as a condition precedent to agreement.

Similarly, while I credit Laiderman over Gonzales and Yock with respect to the conversation in the evening of September 30, I find no material misrepresentation. Laiderman's response to Gonzales, to the effect that he would have to offer the 40-cent package which the other Belleville stores had offered, only makes sense if he had been told that the Wells group employees had rejected the 20-cent package. Laiderman knew, from his earlier conversation with Gonzales, what Bond was offering and he had expressed his opposition to making a similar offer. If, as Gonzales and Yock testified, Laiderman had only been told that the Bond employees had accepted the 40-cent offer, he would not have been impelled to make that same 40-cent offer. Similarly, he would not have been persuaded to make such an offer merely because Gonzales told him that "Wells' offer was of no concern to him." However, at best, Gonzales only told Laiderman that the Wells employees had rejected the 20-cent package. Laiderman did not ask, and he was not told, whether the Wells group had then agreed to pay the 40-cent package. If parity with Wells was of such critical importance to Respondent, the material fact would have been what Wells had agreed to, not what the Wells employees had rejected. Perhaps Laiderman assumed that rejection of the 20-cent package by the employees of Wells would have forced Wells to accept the 40-cent package, but the record herein provides no basis for him to have made such an assumption. Moreover, as subsequent events reveal, there appears to have been a substantial dispute over whether the Wells employees had accepted their employer's offer. Both Wells and the Union filed unfair labor practice charges and it was not until a complaint issued based on Wells' charge that the dispute was resolved and an agreement, on the 20-cent package, was finalized. In all of these circumstances, I find that Gonzales' statement to the effect that the Wells employees had rejected their employer's offer was not a material misrepresentation.

Accordingly, I must conclude that Respondent offered its employees the 40-cent package, those employees accepted that package, all aspects of the collective-bargaining agreement had thus been agreed to, and Respondent was statutorily obligated to execute that agreed-to contract when the Union proffered it. Its failure to do so, and its failure to give effect to the terms and conditions of that agreement, is violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1)

FURTHER CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The following employees of Banner Tire Company, Inc. constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All vulcanizers, recappers, tire repairmen, tire changers, wheel balancers, front end men, brakemen, tune up men, road and pick-up men, battery men and glass installers at Respondent's Belleville, Illinois store excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. At all times since at least October 23, 1979, Banner Tire Company, Inc. has recognized and bargained with Teamsters, Automotive, Petroleum and Allied Trades, Local Union No. 50, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, or its predecessor, Automotive, Petroleum and Allied Trades, Local Union No. 971, as the designated exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the above-described unit.

3. By refusing to bargain collectively in good faith with Teamsters, Automotive, Petroleum and Allied Trades, Local Union No. 50, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America by refusing, upon request, to sign the collective-bargaining agreement submitted by said Union in December 1982, embodying the terms and conditions of employment on which the parties had reached agreement on September 30, 1982, and refusing to give effect to such contract retroactive to July 1, 1982, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. Respondent did not commit any unfair labor practices not specifically found herein.[4]

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent has failed and refused to sign the collective-bargaining agreement embodying the understanding which the parties reached on September 30, 1982, I shall recommend that it be ordered, on request, to sign said collective-bargaining agreement forthwith. In addition, I shall recommend that it be ordered to give effect to the terms of said agreement retroactive to July 1, 1982, and make the employees whole for any losses they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's failure to execute and implement the aforesaid agreement, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner described in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[4] The complaint had also alleged a discriminatory failure to implement the agreement in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3). There was no evidence of discriminatory motivation, the 8(a)(3) allegation, if proven, would not have affected the remedy herein, it was not pursued in the General Counsel's brief and, it appears, that allegation has implicitly been withdrawn.

Albany Medical Center Hospital and New York State Nurses Association, Petitioner. Case 3–RC–8289

14 December 1984

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered determinative challenges in an election held 23 September 1982 [1] and the Acting Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to the Decision and Direction of Election issued by the Regional Director on 17 August. The tally of ballots shows 259 for and 303 against the Petitioner, with 100 challenged ballots.[2]

Following a hearing conducted on 19 through 21 July, the Regional Director for Region 3 issued his Decision and Direction of Election referred to above and determined that, contrary to the Employer's assertion, its 94 assistant head nurses and operating room charge nurses (all referred to as AHNs)[3] are not supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and that they should be included in the following described unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time registered professional nurses, and all persons authorized by permit to practice as registered professional nurses, employed by the Employer in the nursing department to perform registered professional nursing, including assistant head nurses and operating room charge nurses; excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.[4]

The Employer subsequently filed a request for review which was denied by the Board. However, as there remained unresolved the question of whether AHNs assume supervisory authority when they substitute for head nurses, the Board directed that the AHNs vote subject to challenge.

In the ensuing investigation of those challenged ballots, both the Employer and the Union acknowledged that, although AHNs substitute to varying extents for head nurses, they do not assume additional duties on these occasions. Since it had previously been determined that the AHNs' regular duties do not support a finding that they are supervisors, the Acting Regional Director, on 20 October, issued his Report on Challenges in which he found that mere substitution for head nurses was insufficient to confer supervisory status on AHNs and recommended that the challenges to their ballots be overruled.

The Employer has filed timely exceptions to the Acting Regional Director's report in which it reasserts its contention that AHNs' performance of their regular duties—irrespective of their substituting for head nurses—compels a finding that they are supervisors. Having reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and briefs, we agree.

The Employer is a 720-bed hospital that employs 3300 employees, approximately 725 of whom are registered nurses. The Employer's nursing department is comprised of four nursing divisions and is further broken down into nursing units. The nursing department is headed by an assistant vice president of nursing and each of its divisions is headed by an assistant director of nursing. Nine supervisors of nursing and 12 assistant supervisors run the several units. Supervisors of nursing generally work the day shift while assistant supervisors work the evening and night shifts. Next in the department's supervisory hierarchy are 43 head nurses who usually work the day shift. The 94 AHNs, whose status is at issue in this proceeding, work all three shifts. Those AHNs assigned to the day shift report to the head nurses on duty and the AHNs assigned to the evening and night shifts report to the assistant supervisors on duty.

AHNs spend an average of 50 percent of their time taking care of patients' needs and the rest of their time performing administrative tasks. AHNs are primarily responsible for ensuring that staffing requirements for subsequent shifts are met. Although basic schedules are prepared by computer in accordance with a staffing formula, AHNs adjust the base schedules to reflect nurses' vacation and personal days. The AHNs do have authority to grant days off so long as staffing levels are met. AHNs also have authority to request that nurses work overtime although only head nurses and nursing supervisors can compel nurses to do so. Additionally, AHNs initial the timecards of nurses who work overtime and those whom they allow to start shifts early or leave early. No one below the level of AHN has authority to adjust schedules, initial timecards, or otherwise affect nurses' hours of work. Additionally, AHNs have authority to issue written warnings to nurses. These warnings are re-

[1] All dates are in 1982.

[2] Six ballots were challenged on the basis that the names of the voters casting them did not appear on the eligibility list. Our disposition of the other 94 challenged ballots renders those 6 ballots nondeterminative.

[3] The parties stipulated that assistant head nurses and operating room charge nurses perform essentially the same duties and should be accorded the same status.

[4] In view of our resolution of the challenges and the disposition of this proceeding as set forth below, we find it unnecessary to pass on the appropriateness of the designated unit.

viewed by and may be changed by a head nurse or supervisor.

Although AHNs have no authority regarding several of the statutory indicia of supervisory status, they regularly prepare written evaluations of nurses which are given substantial weight in determining merit wage increases and promotions. AHNs evaluate nurses 3 months after hire, 6 months after hire, and annually thereafter. On this basis, we find that AHNs have authority effectively to promote and reward employees working under them. In support of this conclusion, we note particularly that the Employer's assistant director for nursing services stated that she would not promote an employee unless the assistant head nurse assigned to that unit had recommended such action.

Inasmuch as the statutory indicia set forth in Section 2(11) of the Act are stated in the disjunctive and only one need exist to confer supervisory status, we find that the vesting of authority in AHNs to evaluate employees and thereby to reward and promote them compels a finding that AHNs are supervisors [5] and that the challenges to their ballots must be sustained. We also find significant the fact there is an extraordinarily low supervisor-to-employee ratio if AHNs are not supervisors. The record establishes that, if AHNs are found statutory employees, the supervisor-to-employee ratio on the evening and night shifts would average approximately 1-to-37 and be as low as 140-to-1 in some units. Such an inordinately low ratio further supports the conclusion that they are supervisors.

On the basis of all of the foregoing, we sustain the challenges to the 94 ballots cast by AHNs, and shall certify the results of the election.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for New York State Nurses Association and that it is not the exclusive representative of these bargaining unit employees.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would not find the assistant head nurses (hereafter referred to as AHNs) to be supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

I do not agree with the majority's conclusion that because AHNs prepare written evaluations of nurses they effectively recommend them for rewards (raises) and promotions. The record reveals that AHNs fill out written evaluation forms that are restricted to evaluating an employee's care of patients. Although these forms become part of an employee's personnel file, the record fails to indicate how the AHN's role in completing the forms constitutes an effective recommendation for a promotion or raise. Nowhere on these forms is there a section, provision, or space for recommendations about raises and promotions. That AHNs evaluate the performance of nurses does not, without more, establish that they have the authority to effectively make recommendations concerning raises and promotions.[1] All the record shows is that, as found by the Regional Director in his Decision and Direction of Election, decisions about such matters are made by several levels of authority in the nursing department beyond the AHN. Nor does Assistant Director Spath's testimony that she would not promote an employee if the AHN objected establish that the AHNs effectively recommend employees for promotion. That testimony is speculative and not probative of any pattern of action in the hospital. Indeed, it implies either that AHNs make no recommendations concerning these matters, or that the AHNs' comments in the evaluation about the employee's performance play little or no part in the decision. In either case, the implication militates against a finding that AHNs effectively recommended action to be taken concerning the employees' terms and conditions of employment.

My colleagues' reliance on the low supervisor-to-employee ratio that will exist if AHNs are not found to be supervisors is also misplaced. They fail to take into account the AHNs duties of assigning employees to patients and directing those employees in their professional capacity. The AHNs' principal administrative function is assignment of personnel, including granting time off and approving overtime. The question is whether AHNs, in performing this function, exercise independent judgment. The record establishes that the Employer uses a basic formula for assignment which the AHNs follow. For example, in authorizing overtime, AHNs act within the standards set by the Employer; further, they cannot compel employees to work overtime. Similarly, in granting time off to employees, AHNs may do so only if the employee is entitled to leave and staffing needs can be otherwise met. As for making assignments of nurses to patients, AHNs are guided by the patients' needs rather than the Employer's employment interests. In these circumstances the AHNs' scheduling and assigning employees does not require the exercise of independent judgment. Under these circumstances, it is not extraordinary that a head nurse could be the only immediate supervisor of from 30 to 140 employees.

In view of our reliance on the AHNs' authority to evaluate employees, we need not consider whether their supervisory status is further shown by additional responsibilities, such as their involvement in the issuance of written warnings and their authority to adjust schedules and grant days off to employees.

Accordingly, I would find that the AHNs are not supervisors and that any independent judgment exercised on their part was incidental to the professional treatment of patients.[2]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 4 September 1984 Administrative Law Judge George Christensen issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision[1] and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Glenoaks Convalescent Hospital, Glendale, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] In his decision, the judge refers to the Respondent's administrator as both Livingston and Hamilton. The administrator testified that her name was Pamela Hamilton and the complaint alleged that Pamela Nance-Hamilton, administrator, was an agent of Respondent and a supervisor within Sec. 2 of the Act. Accordingly, it appears that the Respondent's administrator was inadvertently referred to as Pamela Livingston and the decision should be corrected to identify her as Pamela Hamilton.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE CHRISTENSEN, Administrative Law Judge. On October 12, 1983,[1] I conducted a hearing at Los Angeles, California, to try issues raised by a complaint issued on July 29 based on a charge filed by Hospital and Service Employees Local 399 (the Union) on May 24 and amended on July 8. The complaint alleges that Glenoaks Convalescent Hospital (the Hospital) violated Section 8(a)(1) the National Labor Relations Act by interrogating employees about their and other employees' union activities and sympathies, creating the impression the union activities of its employees were under surveillance, requesting employees to ascertain and report on the union activities of other employees, and telling employees it was futile to seek union representation; and that the Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by changing employee Anna Barker's workshift and discharging employee Melody Miranda because of their union activities.

The Hospital conceded it discharged Miranda; denied it changed Barker's workshift; denied that it committed the acts alleged above as independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act; and denied violating the Act.

The issues for determination are whether the Hospital committed the acts alleged as violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act; if so, whether the Hospital thereby violated the Act; whether Barker's workshift was changed; if so, whether that change violated the Act; and whether Miranda's discharge violated the Act.

The parties appeared by counsel at the hearing and were afforded full opportunity to adduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue, and to file briefs. Both counsels argued orally and the Hospital filed a brief.

Based on my review of the entire record, observation of the witnesses, perusal of the oral arguments and the brief, plus research, I enter the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find at all pertinent times the Hospital was an employer engaged in commerce in a business affecting commerce and the Union was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

1. The Union's organizational campaign

The union campaign to organize the Hospital's employees began when employee Anna Barker contacted the Union in the spring. The Union supplied Barker with cards authorizing the Union to act as the collective-bargaining agent of the Hospital's nonsupervisory employees and asked her to solicit employees to sign those cards in sufficient number to support a petition for certification as their collective-bargaining representative. Barker recruited other employees to assist her in circulating the cards among the employees and soliciting signatures thereto, including employee Melody Miranda.[2] Barker, Miranda, and others secured a substantial number of signed cards from the employees and turned them over to the Union, which utilized the cards as the basis for filing a petition with the Region for certification as their collective-bargaining representative. The Hospital received formal notification of the filing of the petition about the end of April.

[1] Read 1983 after all further date references omitting the year.

[2] The native language of over one-half of the Hospital's nonsupervisory employees (approximately 60) was Spanish. Many of those employees had a very limited grasp of English. Miranda was bilingual and was called by on the Hospital management to translate communications between management and the employees.

2. The alleged independent 8(a)(1) violations and the alleged workshift change violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act

Hospital management[3] became aware of the union campaign, the holding of a union meeting in a building adjacent to the Hospital, and Barker's leading role in the campaign sometime in late April.[4]

Not long after the time he held his conference with Wright and Johnson and instructed them to keep watch over the employees' union activities, Powers conferred with Miranda. Powers informed Miranda that supervisory personnel were ineligible for union representation, stated the Hospital was opposed to union representation of its employees and would let the employees strike rather than deal with the Union; that a union attempted to organize another facility where he was employed and one of the employees there took him to court, to her regret; stated that while Miranda did not have to answer his questions, could she identify the employees behind the union campaign; and requested that she keep watch over the employees' union activities. Miranda replied she was unable to identify any union supporters and promised to comply with Powers' request.[5]

In the course of the conference with Johnson wherein he advised Johnson that Barker initiated the union campaign, Powers instructed Johnson to change Barker's work shift (then 7 a.m to 3:30 p.m, Monday through Thursday) so management could keep an eye on her union activities. In accordance with those instructions, Johnson changed Barker's work shift beginning the week of May 9 to 8 a.m.—2:30 p.m., Monday though Friday (management personnel normally worked a 5-day workweek, commencing at 8 a.m.).[6]

About the same time, in the course of a discussion between Wright and Miranda concerning the union campaign, Miranda told Wright that Johnson had informed her what transpired during the meeting between Powers, Johnson, and Wright; i.e., that Johnson informed her Powers told Johnson and Wright the Hospital was opposed to union representation of its employees and asked Johnson and Wright to watch the employees' union activities. Wright asked Miranda her views concerning union representation and Miranda replied she was well paid and uninterested in union representation. Wright contacted Johnson and repeated Miranda's remarks to her. Angry over what she felt was a breach of confidence, Johnson contacted Miranda and instructed Miranda to stay away from her unless official business required a contact. Miranda went to Wright and expressed her concern over the disruption in her relationship with Johnson caused by Wright's repeating her comments. Wright brought the two together, said they all should try to get along, and reiterated Powers' request that all three watch the employees' union activities.

Miranda subsequently heard Wright interrupt a conversation between Barker and Patterson to ask them what they were discussing, and heard Wright ask Barker and Patterson to identify the union ringleaders, commenting one of them must speak Spanish. On other occasions when she was not able to overhear what was being said, Wright asked employees what they were discussing.[7]

3. The alleged discriminatory discharge

Miranda was hired in October 1982 to handle and chart patient activities. In January 1983, Powers assigned her the additional duty of handling and recording the patients' social services, granting her at that time an increase of 75 cents per hour, with the promise of an additional 25 cents when she completed an academic course in social services work.

Approximately 3 months later (in April), Miranda told Powers she had not been able to find a social services course in which to enroll, that she had checked and found out the State did not require an academic credential for the performance of the work in question, that she believed she was performing the work efficiently, and requested he waive the academic requirement and grant the promised 25-cent-per-hour increase. Powers acknowledged she was performing the work well and the academic training was not required by regulatory authorities, but stated he nevertheless wanted Miranda to complete the academic work and stated he would not give her the 25-cent increase until she did. He promised to try to locate a course in which she could enroll.

On May 9, Pamela Hamilton assumed the position of administrator at the Hospital.[8] During the entire period

[3] Douglas Powers, general administrator; Altha Wright, dietary supervisor; and Marie Johnson, director of nurses. The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that at all pertinent times Powers, Wright, and Johnston were supervisors and agents of the Hospital acting on its behalf within the meaning of Sec. 2 of the Act.

[4] The signature solicitations, the pros and cons of union representation, and a union meeting held in late April in the apartment of employee Lois Patterson in a building adjacent to the Hospital were widely discussed among employees prior to the petition filing in late April; in the course of a meeting between Powers, Wright, and Johnson about the time the petition was filed, Powers told Johnson and Wright a union campaign was in progress, a union meeting had been held near the Hospital, and instructed Wright and Johnson to keep close watch over the employees' union activities. At a later meeting the same day between Powers and Johnson, Powers told Johnson that Barker initiated the union campaign. These findings are based on Johnson's testimony, which I credit; Johnson impressed me as a sincere, honest witness.

[5] These findings are based on Miranda's testimony, which I credit. Miranda was a direct and forthright witness, and very convincing. Powers apparently thought Miranda was a supervisor, along with Johnson and Wright. The Hospital did not advance this contention in its oral or written argument, nor in the course of the hearing, and Miranda testified without contradiction she did not hire, fire, discipline, or direct the work of any employees and there was no evidence produced to establish the contrary, nor any independent evidence she performed supervisory functions. I therefore find that at all pertinent times Miranda was not a supervisor and/or agent of the Hospital acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

[6] These findings are based on Johnson's testimony, which I credit, and supporting statistical data.

[7] The findings in this and the previous paragraph are based primarily on Miranda's testimony, which I credit, because she was a direct and forthright witness. Her testimony to matters in the former paragraph was corroborated by Johnson and her testimony to matters in the latter paragraph was corroborated by Barker, while Wright was hesitant in her testimony and professed an inability to recall her statements.

[8] The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that at all pertinent times Hamilton was a supervisor and agent of the Hospital acting on its behalf within the meaning of Sec. 2 of the Act.

of Miranda's employment prior to May 9, she worked directly under Powers, who conceded she was an excellent employee and that he had on several occasions complimented her on her work performance.

Hamilton was aware when she assumed her position at the Hospital that a union campaign to represent the Hospital's nonsupervisory employees was underway.

On either May 10 or 11, Miranda approached Hamilton and renewed her request for a 25-cent increase, reciting the same argument she utilized in her approach to Powers the previous month. Hamilton replied she was unfamiliar with the situation, but would look into it. She conferred with Powers; he remained firm in his position that Miranda should not receive the increase until and unless she completed the academic work he established as the prerequisite for Miranda's receipt of the increase.

When Miranda inquired about the increase on May 12, Hamilton recited Powers' position, expressed irritation over Miranda's persistence in what she characterized as a petty matter, stated she was familiar with and capable of performing the social service work, and stated she thought she might assume those functions and reduce Miranda's wages by 75 cents per hour, to the rate Miranda received prior to her assumption of the social services functions. Miranda promptly withdrew her wage increase request, stating she liked the work in question and would abandon any effort to secure the promised 25-cent-per-hour increase rather than lose it. Hamilton ordered Miranda to leave her office and to return in 15 or 20 minutes. On Miranda's return to her office, Hamilton informed Miranda she was discharged.[9] Miranda's subsequent appeal to Powers for reinstatement was unsuccessful.[10]

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The alleged 8(a)(1) independent violations

The complaint alleges that the Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by Powers' interrogating an employee about her and other employees' union activities and sympathies, by his requesting employees to spy on the union activities and sympathies of other employees, by his creation of the impression he was spying on the employees' union activities and sympathies, by his informing an employee it was futile to seek union representation, and by Wright's interrogating employees about their and other employees' union activities and sympathies.

a. The alleged spying (Powers)

Findings have been entered that Powers, in the course of his conferences with Miranda, Johnson, and Wright, solicited the former and instructed the latter two to spy upon the union activities of the Hospital's employees. Such a solicitation and instruction, whether to a rank-and-file employee or to a supervisory employee, is violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[11] I therefore find that by such solicitation and instruction, the Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

b. The alleged interrogation, creation of the impression of surveillance, and futility statement (Powers)

Findings have been entered that Powers, in the course of his conference with Miranda, asked her to identify employees supporting the union campaign, inferred that it was futile for the employees to seek union representation by stating the Hospital would take a strike before it would deal with the Union, and conveyed the impression he was maintaining a surveillance of the employees' union activities by asking Miranda to spy upon the employees' union activities.

All three of those actions (the interrogation, the conveyance of the inference, and the conveyance of the impression) are violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act,[12] and I therefore find that by those actions the Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

c. The alleged Wright interrogations

Findings have been entered that Wright asked Miranda's views concerning union representation after Miranda informed Wright that Johnson told her what transpired in an earlier conference between Powers, Wright, and Johnson and that Wright subsequently, within earshot of Miranda, asked Barker and Patterson what they were discussing and who the union ringleaders were, commenting that one of them must speak Spanish.

Both these interrogations occurred after Wright received instructions from Powers to spy on the employees' union activities.

Findings have also been entered that Wright on other occasions asked employees what they were talking about.

From the foregoing, I conclude that Wright questioned Miranda, Barker, and Patterson as part of her

[9] Hamilton testified that she conferred with Powers and related what occurred in the course of her conference with Miranda; that Powers solicited her reaction; that she stated she was dissatisfied with Miranda's attitude; that Powers authorized her to discharge Miranda if she wished; and that she decided to discharge Miranda because of her "negative attitude," as evidenced by Miranda's frank comment that, while she accepted Powers' position, she felt she was not being treated fairly by the Hospital.

[10] The findings in this paragraph are based on the testimony of Miranda, with partial corroboration by Hamilton and Powers.

effort to comply with Powers' surveillance instructions, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[13]

2. The alleged work shift change

I have entered findings that, in late April or early May, Powers informed Johnson that Barker was the prime mover in the union campaign and instructed Johnson to change Barker's work shift so management could spy on her union activities; and that Johnson carried out Powers' instructions, changing Barker's work shift from a 4-day (Monday through Thursday), 8 hours per day (7 a.m.—3:30 p.m.) work shift to a 5-day (Monday through Friday), 6 hours per day (8 a.m.—2:30 p.m.) work shift, thereby placing Barker on the premises only during hours management personnel was present. The change reduced Barker's work shifts by 2 hours per week and required her presence at the Hospital 5 days per week rather than 4.

The Board has held that changing an employee's work area in order to keep a watch on his or her union activities and changing an employee's work duties because of his or her union activities are violative of the Act.[14] I find it reasonable to conclude that it is likewise violative of the Act to change an employee's work shift in order to spy on his or her union activities, and thus conclude that by changing Barker's work shift for that purpose, the Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

3. The alleged discriminatory discharge

Findings have been entered that Miranda was an active and important supporter of the Union, active in that she signed a card authorizing the Union to represent her, attended the union meeting in late April at Patterson's apartment, and solicited employees to sign cards authorizing the Union to represent them; important in that she regularly translated communications between the Hospital management and its predominantly Spanish-speaking work force and therefore was able to act as the Union's conduit in reaching those same Spanish-speaking employees for the purpose of securing their support, including the signing of cards authorizing the Union to represent them.

Prior to the time she was discharged, Powers rated Miranda an excellent and valued employee, and complimented her on her work. Yet the Hospital would have me believe she was summarily discharged for uttering a single comment, by a supervisor unfamiliar with her work performance, without a review of her previous performance and the complete absence of any warning, contending the absence of direct proof management was aware of her union role and the fact that two other known employee leaders of the Union (Barker and Patterson) were not discharged militates an acceptance of its position that her utterance of that comment was the sole motive of her discharge.

The Board and the courts have long accepted the premise that employer motivation may be established by inference drawn from facts and circumstances surrounding a discharge.[15] They also have rejected the defense that employer failure to discharge all the known activists in their employ supports the conclusion that the discharge of a lesser number is nondiscriminatory.[16]

Thus on a number of occasions the Board has inferred employer knowledge of an employee's union activities from facts and circumstances surrounding the discharge,[17] and held the discharge of less than the total number of known union activists violative of the Act.[18]

The record establishes that prior to Miranda's discharge Hospital management

1. Became aware of its employees' union authorization card solicitations, attendance at a union meeting, and the identity of some of the employees who were leading the Union's campaign.

2. Expressed its union animus and unlawfully sought to discourage its employees from seeking representation by the Union by implying their efforts would be futile.

3. Unlawfully questioned employees about their and other employees union activities and sympathies.

4. Unlawfully requested employees to keep a close watch on other employees' union activities.

5. Conducted an unlawful surveillance of its employees' union activities.

6. Voiced the suspicion that one of the employees leading the union campaign was fluent in the Spanish language.

From the foregoing, I find and conclude that, sometime before Miranda's discharge, Hospital mangagement's surveillance of its employees' union activities produced confirmation of Wright's suspicion—that one of the employee leaders of the union campaign was fluent in the Spanish language—identified Miranda as that person.

Miranda not only spoke Spanish fluently, she was an authority figure among the Spanish-speaking employees (by virtue of her role as the translator of management's instructions, requests, etc.). Thus her discharge, at the height of the preelection campaign, necessarily discouraged those employees, who signed union authorization cards and gave their support to the Union due to Miran-da's solicitations and urging, from continuing their support of the Union.

In view of the foregoing, the timing of Miranda's discharge and the weak justification advanced therefor, the Hospital's established union animus, and its proclivity to violate the Act in its campaign to avoid dealing with the Union, I find and conclude that the Hospital discharged Miranda to discourage its employees from supporting the Union, particularly those employees (the majority) who were fluent only in Spanish and looked to Miranda for leadership and guidance, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. At all pertinent times the Hospital was an employer engaged in commerce in a business affecting commerce and the Union was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

2. At all pertinent times Powers, Johnson, Wright, and Hamilton were supervisors and agents of the Hospital acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

3. The Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by

(a) Requesting employees to spy upon the union activities of its employees.

(b) Asking an employee to identify employees who support the Union.

(c) Conveying the impression that it was futile for the employees to seek union representation.

(d) Creating the impression the Hospital was keeping watch on union activities of its employees.

(e) Interrogating employees concerning the identity of the employees leading the union campaign.

(f) Maintaining a surveillance of its employees' union activities.

4. The Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by changing an employee's work shift in order to watch over her union activities.

5. The Hospital violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging an employee to discourage her and other employees' support of the Union.

6. The above unfair labor practices affected and affect interstate commerce as defined in Section 2 of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Hospital committed various unfair labor practices, I shall recommend it be directed to cease and desist therefrom and take affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

Having found that the Hospital violated the Act by reducing Barker's workweek by 2 hours per week in order to spy on her union activities, I shall recommend the Hospital be ordered to make Barker whole for those losses by paying her for the hours lost for each week of such losses between the first week of her reduced work schedule and the week she resigned, with interest on the sums due computed in accordance with the formula set out in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977) and Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).[19]

Having found that the Hospital violated the Act by discharging Miranda, I shall recommend the Hospital be directed to reinstate her to her former position with seniority and other rights and privileges restored, and to make her whole for any seniority, wage, and benefit losses she suffered by virtue of the discrimination against her, with the amount due calculated in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and interest thereon calculated in accordance with the formula set forth above.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[20]

ORDER

The Respondent, Glenoaks Convalescent Hospital, Glendale, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Asking employees to identify those employees who support union representation.

(c) Requesting employees to spy upon the union activities of its employees.

(d) Conveying the impression to employees that it is maintaining a surveillance of their union activities.

(e) Maintaining a surveillance of its employees' union activities.

(f) Creating the impression among its employees it was futile for them to seek union representation.

(g) Changing its employees' hours or shifts in order to spy on their union activities.

(h) Discharging employees in order to discourage them and other employees from seeking union representation.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Make Anna Barker whole for her wage losses resulting from the discrimination against her in the manner set forth in "The Remedy" section of this decision.

(b) Offer Melody Miranda reinstatement to her former position with all seniority and other rights and privileges restored, and make her whole for any seniority, wage, and benefit losses she may have suffered by virtue of the discrimination against her, in the manner set out in "The Remedy" section of this decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its premises in Glendale, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of

POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a trial before the above Agency, the Agency issued a decision finding we committed unfair labor practices and directed that we post this notice advising you what we will do and what we will refrain from doing to remedy those unfair labor practices, to wit:

WE WILL NOT ask you to identify your fellow employees who support or supported Hospital and Service Employees Union, Local 399, SEIU, AFL–CIO or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT interrogate you concerning the identity of our employees who support or lead a campaign by Local 399, or any other labor organization, to secure the right to represent you for collective-bargaining purposes.

WE WILL NOT solicit or request that you spy on the activities of any of our employees on behalf of Local 399, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT convey to you the impression we are maintaining a surveillance of your activities on behalf of Local 399, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT maintain a surveillance of your activities on behalf of Local 399, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT give you the impression it is futile for you to seek representation by Local 399, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT change your work shifts or hours so we can spy on your activities on behalf of Local 399, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT discharge you to discourage your and other employees' support of Local 399, or any other labor organization.

WE WILL make Anna Barker whole for her wage losses resulting from our changing her work shift so we could spy on her activities on behalf of Local 399.

WE WILL reinstate Melody Miranda to her former position and make her whole for any wage or other losses she suffered by virtue of our discharging her to discourage her and other employees' support of Local 399.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 14 October 1983 Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny issued the attached decision. The Union filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions but to substitute the attached Order and notice for that of the judge.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Pagerly Detective and Security Agency, Inc., Wernersville, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Coercively interrogating any employee about union support or union activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Wernersville, Pennsylvania office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to

[1] At the hearing the judge excluded as inadmissible hearsay certain testimony of employee Chris Jarecki offered by the General Counsel. According to the General Counsel's offer of proof Jarecki would have testified that, shortly after a meeting in October 1982 between dischargee George Oister and the Respondent's president Thomas Pagerly, Oister said to Jarecki, "[C]an you believe it . . . Mr. Pagerly wants me to provide him with a list of employees in support of the union." We find merit in the Union's exception to the judge's ruling and find that Jarecki's testimony is a prior consistent statement admissible under Rule 801(d)(1)(B) of the Federal Rules of Evidence. The record reveals that the Respondent vigorously attacked the veracity of Oister's testimony at the hearing that Pagerly directed him to provide a list of union supporters prior to Oister's discharge. The judge should have permitted the General Counsel to rebut such a charge against Oister by evidence of the prior consistent statement. See United States v. Parodi, 703 F.2d 768, 784–787 (4th Cir. 1983); United States v. Dominquez, 604 F.2d 304, 311 (4th Cir. 1979), cert. denied 444 U.S. 1014 (1980). Nonetheless we find the judge's erroneous evidentiary ruling was not prejudicial and we adopt his finding that Oister's demotion and discharge did not violate the Act. Thus, Oister's testimony was totally discredited by the judge on the basis of demeanor and President Pagerly's testimony was totally credited. In such circumstances Jarecki's testimony concerning what Oister told Jarecki is insufficient to disturb the critical credibility resolutions concerning the conversations between Oister and Pagerly. We adopt the judge's evidentiary rulings in all other respects.

Chairman Dotson agrees that Oister's demotion and discharge did not violate the Act. The Chairman, however, would affirm the judge's exclusion of Jarecki's testimony as hearsay. Because there is no contention by any party that Oister's alleged statement to Jarecki was inconsistent with any other statement ever made by Oister concerning preparation of a list of union supporters, Jarecki's testimony was not offered to rebut a charge against Oister of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive as required by Rule 801 (d)(1)(B). Cf. Baker v. Elcona Homes Corp., 588 F.2d 551, 559 (6th Cir. 1978). In the Chairman's view the proffered testimony is therefore excludable under the general rule that an out-of-court prior consistent statement is inadmissible hearsay. 4 Wigmore, Evidence § 1124 at 255 (Chadbourn rev. 1972). See also United States v. Check, 582 F.2d 668, 677 fn. 27 (2d Cir. 1978).

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Union asserts that the judge's decision is the product of bias, hostility, and misconduct against the General Counsel and her witness. We have carefully examined the record and find no basis to the Union's allegations.

In the absence of exceptions Chairman Dotson would adopt pro forma the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by interrogating employee Koyste.

[3] Relying on Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975), the judge found that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) when, following the receipt of an OSHA complaint against the Respondent, its president Thomas Pagerly remarked to an employee that he would like to get his hands on the "son of a bitch" who did that and "would drive him right through the ground." In Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493, 497 (1984), the Board overruled Alleluia and held that "[i]n general, to find an employee's activity to be 'concerted' we shall require that it be engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not by and solely on behalf of the employee himself." In the absence of evidence in this case demonstrating that Pagerly's remarks were directed toward the exercise of concerted activity, that portion of the judge's Order and notice pertaining to Pagerly's statement is at odds with our holding in Meyers. Accordingly we shall delete the pertinent portion of the judge's Order and notice and shall substitute a new Order and notice for that of the judge including an appropriate cease-and-desist provision inadvertently omitted by the judge.

For the reasons stated in Member Zimmerman's dissenting opinion in Meyers, he would remedy a threat against even one individual engaged in the implicitly concerted activity of contacting OSHA. In addition, he finds that the majority rule in Meyers does not control the threat at issue here because that threat was subject to the reasonable interpretation of forecasting harm not only to individual employees who contact OSHA but also to any groups of employees who make such contact. The latter activity is undisputedly "concerted" within the meaning of the Act and cannot be lawfully threatened. See Member Zimmerman's dissenting opinion in D. A. Collins Refractories, 272 NLRB 931, 933 (1984).

[4] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaints be dismissed insofar as they allege violations not found herein.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT coercively question you about your union support or activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

PAGERLY DETECTIVE AND SECURITY AGENCY, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM A. GERSHUNY, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing was conducted in Reading, Pennsylvania, on August 17–18, 1983, on complaints alleging the demotion and discharge of a top-level supervisor and a number of violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses' demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The complaints allege, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer subject to the Act.

II. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

In August 1982, the Independent Union initiated a campaign to organize guards and supervisors employed at Respondent's security and armored car business. Admittedly, this Union was an ineligible labor organization under the Act and, subsequently, another union (the United Guards Union) organized and became the representative of Respondent's guards.

The table of organization of the Company includes Company President Thomas Pagerly, Company Vice Presidents David Pagerly and J. Sue Oberly, Personnel Manager Teri Oberly, a director of security, 2 lieutenants (one of whom is George Oister), and approximately 30 sergeants, corporals, and PFCs (all of whom are supervisors). There are approximately 125 guards employed by Respondent.

These cases, however, involve essentially three employees: Lieutenant Oister (Case 4–CA–13330), mechanic Donato (Case 4–CA–13384–2), and guard Koyste (Case 4–CA–13330–5).

B. Case 4–CA–13330–5

The evidence is undisputed that in early February 1983 Company Vice President Oberly asked guard Koyste if the Union sent him a letter and whether he returned "the card." The interrogation of an employee by management as to his union activity and sympathies is violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

C. Case 4–CA–13384–2

Paragraphs 5(a), (b), and (c) allege a number of violations of Section 8(a)(1) by Company President Pagerly: On November 15, 1982, by interrogating mechanic Donato concerning attendance and employee activity at a union gathering, by creating the impression of surveillance, and by asking him to ascertain and divulge information oncerning union activity and sympathies; on November 24, 1982, by threatening to harm an unidentified employee who lodged a safety complaint with OSHA; and on December 18, 1982, by threatening to deny a general wage increase if employees selected the Union as their representative.

In support of these allegations, only the testimony of mechanic Donato was offered. Based principally on my observation of his demeanor on the stand, I am compelled to reject his testimony in its entirety.

As a witness, Donato was heavily biased (he had been discharged for reasons unrelated to this case), evasive, and lacking in candor. His testimony was unconvincing (and, on cross-examination, vague) and the events he described were highly improbable (e.g., despite the fact that he was the principal union organizer, Donato testified that he readily turned over to Pagerly, at the latter's request, a list of employees who had attended a union function, with markings to indicate which employees Donato could trust). In addition, his testimony concerning events surrounding the production of the list was flatly contradicted by three coemployees who had no apparent interest in the case and whose testimony I credit.

I also credit the denials of Pagerly, who, based on my observation of his demeanor as a witness, was a forceful, convincing, and candid witness whose testimony throughout rang true.

Nevertheless, this case will not be dismissed in its entirety. As to the allegations of paragraph 5(b), Pagerly admitted that, after receiving an OSHA letter listing 11 violations in the garage, he went to the garage and instructed Donato to rectify the problems right away and added, "I'd like to get my hands on the SOB who did this, I'll drive him into the ground." Board law is clear that threats to an employee because of the filing of a safety complaint with the responsible government agency are unlawful under the Act. Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975).

D. Case 4–CA–13330

Paragraph 5 of this complaint alleges the unlawful demotion of Lieutenant Oister to corporal (supervisor) on November 8 and his unlawful discharge on the following day because of his refusal "to assist Respondent in securing a list of employees supporting the Union, so that Respondent could terminate said employees," based on Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982). The only supporting testimony offered was that of Lieutenant Oister. For reasons set forth below, his testimony, like that of Donato, is rejected in its entirety. Accordingly, this case is dismissed.

Based on my observation of his demeanor as a witness, I found Oister to be confused, untrustworthy, evasive, and totally lacking in candor. His testimony conflicted with his affidavit in that certain conversations as to his obtaining the list—certainly a most significant bit of evidence—were not given to the Board agent. His testimony as to what Pagerly asked him to do about a list was self-contradictory (spy on employees/listen to what they are saying/prepare a list based on what Pagerly and other supervisors already knew about employee sentiment). None of the several incidents which were the basis for his demotion to supervisory corporal were fabricated and, when called to explain them, Oister admitted their occurrence, but misstated his role (e.g., he neglected to testify on direct that he missed an important meeting with a bank client because he chose that morning to go hunting). He was discharged the following day when, admittedly, he insisted on bringing an hourly employee (mechanic Donato) to a management meeting at which there was absolutely no reason for him to believe discipline would be imposed; when he insisted that Donato remain as a witness, he was terminated because management would not be compelled to transact its business in the presence of an hourly mechanic. Oister also gave false testimony as to when he first saw his personnel file and saw that certain reprimands were omitted. In sum, I had the clear impression at the hearing that this young man completely failed to appreciate the sanctity of the oath taken by a witness and that his testimony was, in part, exaggerated and, in part, manufactured for purposes of this case.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 25 June 1981 Administrative Law Judge Edwin H. Bennett issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the Respondent filed a brief opposing exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge for the reasons fully set out in the attached decision that deferral to the arbitration award is appropriate pursuant to the standards of Spielberg.[1] The Respondent's failure immediately to comply with the award is insufficient reason to decline to defer. Malrite of Wisconsin, Inc., 198 NLRB 241 (1972), enfd. in relevant part 494 F.2d 1136 (D.C. Cir. 1974).

The Respondent refused to allow union business agent Jack Goldberg access to its plant as required by the bargaining agreement.[2] The Respondent did not otherwise refuse to deal with Goldberg, and the Respondent did not refuse access to any other agent of the Union. The Respondent's refusal of access to Goldberg was grieved and arbitrated. The arbitrator upheld the grievance, concluding, "The Union, as well as the Employer, has the contractual and, indeed, the statutory right, to designate its representatives for collective bargaining purposes." The arbitrator directed the Respondent to admit the Union's authorized representatives to its factory at all reasonable times. A week later Goldberg went to the plant to test the award and was not allowed to enter.

Contrary to the General Counsel's argument, the Respondent's failure to comply with the award is not grounds for the Board to decline to defer. In Malrite, above at 241-242, the Board stated:

> If the Board's deference to arbitration is to be meaningful it must encompass the entire arbitration process, including the enforcement of arbitral awards [through judicial procedures].

In Electrical Workers IBEW Local 715 (Malrite) v. NLRB, above, 494 F.2d at 1139, the court agreed:

> In this case, the arbitration process has foundered, but it has not proven inadequate. The union may yet obtain compliance with the award by means of a suit for its enforcement. As long as the remedy of judicial enforcement is available, the force of the Spielberg doctrine is not diminished by one party's disregard for the arbitral award.

We reaffirm the Malrite principle because it accords with the Board's deferral policy as established in Spielberg and as recently confirmed in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984).[3] Therefore, we shall defer to the arbitrator's award and dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955).

[2] The agreement states, "It is agreed that a representative of the Union shall have access to the shop of [the Respondent] at all reasonable times for the purpose of taking complaints and for the purpose of ascertaining whether the provisions of this agreement are being lived up to."

[3] Member Zimmerman adheres to the views set forth in his dissent in Olin, but agrees that in the circumstances of this case deferral is appropriate under Spielberg.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EDWIN H. BENNETT, Administrative Law Judge. The hearing in the above-captioned matter was conducted on March 23, 1981, in New York, New York. The charge was filed on June 19, 1980, by Amalgamated Ladies' Garment Cutters Union Local 10, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union (the Union) and the complaint thereon issued July 31, 1980, alleging, inter alia, that J & H Rainwear, Inc. (the Respondent), in violation of both Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act and the applicable collective-bargaining agreement, refused to permit Union Business Agent Jack Goldberg access to the plant for purposes of policing the bargaining agreement. The Respondent admits almost all of the operative facts but denies that it committed any violations of law.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witness (only Jack Goldberg testified), and after due consideration of oral argument and briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a New York corporation, maintains an office and plant in the city of New York where it is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale and distribution of rainwear and related products. Annually, the Respondent sells and ships such products valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers outside the State of New York. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

At least since 1968 the Union has been recognized by the Respondent as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for a unit composed of all cutters, markers, and graders, three in number at the time of the events here in issue. The parties also have had successive collective-bargaining contracts since that year, the most recent one of which is effective by its terms for the period June 1, 1979, to May 31, 1982. That agreement provides, inter alia, "it is agreed that a representative of the Union shall have access to the shop of [the employer] at all reasonable times for the purpose of taking complaints and for the purpose of ascertaining whether the provisions of this agreement are being lived up to."

In July 1978, Jack Goldberg became a union business agent, and pursuant to the contractual provision he made periodic and routine visits to the plant from that date until about November 1979. In the latter part of that month, Goldberg visited the plant as before. While there he noticed Henry Frankel, a principal officer of the Respondent and a brother of Jack Frankel, president, performing work at the cutting table. Goldberg told the Frankels this work had to be done by a union member and rejected the explanation that the regular cutter was on vacation. Goldberg advised the Frankels they should have requested a replacement from the union. At this point Henry Frankel angrily ordered Goldberg out of the plant.

On January 8, 1980, Goldberg was present at an arbitration hearing involving the Respondent, at the conclusion of which Jack Frankel again told Goldberg never to enter his shop or "I will spit in your face." Frankel said further he would "put a lock on the door before you can come into my shop." On March 13, 1980, Goldberg again made a routine visit to the Respondent's premises where upon entry he met Jack Frankel. Goldberg told Frankel he was there to see the cutters to which Frankel replied that "anybody else can come here but you."[1] On March 14, 1980, the Union filed a grievance alleging that the Respondent had violated the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement set forth above by refusing to permit Goldberg access to the plant. On June 9, 1980, a hearing on that grievance was conducted before the impartial chairman who rendered an award on June 10, 1980. In that award the arbitrator noted the Union's complaint and the Respondent's position that Goldberg was denied access because of an alleged "personality conflict,"[2] but that any other business agent would be permitted to enter the shop "for the purpose specified in the agreement." The impartial chairman stated: "[T]he Union, as well as the Employer, has the contractual and, indeed, the statutory right, to designate its representatives for collective bargaining purposes. Each party is required to deal with the representative of the other party in good faith." Therefore, he rejected the Respondent's suggestion that a pragmatic solution be reached by the Union assigning some other agent for entering the shop.

The impartial chairman rendered an award on June 10, 1980, directing the Respondent "to admit to its factory at all reasonable times any duly authorized representative of the Union for the purpose of taking up complaints and for the purpose of ascertaining whether the terms of the collective bargaining agreement are being lived up to." On June 17, 1980, Goldberg visited the plant to test the award and was denied entry. The instant charge was filed on June 19, 1980. The Union has not sought to enforce the arbitration award in court, although its only explanation for such refusal is its belief that an unfair labor practice has been committed requiring a Board Order. Both the Union and the General Counsel concede that the arbitrator considered the statutory issue, and that his award affords complete relief to the Union, and that the only additional substantive remedy forthcoming from the Board would be the posting of a notice.

There is no evidence that the Respondent has refused to recognize Goldberg's representative status in any way other than the refusal to allow him to enter the plant. Nor is there evidence that the Respondent has refused to meet and bargain with Goldberg outside of its premises and apparently did so on January 8, 1980, the occasion when Jack Frankel warned Goldberg not to enter the plant, as noted above. It also appears the real purpose for Goldberg's visits to this, or any other employer, is to determine contract compliance by speaking to employees. Thus, Goldberg testified that he looks at the "working cards" issued to employees by the Union on which is recorded the proper wage and checks with the employees to make certain such wage is being received. He also asks employees if they have grievances or knowledge of "violations in the shop." Although it could be assumed that Goldberg might, during these visits, resolve any grievances or violations by discussion with the employer, as apparently he attempted to do in November 1979 when he discovered Henry Frankel working as a cutter, this record does not clearly establish that his visitation rights accorded by the contract are for that purpose.

Further, the Union at no time has sought to test the Respondent's position that anyone else but Goldberg could enter the premises to police the contract. It is conceded that despite the refusal to permit Goldberg access to the plant the Union has had no difficulty in meeting with unit employees and, to the extent necessary, the Respondent has continued to meet with the Union to discuss and resolve contractual and other matters concerning terms and conditions of employment. Finally, there is absolutely no record evidence to support the allegation made in paragraph 12(b) of the complaint that the Respondent denied the Union (as distinguished from Goldberg) access to the plant on March 13, 1980 (or on any other date for that matter), "unless and until Jack Goldberg ceased to act as the Union's designated agent for the purpose of the adjustment of grievances." To the contrary, as recited above, the evidence, which incidentally was adduced by the General Counsel through its witness Goldberg, undeniably establishes that on that date, and at all times, access was denied only to Goldberg and the Union was invited to send any other agent into the plant.

[1] These events are based on Goldberg's undenied and credible testimony.

[2] The reasons for such conflict do not appear in the arbitrator's decision or this record.

III. DISCUSSION AND CONCLUSIONS

The Respondent does not seriously dispute that, in contravention of the collective-bargaining agreement, Goldberg has been denied access to its plant. In its answer the Respondent concedes such refusal but asserts that the complaint should be dismissed on two grounds.

First, the Respondent assets that such contract violation is unrelated to grievance processing or other protected activity and therefore is not a statutory violation. This position is untenable for the clause on its face asserts that "a representative of the Union shall have access to the shop . . . for the purpose of ascertaining whether the provisions of this agreement are being lived up to." Plainly, this method of assuring contract compliance is closely related to every term and condition of employment bargained for and is an integral part of the grievance machinery even though the visit is not for the purpose of processing grievances directly with the Respondent. Therefore, the clause constitutes a mandatory subject of bargaining no less than any other term and condition of employment set forth in the agreement. Granite City Steel Co., 167 NLRB 310 (1967).[3]

The desirability of such procedure is not in issue. The point is that it was frozen as a term and condition of employment for the duration of the contract. By giving a restrictive reading to the contract provision so as to exclude Goldberg as a union representative, the Respondent unilaterally modified a contractually established term and condition of employment and thus violated its bargaining obligation under the Act. See Section 8(d) of the Act; Granite City Steel Co., supra. Airport Limousine Service, 231 NLRB 922 (1977).

Second, the Respondent urges deferral to the arbitration award on the ground that it adequately remedies any violation and that its noncompliance is not a basis for refusing to defer. In support of this position, the Respondent relies on Malrite of Wisconsin, 198 NLRB 241 (1972), enfd. 494 F.2d 1136 (D.C. Cir. 1974). I find merit to this argument.

The General Counsel and the Union take the position that Malrite is not applicable on the grounds that the violation alleged here involves both a contract right and a statutory right, thus rendering deferral inappropriate. This argument is erroneous for several reasons.

It is well settled that there is no absolute right of entry onto an employer's property by nonemployees. Rather, to bring such action within the Act's protection requires a showing of need that neither was alleged, nor litigated, nor argued here. NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956). Indeed, the Union concedes, and the General Counsel does not seriously dispute, that but for the contract clause, the Union would not be entitled to insist on access to the plant for purposes of policing the collective-bargaining agreement. Moreover, the evidence demonstrates that the Union was fully capable of policing the agreement subsequent to Goldberg's exclusion from the plant. Accordingly, the Union's right under the Act to have access to the plant, under the circumstances of this case, is dependent solely on the collective-bargaining agreement.

But, argues the General Counsel, since the contract right here involved is a step in the grievance procedure, Goldberg's exclusion from the plant is akin to a "refusal to bargain with Goldberg" (G.C. Br. 7), and consequently interferes with employees' statutory rights to select their own bargaining representative. He further postulates that, when viewed in this light, the Malrite principal is inapplicable under the Board's holding in Native Textiles, 246 NLRB 228 (1978). In that case, the employer flatly refused to meet with a particular representative for the adjudication of grievances, on or off its premises. The union's grievance covered both the refusal to meet with that person and the refusal to allow that individual access to its premises. As to the latter refusal, the employer relied in part on certain provisions in the collective-bargaining agreement. The administrative law judge recommended deferral pursuant to Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971), and Roy Robinson Chevrolet, 228 NLRB 828 (1977). The Board rejected this recommendation holding that the right of employees to designate a representative of their own choosing for the processing of grievances does not turn on contract interpretation but is a fundamental statutory right.

The Respondent correctly points out that the Native Textiles decision is distinguishable. Initially, as discussed above, I am unable to find that Goldberg's visits to the plant were to meet or deal with the Respondent for the processing of grievances, rather than routinely to determine from employees if grievances existed. Even assuming arguendo that such grievance processing was one of Goldberg's functions in visiting the plant, the instant case still is factually inapposite. There is no dispute that here the Respondent only refused to meet Goldberg in its plant, unlike the total refusal present in Native Textiles. The consequence of that limited refusal merely was to deny the Union a right gained in bargaining, i.e., plant access, and not the abrogation of a separate basic statutory right. To the extent that such conduct also constitutes a unilateral modification of the contract, and therefore would violate Section 8(a)(5), the Malrite principle is directly in point and controls the disposition of this case. That is so because the General Counsel's position is reduced to a claim that, if there is a statutory violation as well as a breach of contract, the Board should not defer to an arbitration award, even one that remedies the breach, where the employer refuses to abide by that award.

[3] The Respondent cites no contrary authority but states that Goldberg's visits were not to process grievances. While I have found that the record is ambiguous with respect to whether or not grievance processing is a function encompassed within the purview of the contract provision, the finding of a statutory violation is not dependent on a resolution of that question. Where there has been a unilateral modification of a contract provision relating to a mandatory (as opposed to a permissive) subject of bargaining, such as is the case here, an unfair labor practice will be said to have occurred. See Allied Chemicals Local 10 v. Pittsburgh Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 188 (1971).

That position, however, was considered and rejected in Malrite. In that case the arbitrator upheld the union's claim that the employer breached the collective-bargaining agreement by changing the work assignments of the bargaining unit employees (radio engineers), requiring them to work as combination engineer-announcers. The employer refused to comply with the award. The Board majority dismissed the complaint (the administrative law judge had found a violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) and Sec. 8(d) of the Act premised on a unilateral modification of the bargaining agreement), holding in relevant part that: "It appears that the desirable objective of encouraging the voluntary settlement of labor disputes through the arbitration process will best be served by requiring that parties to a dispute, after electing to resort to arbitration, proceed to the usual conclusion of that process—judicial enforcement—rather than permitting them to invoke the intervention of the Board." Malrite of Wisconsin, 198 NLRB 241, 242 (1972). The Board further advised parties that judicial enforcement was preferable to Board action stating: "Surely immediate access to the court is to be preferred over this long administrative route, and this is the course we are here encouraging these and future disputants to follow." Id. at 242.

Here, as in Malrite, the condition of employment changed by the employer was one provided for by the collective-bargaining agreement, i.e., job duties in Malrite, and plant access to a nonemployee to police the collective-bargaining agreement (whether by investigation with employees or processing grievances in direct dealing with the employer). Thus, the statutory violation in both cases is the unilateral midterm contract violation. The union in Malrite, in seeking to have the court set aside the Board's Order, argued that the statutory issue could be resolved only by the Board. The court, in affirming the Board's deferral policy stated: "The Board has made it clear that, when deferral is appropriate, the arbitration award becomes the sole remedy for both contractual and statutory violations." Electrical Workers IBEW Local 715 v. NLRB, 494 F.2d 1136, 1138 (D.C. Cir. 1974).

A reading of the arbitration award indicates that the arbitration proceeding here was fair and regular, the arbitrator considered the statutory issue, and in all respects that award complies with the criteria for deferral under Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955). Therefore, deferral ordinarily would be appropriate and neither the General Counsel nor the Union even suggest otherwise. Rather, as noted, they rely on authorities, which I have found factually inapposite, where the policy of deferral was held not applicable.[4] Bearing in mind that the Union has offered no reasonable explanation for its failure to enforce the arbitrator's award, which it candidly concedes affords it full relief, inasmuch as I do not find merit to the General Counsel's various arguements, and because I believe this case is controlled by the Board's Malrite principal, I recommend dismissal of the complaint in its entirety.[5]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. J & H Rainwear, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Amalgamated Ladies' Garment Cutters Union, Local 10, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has not violated the Act in any respect alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[4] In addition to the Native Textiles case, the General Counsel also relies on Electronic Reproduction Service Corp., 213 NLRB 758 (1974). There Malrite was considered inapplicable because the employer had repudiated the entire collective-bargaining process by refusing to execute an agreed-on contract. Similarly, in AMF Inc., 219 NLRB 903 (1975), the Collyer doctrine was found indefensible to a series of violations resulting in "a complete breakdown in contract renewal negotiations, rather than a routine contract violation arising in the course of a bargaining relationship stabilized by an existing collective-bargaining agreement of fixed duration." Id. at 912. Clearly, these cases cannot reasonably be likened to the single contract violation involved in the instant matter.

[5] As noted above, the allegation that the Respondent refused access to its plant by any union representative unless Goldberg ceased acting as a union agency for the adjustment of grievances was not supported by any evidence at all, was not mentioned in the hearing, and was not argued in the brief. Indeed, it is contrary to the General Counsel's and the Union's candid and clear expression of the gravamen of the complaint. I therefore consider that allegation as having been abandoned.

[6] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 21 October 1983 Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, to which Respondent Buzzard Rentals filed an answering brief. Respondent Buzzard Rentals also filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

The judge found, inter alia, that Respondents Eagle Express Company and Buzzard Rentals, Inc. were engaged in substantially similar business operations and had ownership, employees, equipment, and customers in common. Based on these findings, the judge concluded that these companies were alter egos and thus jointly liable for the unfair labor practices found in this proceeding. Respondent Buzzard has excepted to this finding. We find merit in this exception.

The facts are summarized as follows. In June 1978, Long Investment Co., of which Paul Long was president and sole shareholder, purchased Eagle Express Company. This company, which possessed operating authority from the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Kentucky Department of Transportation, operated as an intrastate/-interstate motor carrier providing less than truckload service between its terminals located in Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee.[4] In October 1981, Long formed Buzzard Rentals, Inc. Long, who was also president of Buzzard Rentals, owned 35 percent of the shares of this company; the remaining shares were owned by various members of his family. The principal business of Buzzard Rentals, which was located in Lexington, Kentucky, was to provide equipment leasing and maintenance services to a number of motor carriers, including Eagle Express. In addition, Buzzard Rentals, which did not possess interstate operating authority, provided some local cartage service for Eagle Express and trip leasing services to other motor carriers.

In 1981, Eagle began experiencing financial difficulties attributable in part to Federal deregulation of the trucking industry. Its financial situation steadily deteriorated through 1982. On 17 December 1982, after having laid off drivers at its Louisville, Cincinnati, and Lexington terminals, Eagle ceased freight operations. Thereafter, its assets, including its operating authority and its equipment, were reassigned to its former owners. On 20 December 1982 Buzzard began operating in Lexington and Louisville as cartage agent for Express Serv-

[1] The complaint allegations pertain to incidents which occurred during January-December 1982. A petition for involuntary bankruptcy was filed against Eagle Express Company in February 1983. Eagle Express was adjudged a bankrupt corporation on 22 May 1983 and Fred E. Fugazzi Jr. was appointed a trustee in bankruptcy thereafter.

[2] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] In adopting the judge's conclusion that Respondent Eagle violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to notify and bargain with the Union over the wage reduction in January 1982, we find it unnecessary to rely on his citation to Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co., 235 NLRB 720 (1978). Further, in adopting the judge's finding that the parties reached impasse and that the Respondent thereafter was free to implement its final offer, including a reduction in wages, we find this case distinguishable from Bedford Farmers Cooperative, 259 NLRB 1226 (1982). In that case, the Board found, inter alia, that the respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) when it implemented a unilateral reduction in employees' working hours. In so doing, the Board rejected the respondent's contention that the existence of an impasse excused this unilateral action, noting that the reduction in hours occurred several weeks prior to the parties' first negotiating session. The Board also found that respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) when, during negotiations, it unilaterally, and in a manner contrary to a procedure to which the parties had tentatively agreed in a previous negotiating session, changed the method of computing overtime. By contrast, although the Respondent herein was found to have violated Sec. 8(a)(5) when it unilaterally reduced wages in January 1982, the record shows that reduced wages subsequently were discussed in the parties' negotiating sessions and were set forth as part of the Respondent's final offer which was implemented only after the parties reached impasse. Finally, we correct the judge's inadvertent error in referring to an 8(a)(3) allegation at par. 1 of the portion of his decision entitled "Statement of the Case"; the complaint contains no such allegation.

In adopting the judge's finding that the parties reached impasse on 17 May 1982 and Respondent Eagle therefore did not violate the Act when it implemented its final offer, Member Dennis finds it unnecessary to rely on the judge's discussion of when the Union filed unfair labor practice charges.

[4] At the time of purchase, there were six terminals: Somerset, Louisville, Lexington, and London, Kentucky; Cincinnati, Ohio; and Knoxville, Tennessee. Terminals in London and Knoxville were subsequently sold at unspecified times in 1980 and 1981.

ice, Inc., an interstate trucking company which had been formed by the assignees of the defunct Eagle. In this capacity, Buzzard transported a portion of the freight previously handled by Eagle for a number of the same customers previously serviced by Eagle.

In considering the allegation that Eagle and Buzzard were alter egos, we note first that the record shows that Eagle ceased operations for economic reasons unrelated to the Union. The record also shows that Buzzard existed as a separate business entity at least 1 year prior to Eagle's demise. Further, there is no evidence that Buzzard was conceived or established as a "disguised continuance" for the purpose of evading Eagle's contractual obligations or in an effort to avoid dealing with the union representative of its employees. In these circumstances, the Board generally will find alter ego status only if the two enterprises in question have substantially identical ownership, management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision. See Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976).

In this case, it is clear that Eagle and Buzzard had substantially identical ownership by the Long family. Additionally, Paul Long as president of both companies was responsible for their overall management. However, although both companies were technically involved in hauling freight, there was little similarity in their business purposes or methods of operation. Prior to its demise, Eagle employed approximately 50 drivers, held interstate operating authority, and maintained four terminals in several States. By contrast, Buzzard, a leasing and maintenance company which provided some cartage service, employed three drivers and maintained one facility. Further, the record shows that Buzzard owned equipment previously owned by Eagle and that this equipment was obtained at fair market prices based on independent appraisals. Finally, the record reveals that after Eagle's demise Buzzard performed freight services for a reduced number of the same customers previously serviced by Eagle. The record, however, does not indicate what percentage of Express Service's business were former Eagle customers nor does it contain evidence regarding the way in which Buzzard and Eagle were organized with respect to their lower level management.

In light of these circumstances, we find that, although Eagle and Buzzard had substantially identical ownership and upper level management, their business purposes and methods of operation were dissimilar. We also find that the portion of Buzzard equipment previously owned by Eagle was obtained at fair market prices and that Buzzard performed freight services for only a portion of the same customers previously serviced by Eagle. Thus, we find, contrary to the judge, that the General Counsel has not established that these companies were alter egos[5] and that Buzzard is not liable for the unfair labor practices found in this proceeding.

The judge also dismissed a portion of the complaint alleging that Respondent Eagle violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to bargain over driver layoffs and use of Buzzard employees. In so doing, the judge found that the layoff at the Louisville terminal coincided with a decision among Louisville employees to strike. The General Counsel has excepted to this finding, contending that the judge erred in construing the facts as the record shows that the Louisville strike vote occurred subsequent to the employees' layoff.

Undisputed testimony shows that in November 1982 Long began negotiating with a nonunion local cartage operator, Kentucky Transport, to provide cartage services at the Louisville terminal. Pursuant to these negotiations, these parties signed a contract on 10 December 1982, the day on which Eagle laid off city drivers and dockmen employed at its Louisville terminal. Thereafter, employees voted to strike and on 13 December 1982 began picketing at the terminal. Thus, we find in agreement with the General Counsel that the record clearly shows that the strike vote and picketing occurred subsequent to the closing of the Louisville terminal and layoff of its employees. However, notwithstanding these factual findings, we agree, for the reasons set forth, infra, with the judge's decision to dismiss the 8(a)(5) allegation pertaining to the layoff of Louisville employees.

The pertinent complaint allegations state:

> [9] (c) Since late December 1982, Respondent Eagle, at its [terminal] located at Louisville, Kentucky . . . laid off employees in the [unit] described above . . . utilizing the employees of Respondent Buzzard.
> (d) Respondents engaged in the acts and conduct described above . . . without the consent of, and without having afforded the Unions an opportunity to negotiate and bargain as the exclusive representative of the employees . . . with respect to such acts and conduct and without having bargained to a good faith impasse over such terms and conditions of employment.
> [10] By the acts and conduct described above . . . and by each of said acts, Respondents

have failed and refused, and are failing and refusing, to bargain collectively with the representative of its employees, and Respondents thereby have been engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

The General Counsel's exclusive theory, as alleged in the complaint and advanced at the hearing, was that Eagle never ceased doing business but continued to operate through its alter ego Buzzard. Thus, the General Counsel contends that, in laying off its employees and using the employees of Buzzard without the consent of and without having afforded the Unions an opportunity to bargain over this conduct, Eagle/Buzzard effected an unlawful transfer of unit work. However, for reasons stated above, we have determined that Eagle and Buzzard are not alter egos. There is also no evidence that employees of Buzzard or, for that matter, Kentucky Transport were performing the work previously performed by unit employees of Eagle. We thus find that, in light of immediate events, what is involved here is not a work transfer, but rather a decision to close down operations.

It is clear that when an employer decides to terminate or close its entire operations, once that decision is made, it must afford the employees' collective-bargaining representative the opportunity to bargain over the impact and effect of that decision on employees.[6] However, in examining the complaint, we find no mention, even in the alternative, of a failure to bargain over the effects of Eagle's decision to close down its operations. We thus find the complaint defective as we find that, although the General Counsel is entitled to rely on alternative theories, the Respondent is also entitled to proper notice that this is being done. In this instance, we find that the lack of notice of a possible alternative theory has precluded full and fair litigation of this issue. Accordingly, we shall dismiss this portion of the complaint.[7]

AMENDED REMEDY[8]

Having found that Respondent Eagle has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent Eagle shall make employees whole for all losses suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to pay contractual wage rates from 11 January 1982 when the Respondent implemented wage reductions until 17 May 1982 when the Respondent and the Union reached impasse during negotiations for a new contract. Employees shall also be made whole for losses suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to pay contractual cost-of-living increases on 1 April 1982. Such sums shall be computed in the manner set forth in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682, 683 (1970), with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Eagle Express Company, Somerset, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following as paragraph 2(a).

"(a) Make whole all employees for losses suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to pay employees contractual wage rates from 11 January through 17 May 1982 and failure to pay employees contractual cost-of-living increases due 1 April 1982 as set forth in the 'Amended Remedy.'"

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we have violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT deal directly with our employees concerning matters pertaining to conditions of employment while failing to bargain in good faith with their established collective-bargaining agent, Truckdrivers, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers Local 100, Teamsters Local 651, and General Drivers, Warehousemen & Helpers Local Union No. 89, all affiliated with International Brother-

[7] Member Dennis concurs in the dismissal of this complaint allegation on the grounds that Respondent Eagle's decision to lay off employees resulted from its decision to close down operations and that the issue whether Respondent Eagle violated the Act by failing to bargain about the effects of the decision was not fully litigated.

[8] The judge's remedy and recommended Order are modified to reflect our finding that Eagle Express and Buzzard Rentals are not alter egos and that Buzzard Rentals therefore is not liable for the unfair labor practices found. Also the amended remedy and Order correct the judge's failure to include a provision for the method of computation of backpay and interest which may be due discriminatees.

hood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America.

WE WILL NOT reduce the wages of any of our employees while failing to bargain in good faith with their established bargaining agent.

WE WILL NOT fail to pay our employees contractually guaranteed cost-of-living allowances while failing to bargain in good faith with their established collective-bargaining agent.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole all employees whose wages were illegally reduced by paying to them all lost wages throughout the period from 11 January to 17 May 1982, with interest, and WE WILL make whole all employees to whom we illegally denied cost-of-living increases due 1 April 1982, with interest.

EAGLE EXPRESS COMPANY

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS A. RICCI, Administrative Law Judge: A hearing in this proceeding was held on July 3 and August 5, 1983, at Lexington, Kentucky, on complaint of the General Counsel against Fred E. Fugazzi, Jr., Trustee in Bankruptcy for Eagle Express Company and Buzzard Rentals, Inc., here in together called the Respondent. The complaint was issued on June 22, 1983, on separate charges filed on June 21 and June 24, 1982, by three separate locals of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, herein called the Teamsters or the Union. The complaint alleges violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. An answer was filed only by Respondent Buzzard Rentals, Inc. Briefs were filed after the close of the hearing by the General Counsel and by Respondent Buzzard Rentals, Inc.

On the entire record and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

As set out below, Eagle Express Company and Buzzard Rentals, Inc. are one and the same, or alter egos, as alleged in the complaint. At all times material herein, Eagle Express, a Kentucky corporation with offices in several States, has been engaged in the interstate and intrastate transportation of freight by trucks. During the 12-month period ending in December 1982, it derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 for the transportation of freight and commodities in interstate commerce from the State of Kentucky to points outside the State. Buzzard Rentals, Inc., is also engaged in the transportation of freight in interstate commerce; in December 1982 it became a disguised continuance of Eagle Express. I find that the Respondent, Eagle Express Company and Buzzard Rentals, Inc., is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that Truckdrivers, Chauffeurs & Helpers Local Union No. 100, Teamsters Local 651, and General Drivers, Warehousemen & Helpers Local 89, all affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Case in Brief

The complaint names two companies as Respondents, Eagle Express Company and Buzzard Rentals, Inc., both in existence and doing business before the start of the events which gave rise to this proceeding. The unfair labor practices alleged can best be understood if taken in three separate parts. In January 1982 Eagle Express, then party to a continuing contract in effect with the Teamsters Union, the Charging Party here, acting unilaterally reduced the wages of all its employees in direct violation of its collective-bargaining agreement, with no regard to the existence of the bargaining representative. The first question presented therefore is: Was such action a violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act? The contract with the Teamsters expired on March 31, 1982, and the parties met a number of times in negotiations. Despite four such sessions, Eagle Express Company was unable to persuade the Union to agree to its proposals, which in substance aimed at obtaining the Union's approval of the reduced wages it had put in effect earlier, in January. In May 1982, convinced that it could never persuade the Union to accept its economic demands, the Company put its last offer in effect, in reality, continuing the reduced wages it had started in January. The next question, therefore, is: Had an impasse in bargaining been reached such as to justify the Company's action in implementing the offer the Union had persistently refused to accept?

Buzzard Rentals, Inc., the other Respondent named here, came into the picture in December 1982. It had long been in the trucking business, not as a regular operator but as a leasing company, as explained below. It is owned and operated by the same man who owns Eagle Express. The property of Eagle Express was repossessed by a creditor on December 17, 1982, and Buzzard started taking over the business that Eagle use to do. The third question is: Is Buzzard Rentals an alter ego of Eagle Express so that it is today liable for any obligations under the statute incurred by Eagle Express?[1]

[1] Eagle Express Co., in its own name, did not file an answer to the complaint. In a sense, therefore, it could be said the unfair labor practices alleged as to it are admitted. But in truth, Paul Long, the owner of both Eagle Express Co. and Buzzard Rentals, Inc., was the principal witness against the complaint at the hearing, and he denied all the complaint allegations, speaking also in defense of Eagle Express. I shall therefore dis-

B. Unilateral Action in January 1982 by Eagle Express

The following facts are undisputed. Eagle Express operated out of three terminals, among others, in Lexington, Louisville, and Cincinnati. On January 9, 1982—3 months before the union contract was due to expire—Long, the owner of the Company, gathered his Lexington drivers and told them they would have to accept a reduction in pay—to $10 per hour and 25 cents per mile. He gave each of them a form to sign, where their signatures would indicate whether they accepted or rejected his offer. Long explained to them how times were hard, and that they had a choice either to agree to the reductions or resign, take a voluntary leave of absence, or face a layoff. He also promised that at a later date he would hold another meeting with them to consider things further. He held a similar meeting with the drivers at the Cincinnati terminal shortly thereafter. Long told all the employees the reduced rates would be put in effect regardless of whether they agreed or not. On January 11, 1982, the Respondent in fact put the reduced rates in effect throughout its terminals and continued to pay the lesser rates regularly thereafter.

All this was done by Long without a word to the Union either before taking the action or when he did it. The Union first learned about the decrease in pay from the employees. That this was unilateral action, direct dealing with employees in disregard of the established bargaining agent during the terms of an effective collective-bargaining agreement, and therefore a straight violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, could not be clearer. Friederich Truck Service, 259 NLRB 1294 (1982). As the Board said in Los Angeles Marine Hardware Co., 235 NLRB 720, 735 (1978):

> [N]otwithstanding the persuasiveness and validity of an employer's economic straits, an employer is not free, without union consent, to make midterm modifications in wage rates.

I find the affirmative defense urged against this part of the complaint insufficient. It rests entirely upon a letter written on behalf of a trucker group to the International Brotherhood of Teamsters in February 1981 requesting reopening of the National Master Freight Agreement, which Eagle Express had individually signed. The basis for the request was that the "Motor Carrier Act of 1980 has had a significantly adverse effect on the financial structure of the trucking industry." The International's response stated: Your mere assertion that the Motor Carrier Act has a significantly adverse effect on the financial structure of the trucking industry is not proof of such fact; and until such fact is proven there cannot be any reopening of the statement."

There is nothing to indicate that whoever had made that reopening request of the International thereafter came forth with any evidence that in fact the Motor Carrier Act justified any reopening of the National Agreement. In fact, in the fall of 1981 the International Union and the National Truckers Association met and started negotiations toward renewal of the National Agreement. Eagle Express chose to have no part of that. Instead, it withdrew from the Area Conference Truckers Association of which it had been a member, and decided to act alone vis-a-vis the Union.

In his brief, counsel for Eagle Express repeatedly refers to Long's testimony as proof that the Respondent did request bargaining about its intent to change the conditions of employment during the term of the contract then in effect. That testimony, in total, consists of the following:

> Q. (By Mr. Spurlock) . . . did you renew your efforts with Teamsters Union to have the Agreement reopened?
> A. Yes, sir, we did.
> Q. And was that some time during 1981?
> A. In July—I believe in July of 1981.

Such a general, conclusionary statement will not do to evade the most fundamental Board law that, when there is a contract in effect and the employer wishes to change any of its substantive terms, he is obligated to advise the union in advance, and to discuss his intentions fully and directly, before taking unilateral action. Just as proof of the commission of an unfair labor practice must be affirmative and clear, so must an asserted, affirmative defense be proved by direct and substantive evidence. On this aspect of the case there is none such.

I find that, by dealing with its employees directly, behind the Union's back, as it were, and by lowering their rate of pay in total disregard of the established bargaining agent, the Respondent Eagle Express violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

C. Failure to Abide by Contract Terms on April 1, 1982

Among the provisions of the contract which expired on March 31, 1982, was included the following:

> Cost of living allowances shall be effective on October 1, 1979, April 1, 1980, October 1, 1980, April 1, 1981 and April 1, 1982, as set forth below:

On April 1, 1982, Eagle Express failed to pay this increase in cost-of-living to its employees. I find, as alleged in the complaint, that it thereby disregarded its contractual obligation without notice to the Union, changed another established condition of employment unilaterally, and thereby again violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

The argument, in defense, that because the contract had expired by the first of April the employer could disregard it altogether does not hold water here. The language is perfectly clear, and shows the parties intended, without question, that the agreement was to hold over even after March 31 as to this particular benefit to the employees. Heheman v. E. W. Scripps Co., 661 F.2d 1115 (6th Cir. 1981). There is no question of ambiguity in this can the merits of the case in full, and not be distracted by what is no more than an attempt to separate the two companies artificially. The end result will be, of course, binding on the trustee in bankruptcy, who is no more than an agent tentatively of the Respondent.

case on that score, for the language of the clause could not be clearer.

Nor do the facts support the alternative contention in the Respondent's brief that by April 1 the parties had reached an impasse in the collective-bargaining process which justified total disregard of the old contract. This unilateral action was taken only 1 week after the first bargaining session, which took place on March 25. All that had happened was that the Union had received the Company's detailed renewal contract proposal and responded that it would consider it. Whatever was to come later was not known then. One meeting is not enough to support a finding of impasse, even in this case. Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 207 NLRB 1063 (1973).

D. Impasse in Negotiations

Representatives of Eagle Express and of the three Teamsters Locals which spoke for all this Company's employees met in regular bargaining sessions on March 25, April 15, and May 7 and 17. The Company put into the hands of the Union a full proposal for renewal of the expired contract. Among its terms were the exact wages it had started paying back on January 11. There were also minor changes, but the consistent position of the Employer was that due to its economic difficulties it had to have those economic concessions—a definite lowering of labor costs compared to the old expired agreement. As the talking went on, there were minor changes in positions on both sides, but as to the true bone of contention, the basic wage rates and financial costs to the Company, neither party yielded an iota. As stated above, right after the May 17 meeting the Company put in effect its final offer, which had been rejected by the Union. Could the Respondent, under Board law, take such defensive action to protect its down-going business without committing an unfair labor practice? Considering all of the related, and very significant, facts, I think yes.

As has long been said, where a question of this kind is involved no two cases are alike; no single precedent can fix the answer to the next. Each must be evaluated in the light of those facts which bear directly upon the rational state of mind of the participants. At what point can it be said that "further meeting would have been fruitless," as the General Counsel quotes from 283 F.2d 733 (5th Cir. 1960). After the Respondent put the rejected offer in effect, the parties continued to meet and attempt to reach agreement on June 8, on August 20, September 7, and October 15. They never succeeded, especially as to the principal economic issue which had separated them from the beginning—the basic wage rates. Should the Respondent have waited until after the fifth meeting, or the sixth, or the seventh, or the eighth before doing what its economic condition made necessary? Did it have a right to consider its needs of the moment? After all, by December of that year, its property was taken over by a creditor, and in 1983 it found itself in bankruptcy!

The expired contract which this Respondent had signed conformed precisely with the Teamsters National Master Freight. The Teamsters International and the National Trucking Association had completed their renewal negotiations in February, just before the first meeting between these parties. Ray Cash, who was present for the Union at those bargaining sessions, first said he did not hear Marion Winstead, the principal union spokesman, say he had no authority to agree to anything short of the National Master Freight Agreement; then he added he did not remember. Long, for the Respondent, testified, without contradiction, that at the first meeting, on March 25, Winstead offered the Company the Master Freight Agreement which the International had made the month before, and it is a fact he never made any other offer to the Company until after the Company had put its last offer in effect. Indeed, even at the June 8 meeting, Winstead asked Long, again as Long testified without contradiction: "Paul, I want you to find out how soon you can restore the wages of these employees to the National Master Freight level." At the hearing Winstead denied having said he had no authority to deviate from the National Agreement, but in light of other facts, plus the character of his testimony on other questions raised, I cannot believe him.

The clearest fact on this record is that the main issue between Eagle Express and the Union was the Company's insistence upon reducing the wage rates.[2] There is no need for discoursing at length upon the fact that the Company was in financial straits. Its financial reports, received in evidence, prove that, and the matter is not disputed by the General Counsel. And it is equally obvious the Union knew this to be so. Yet, while talking at all times, at length, it never offered a single counterproposal to whatever the Company asked for. This brings us to the real question of this case. How long may a union delay an employer's financial retrenchment by simply talking without end? The Union kept saying it would consider the Company's proposals, and it did keep on talking about them with Long, but it never agreed and it never offered a counterproposal. For one of the parties simply to say "it will consider" a proposal, if repeated again and again, is not really bargaining in any true sense. Even when, in October, long after the May events, the Union did make a counterproposal, it still held firm to its insistence on the old wage scale set out in the Teamsters National Agreement. Normally, an employer asks for economic concessions to improve its financial position or to arrest a deteriorating condition. The longer the talking goes on, the greater the hurt to such a company. Here, the situation was even worse. The Company had reduced the wages 3 months earlier—illegally, it is true—because it had no alternative in order to survive. Bargaining in good faith is one thing, but utilizing the talking technique of negotiations as a device for keeping an employer from the necessary steps towards survival is something else again.

[2] As in most cases of this kind, the testimony of the witnesses is mixed with argument and vagaries as to exactly what was said at the various meetings. There were also received in evidence many documents exchanged which tend to confuse the total picture. But that the wage rate—as reduced by the Respondent earlier—was really what the bargaining was all about, is virtually conceded by the General Counsel in his brief. Long, the principal witness for the Respondent, said that at the second meeting the Company even was willing to accept all of the already negotiated Teamsters International contract if only the Local Union would accept his request for the reduced wages. From the General Counsel's brief: "Moreover, throughout the subsequent bargaining sessions in April and May of 1982, Long consistently insisted that the Union agree to the wage structure implemented on January 11, 1982."

Recognizing how perfectly this truism applies to the case at bar, the General Counsel makes an alternative argument in support of the complaint. He says there was no impasse because there was no real bargaining, and the reason the bargaining was not real is because the employer was in the act of committing a continuing unfair labor practice—paying the employees less than they were entitled to under the expired contract. He asks: How can a party be deemed to be carrying on good-faith bargaining while in the act of committing a statutory violation?

The argument jumps the gun. There was no unfair labor practice finding as of that time; indeed, no charge was filed at all until after the impasse had occurred. And when it was, a month later, it was essentially a charge that the Company had done things unilaterally before an impasse had been reached. It was only after reconsideration that a second charge was filed pinpointed to the January events. This indicates strongly that whatever had happened earlier was not in the mind of the union representatives when the bargaining was going on. But impasse, or realization by the parties that further bargaining would lead nowhere, is a state of mind. Moreover, in the industrial world collective bargaining between the employer and the union is concerned exclusively with the money or economic conditions of employment. It is not a milieu for evaluating conduct by either party that could, or could not, be deemed unlawful by the National Labor Relations Board.

All things considered, I find that the Respondent did not violate the statute when it put its last offer in effect on May 17. Accordingly, while it must make whole those employees for the reduction in pay imposed upon them from January 11, 1982, and thereafter, the cutoff date for such backpay liability becomes May 17, 1982. Similarly, while the Respondent must make whole the employees who were denied the cost-of-living increase on April 1, 1982, and thereafter, the cutoff date for such backpay liability also becomes May 17, 1982.

E. Allegations of Illegal Discharges

About December 13, 1982, the employees of Eagle Express went out on strike to compel the signing of a contract. At the same time Long, president and owner of Eagle Express, continued his trucking business by using what he called a cartage company, Buzzard Rentals. He was the president of that Company also, of which he owned 35 percent and his family members, wife and children, owned the rest. This is the Company called the alter ego of Eagle Express in the complaint. The complaint alleges that the Respondent "laid off" its old employees, and that such action was unlawful because the Respondent did not first talk to the Union about its intention to use its alter ego instead. But, in the light of all the evidence, what the General Counsel really contends is that by resorting to the cartage system, using another method to achieve its business demands, the Respondent in effect laid off the employees.[3]

There is no allegation in the complaint that such "layoffs" were discriminatorily motivated and therefore violations of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. True, the employees may have been replaced by the employees of the cartage Company, but actually fired by their employer they were not. That the object of the strike was to force economic concessions by the Employer is not really disputed here. It is not claimed this was an unfair labor practice strike. If an employer faced with such a problem resorts to another company to carry on its business, even another company which is no more than a "disguised continuation" of his own business, he is simply replacing economic strikers.

At this point an interesting part of the testimony came from Gary Wainscott, president of the Teamsters Cincinnati Local. Long testified that on December 15 he did lay off six employees at his Cincinnati terminal because Wainscott had asked him, "can you lay these people off?" because he "was getting a lot of heat." Wainscott, as a witness, testified that on December 10 or 13, after learning of the planned strike action, he telephoned Long from a Teamsters meeting taking place in Chicago. The question was: Did he ask Long to lay off the people instead of having them go on strike? Wainscott testified:

> I says, "hey, I heard through the grapevine that they were going to lay them off" because the other—the other terminals had struck him then and my people didn't want to strike, you know, to be perfectly honest with you, you know, when there's $45 in it, you can get unemployment for $200 they're going to wait. . . . He said he was going to open up a cartage company on the 13th of December, in Louisville, Kentucky. This would put those people in Louisville, Kentucky out of work, you know, who worked for Eagle Express.
> Q. . . . when you talked with him, did you indicate to him that if he laid his people off at Cincinnati, that that would entitle him to unemployment versus if you struck them, they wouldn't get unemployment?
> A. That's just common sense. Anybody knows that who's been with this industry, you know?
> Q. And your testimony is that you told him at that point, that if he didn't lay them off, that you were going to strike him—at Cincinnati?
> A. Maybe not in those words like you said, but I, similar to that.

This was literal admission by the union agent that he asked the Employer to lay off his people because they were going to strike anyway and would be better off financially receiving unemployment compensation benefits than standing idle getting nothing as strikers. And that the Union called a strike at all the terminals is also proved by the affidavit of one of the members who at-

[3] From the transcript:

> Q. . . . Are you saying laying off those people that day was 8(a)(3) as to them?

> MR. HORNER: That is about the size of it.

tended a meeting of all the employees at Lexington. The affidavit of Don Waddle, from the Louisville terminal, reads:

> I attended the union meeting on Saturday, December 11, 1982, at the offices of Teamsters Local 651 in Lexington, Kentucky. At this meeting we were informed by Ray Cash, Secretary Treasurer of Local 651 that Paul Long was not going to pay our medical insurance any more. The members of Local 651 who attended this meeting all voted to go on strike against Eagle Express.

As to the contention, articulated in the General Counsel's brief, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by failing to discuss with the Union its intention to use the cartage system, it fails entirely in the light of the strike which came at that very time. I make no finding on this record that Eagle Express discharged anyone against his will.

F. The Alter Ego Issue

Whatever his reason, in December 1982 Long, the owner and day-to-day operator in charge of the business of Eagle Express, started to use Buzzard Rentals to do the trucking business for him. As stated, he was also, and had long been, president of that Company too, personally owning 35 percent and his family owning the rest. The witnesses kept referring to Buzzard Rentals as a cartage company. As best I understand it, this means that, instead of servicing shipping companies with its own trucks and trailers and with its own drivers, sometimes the trucking company has a cartage company do the trucking for it. Sometimes it leases trucks from the cartage company; sometimes it contracts for the cartage company to do the actual transportation using its own trucks. And when it does that, the cartage company sometimes uses drivers of the trucking company, like Eagle Express, and sometimes does the trucking with drivers on its own payroll.

Buzzard Rentals always conducted its business at Nardino Boulevard in Lexington. Before these events in 1982 it used to purchase vehicles from Eagle Express and lease them back to that same company. This is from Long's testimony. Apparently, as owner and operator of both companies, he did as he pleased, but that very arrangement bespeaks an absolute singleness of identity between the two companies or, as alleged, alter ego status between the two. Buzzard Rentals also serviced the vehicles at its own terminal, and transported freight from one Eagle Express terminal to another, as a service for Eagle.

Long testified that Eagle Express closed its Knoxville terminal on December 3 and its Sommerset and Louisville terminals on December 10 with the strike being imminent. He continued that, for a week at the Louisville terminal, he tried to use an outside cartage company to do his business there, but that arrangement did not work out. From then on, Long used Buzzard Rentals to do all the transportation for Eagle Express' customers. On December 20, Eagle's Lexington terminal, the "hub" of all its activities, according to the witnesses, was completely vacated, and all the equipment, including office and freight moving tools, plus all stored freight, was moved to the old central terminal of Buzzard Rentals in the same city. Long Investment Company, which Paul Long owns and which was the financial support at Eagle Express, continued to do the sales work for Buzzard Rentals as it had always done for Eagle Express.

That all this was simply a continuation of the same business under another name is rather clear from Long's testimony, despite his attempts at evasion at the hearing.

> Q. . . . is it not accurate to say that you resumed the freight operations using Buzzard Rental facilities on Nandino Boulevard the following Monday morning which would have been December 20, 1982?
> A. We were using Buzzard facilities if we moved on the 15th, the 16th.
> Q. Okay, for the transportation of freight?
> A. For Eagle Express.

Asked had not the arrangement continued without interruption, Long at first equivocated:

> Q. . . . And you continued using that Nandino Boulevard facility right up until the present?
> A. No, sir, approximately three or four weeks ago, the operation over there is just a garage again.

He then admitted directly that nothing changed between the time the move was made in December 1982 to June 1983. Buzzard Rentals just continued to do Eagle Express old business.

What is also clear is that Paul Long continued to control the operations of the new terminal on a day-to-day basis as he had done before. After several times avoiding direct answers on whether he hired and fired employees there, he finally said: "I had some direct influence on those people that may have been employed or let go, but not necessarily that I perform the hiring or the discharging of employees." Had he discharged an employee named Don Draper? "I could have." As a witness for the General Counsel Draper testified directly that in January 1983 Paul Long personally discharged him. Had the discharge of an employee named Don Buggs been discussed with him? "As President and Chief Executive of the Company, if I was there, I would think that that is normal." Asked had he been in charge of the new operation regularly, Long answered: "Okay, in the 30 days of January, I may have been there two or three days a week for the frequency of maybe at most, an hour. "Barry Dance, who was Eagle Express terminal manager in Lexington, continued as terminal manager for Buzzard Rentals at the same location. Asked did Dance's new rate of pay have to be cleared with him, Long twice simply refused to answer.

I find that Buzzard Rentals is in fact the alter ego of Eagle Express in Board language. It all centers on Paul Long. He is the owner of both; he runs the operations of Buzzard Rentals exactly as he did that of Eagle Express; the business being carried on is exactly the same kind; and even the customers, in major part, are the same as before (some new customers were added, but that is no more than a normal occurrence in the trucking business). Sometimes supervisors were switched from the first company to the next. The employees were not the same, but that aspect of the business has nothing to do with the question here. For some time at least, the trucks continued to bear the name Eagle Express. The former employees are on strike, they are still the same company's employees, and the employer, by whatever name, is still obligated to bargain with their established representative.

In sum, it is an all-in-the-family situation. A man named Michael Whitaker was the terminal manager in charge of Eagle Express terminals all over the place. When Long first bought this business, he bought it from Whitaker's mother in 1978, paying in part with promissory notes. The creditor who sued and took over property belonging to Eagle Express in December 1982 was Whitaker's mother. But Whitaker himself remained as terminal manager at some of the trucking terminals. He, too, uses Buzzard Rentals as a cartage company agent, and was still using it at the time of the hearing in exactly the same fashion as Eagle Express, or Long, was doing. Again, some of the customers were the same old ones, with the normal coming and going of different customers in the trucking industry. The total picture shows a continuation of the same business, by the same people, but under a different name. See Denzil S. Alkire, 259 NLRB 1323 (1982); Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976).

That the Union represented a majority of the employees of this Company in December 1982 when the strike started is not contradicted; the Respondent as then named did not even file an answer to the complaint. Indeed, the parties were actively engaged in direct negotiations. As the alter ego of Eagle Express Company, Buzzard Rentals is subject to the same obligation today.

THE REMEDY

The Respondent, meaning Eagle Express Company and Buzzard Rentals, Inc., must be ordered to undo the effects of the unfair labor practices found herein. All employees of Eagle Express as of January 11, 1982, whose wages were reduced at that time must be made whole for wages lost, the cutoff date being May 17, 1982, when an impasse was reached in negotiations towards a new contract. Similarly, all employees who were denied the cost-of-living raises called for in the contract as of April 1, 1982, must be made whole for such nonpayments, again up to May 17, 1982.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By dealing directly with its employees while failing to bargain in good faith with the established collective-bargaining agent, the Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

2. By reducing the wage scale of its employees during the effective term of a regular collective-bargaining agreement, and while failing to bargain with the established collective-bargaining agent, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

3. By withholding contractually binding payments due the employees on April 1, 1982, while failing to bargain in good faith with their established bargaining agent, the Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, Eagle Express Company and Buzzard Rentals, Inc., Somerset, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Dealing directly with its employees while failing to bargain in good faith with their established collective-bargaining agent.

(b) Reducing the wage scale of its employees during the effective term of a regular collective-bargaining agreement while failing to bargain with their established bargaining agent.

(c) Withholding contractually binding payments due the employees pursuant to a regular contract in effect while failing to bargain in good faith with their established bargaining agent.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole all employees whose wages were reduced illegally, as found herein, and who were denied contractually binding payments, by payment to them of such sums as would have been paid absent Respondent's unlawful unilateral reduction in pay and discontinuance of contractual payments until May 17, 1982.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at all its terminals copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

Foam Fabricators of Minnesota, Inc. and District No. 165, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, Petitioner. Case 18–RC–13521

14 December 1984

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered a determinative challenge in an election held 5 December 1983 and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of it. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows eight for and eight against the Petitioner, with one challenged ballot.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions, has adopted the hearing officer's findings and recommendations only to the extent consistent herewith, and finds that a certification of results of election should be issued (hearing officer's report is attached). We find, contrary to the hearing officer, that as of the date of the election Wendell Ross did not have a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near future. Accordingly, we uphold the challenge to Ross' ballot.

The Employer is a fabricator of synthetic foam products and employs approximately 18 workers at its facility in Maple Lake, Minnesota. Its business in the past 8 years has followed a fairly regular pattern. Until October 1983 the Employer never laid off any of its employees. As a result of expansion in May 1983[1] the Employer opened a premold department to produce packaging foam molds fabricated from isocyanate foam.

Wendell Ross was hired on 9 May to help staff the new premold department. When hired Ross was told that he would be worked into other departments if premold work was low. In fact, he did work in various other departments of the Employer from time to time.

In early October the Company learned that its premold purchase order contract from Central Container Corporation was terminating and that no further orders from this major customer would be forthcoming. The Employer's president, Richard Somers, testified that upon learning this he decided a reduction in the work force of the premold department was necessary and that the reduction should be accomplished by laying off the least senior full-time employee.[2] On 13 October Somers explained the business situation to Ross. Somers told him that one part-time employee had less seniority and that Ross could take that position if he wanted to. Ross declined the offer. Somers then handed him a memo, of which the first paragraph read:

> We are experiencing a noticeable reduction in the volume of new orders. Unfortunately this necessitates a reduction in our work force. Your employment date . . . places you lowest in seniority in our work force. Therefore we are compelled to lay you off at this time. It is not possible to forecast the duration of this layoff.

At the time of Ross' layoff some premold work remained unfinished. This was completed by two other employees in early November.

The record indicates that the only information Ross received regarding the possible duration of his layoff was the notice itself. Between 13 October and 5 December, the date of the election, there was no further contact between Ross and the Company.

In mid-November the Company's sales representative Mark Somers was enthusiastic regarding a potential new premold contract from a large customer. President Somers' testimony indicated that if the contract had been approved the Company might have reopened the premold department in February 1984 at the earliest.[3] It is clear from the record that at no time was the news of this potential contract communicated by the Company to Ross. Nor was Ross contacted at any time to see if he would be interested in returning to work in February. Although there may have been an initial enthusiastic report concerning this potential customer, there is nothing to indicate that the Company took any further action other than waiting to see if its bid was going to be accepted. As of 9 December it knew that its bid would not be accepted.

It is well established that the entitlement of laid-off employees to vote in a representation election depends on whether such employees have a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near future. The determination of this expectancy in turn depends on objective factors including the past experience of the employer, the employer's future plans, and

[2] Since the Employer had never laid anyone off before this was its first application of seniority.

[3] This potential contract was at best a hopeful expectation on the part of the Company:

> Q. Did he [the sales representative] have any firm commitments from whatever the customer—potential customer—was, for the work?
> A. No. Only a conversation. No purchase order or anything else.

the circumstances of the layoff, including what employees were told as to the likelihood of recall.[4] The appropriate time frame when determining expectancy of recall is the situation as it existed at the time of the election rather than subsequent developments.[5]

When the employer has had a past history of layoffs and recalls it is somewhat easier to determine exactly what would be a reasonable expectancy of reemployment in the near future. If the business pattern follows a cyclical or seasonal term and employees who are laid off are usually rehired, the prediction can be made with some accuracy.[6] However, here it is clear that the Employer has had no past history of layoffs and recall. The record indicates that the Employer's business has been more or less stable for the past 8 years. The recently created premold department was a business venture based on anticipated purchase orders requiring premold foam. Ross was informed that the department was new before he was hired. In fact the premold department was not operational until he was hired by the Employer. When the major purchase order to supply foam fabricated in the premold department was canceled Somers decided to complete the remaining small orders and close the department. Thus, for the first time in 8 years the Employer made a decision to lay off one of its employees.

Although Ross was informed when hired that the Company had never laid off any employees there was no way for the Company to foresee that it would lose its major purchase order for the product Ross was being hired to produce. There was also no way for the Company to accurately predict whether it would again reopen the premold department.

Absent any employer past experience or future plans, where an employee is given no estimate as to the duration of the layoff or any specific indication as to when, if at all, he will be recalled there is no reasonable expectancy. Vague statements by the employer as to the "chance" or "possibility" of the employee being rehired do not provide an adequate basis for concluding that the employee had a reasonable expectancy of reemployment. Tomadur, Inc., supra. Here, the Employer's hope that it could reopen the premold department was never disclosed to Ross. He was informed only that it was not possible to forecast the duration of the layoff. We find that such a statement, without more, does not give rise to a reasonable expectancy of recall. The statement by the Employer, that it was "compelled to lay [Ross] off at this time," is nothing more than a vague implication that Ross may eventually be recalled and is insufficient to give rise to a reasonable expectation of recall in the near future.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

IT IS CERTIFIED that at a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for District No. 165, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO and that it is not the exclusive representative of these bargaining unit employees.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

Contrary to my collegues I find that there was a reasonable expectancy at the time of the election that laid-off employee Wendell Ross would be recalled in the near future. Accordingly, I would affirm the hearing officer's recommendation that the challenge to the ballot of Wendell Ross be overruled. My colleagues' arrival at the contrary result flows from a distorted application of precedent.

It is well settled, as my colleagues do not dispute, that a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near future entitles an employee on layoff to vote in a representation election. The existence of such an expectancy is evaluated on the basis of several objective factors, only one of which is given any effect by the majority. As the Board recently held in Atlas Metal Spinning Co., 266 NLRB 180 (1983), "the objective factors which the Board employs to determine whether an employee possesses such an expectancy include the employer's past experience, the employer's future plans, the circumstances of the layoff, and what the employee was told about the likelihood of recall" (emphasis added).

Application of these criteria to the instant case leads easily to the conclusion that at the time of the election Ross had a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near future. Nothing in the Company's past experience indicated that Ross' layoff would be particularly long or permanent. The Employer had never before laid off even a single employee in 8 years of operation prior to October 1983. Indeed, as recently as May 1983, the Employer had actually expanded its operations.[1] Therefore, the Employer's statement to Ross that "we are compelled to lay you off at this time" (emphasis added) is an indication that the anticipated duration of the layoff would not be particularly long, and was reasonably likely to last only until the Employer's volume of new order increased. The Employer's next statement, "It is not possible to forecast the duration of this layoff," is no more than a simple statement of fact which in no way portends a long or short layoff; thus, unlike the preceding statement, it cannot be considered an objective indication of how long or short Ross' layoff would be.[2]

[1] Thus, contrary to my colleagues' assertion that there is an "[absence of] any employer past experience," the record establishes that the Employer has a past experience of no layoffs within the last 8 years as well as a recent expansion of operations.

The test for determining expectancy of recall in the near future is based on the situation as it existed at the time of the election, rather than on subsequent developments.[3] Here, at the time of the election of 5 December 1983, the Employer's top management was "very enthusiastic"—and had been so since mid-November—about a potential contract which would necessitate the reestablishment of Ross' department. Award of that contract to the Employer would enable the recall of Ross (whom the Employer considered a good employee) about 2 months later.[4] On 9 December, 4 days after the election, the Employer's expectations of increased business were defeated. But the fact remains that, at the time of the election, there was a reasonable expectancy that as a result of the anticipated contract Ross would be recalled in the near future. That the anticipated contract was eventually lost in normal bidding does not post facto undermine the reasonableness of the Employer's expectations during the contract bidding period.

My colleagues hinge their decision solely on what Ross was told at the time of his layoff. They state that if there is no "estimate as to the duration of the layoff or any specific indication as to when, if at all, he will be recalled," there is no reasonable expectancy that an employee will be recalled. This absolute statement ignores the Board's longstanding practice of considering other applicable criteria in such cases. My colleagues also distort Board precedent by using a subjective analysis based on employee reaction to employer statements rather than the objective test that has consistently been applied by the Board. In so doing they establish that a laid-off employee's eligibility to vote depends solely on what he is told by the employer, rather than on the reasonable prospect that this employee will in the near future again be part of the work force which is electing whether or not to be represented. My colleagues' decision undermines the Act's objectives of protecting employee rights to participate in a secret-ballot election. I therefore dissent.

HEARING OFFICER'S REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION TO THE BOARD ON CHALLENGED BALLOT

Pursuant to a Stipulation For Certification Upon Consent Election Executed by the parties an approved by the Acting Regional Director for Region Eighteen of the National Labor Relations Board on November 11, 1983,[1] an election by secret ballot was conducted among certain employees of the Employer[2] on December 5. Upon the conclusion of the election a Tally of Ballots was served on the parties in accordance with the Board's Rules and Regulations. The Tally of Ballots disclosed that the challenged ballots were sufficient in number to affect the results of the election.[3] The Acting Regional Director issued and served on the parties on December 12, a Report on Challenged Ballot, Order Directing Hearing on Challenged Ballot and Notice of Hearing. Pursuant thereto, a hearing was held on December 22, before the undersigned Hearing Officer duly designated for the purpose of conducting such hearing. All parties were represented at the hearing and had full opportunity to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses, to introduce evidence pertinent to the issues, and to make statements in support of their respective positions.

Upon the entire record in this case, and from my careful observation of the demeanor and manner of the witnesses while testifying under oath, I make the following[4]

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS

As part of the Stipulation For Certification Upon Consent Election executed by the Employer and the Petitioner, the parties incorporated a written and signed eligibility list wherein it was agreed that the eligibility list would be final and binding upon the parties pursuant to the doctrine established in Norris-Thermador Corporation, 119 NLRB 1301 (1958). However, by the terms of this eligibility list, the parties expressly reserved "the right to

Void ballots—0
Votes cast for Petitioner—8
Votes cast against Petitioner—8

Valid votes counted plus challenged ballots—17

[4] In the resolution of all issues for which the credibility or oral testimony becomes a factor, I have carefully considered the demeanor and conduct of the witnesses as well as their candor, their objectivity, their bias or their lack thereof and have carefully weighed the witnesses' understanding of the matters to which they testified, the plausibility, consistency and probability of their testimony, as well as whether parts of their testimony should be accepted when other parts are rejected.

challenge the voting eligibility (of Wendell Ross) as the employee is on layoff status."

During the election conducted on December 5, the Employer challenged the ballot of Wendell Ross, contending that he was no longer an employee of the Employer. At the hearing, the Employer maintained this position. The Petitioner's contention has been that Wendell Ross was temporarily laid off on October 13 and had a reasonable expectancy of reemployement at the time of the December 5 election. In the course of the December 22 hearing, Richard Somers, President and General Manager of Foam Fabricators of Minnesota, Inc. and Wendell Ross testified.

Wendell Ross was hired by Foam Fabricators of Minnesota, Inc., On May 9 to work as a premolder in the Company's newly reestablished premold department, wherein packaging molds are fabricated from isocyanate foam. Prior to the reopening of a premold department in May, the Company had such a department for a three-to-four month period in 1981. The occasion prompting the premold department's recreation in May was the acquisition of a major purchase order from Central Container Corporation; this purchase order comprisded 90–95% of the premold department's work orders. At the time the premold department was reopened, a Company employee, Steve Mooney, was transferred from the Company's cutting area to work with the newly hired Ross in premold. Additionally, a third employee was occasionally called in to assist Ross and Mooney when further labor was necessary. When the premold department equipment was for some reason inoperative, Ross and Mooney would work in other areas of the Company. Somers testified that Ross was, in fact, capable of working in any department. Ross' testimony was that he spent approximately 15–20% of the work time in departments other than premold. Ross also testified that at the time he was hired, he specifically asked Plant Superintendent John Provo about the permanency of the premolder position and that he was told that he would be worked into other departments if premold work was low. The fact that the Company had never had a layoff was used as an "enticement" during the interview, according to Ross.

In early October, the Company learned that the purchase order from Central Container Corporation was terminating and that no further orders from this major customer would be anticipated. Somers testified that, upon learning this, he decided that a reduction in the workforce, i.e., the premold department, was necessary. On October 13, Somers handed to Ross a memo, of which the first paragraph reads:

> Dear Sir:
> We are experiencing a noticeable reduction in the volume of new orders. Unfortunately this necessitates a reduction in our work force. Your employment date of May 9, 1983, places you lowest in seniority in our work force. Therefore we are compelled to lay you off at this time. It is not possible to forecast the duration of this lay off.[5]

[5] Somers testified that this had been the only application of seniority in Foam Fabricators' history.

After receiving this memo and declining the offer of a parttime job at a reduced pay rate, Ross punched out and left the Company's facility. No conversation as to the nature or duration of the layoff occurred.

Somers testified that at the time of Ross' layoff, approximately $7200[6] volume of premold work remained to be completed, and that Mooney and employee Joan Greninger finished this in early November. After this, Mooney and Greninger were transferred to full-time positions in other departments of the Company. From about November 15–18, 1983, the premold department, staffed with Mooney and Greninger, completed a small order for another premold account.

In mid-November, 1983, Foam Fabricators sales representative Mark Somers (President Richard Somers' son) returned from Omaha, Nebraska, with what Richard Somers testified to as a "very enthusiastic" report regarding a potential contract with Control Data Corporation, which contract would necessitate the reestablishment of the premold department in approximately February, 1984.[7] Somers further testified that if the premold department were to reopen, he would hire Ross, whom he considers to have been a good employee. Somers' optimism that this premold contract, for which the Company had submitted a bid in August or September, would be obtained continued until December 9. Somers testified that Mark Somers learned on December 9 that the Control Data contract bid had fallen through and that he himself was so notified on December 12. The premold department has not been in operation since about November 18, and Somers states that "it's under investigation" whether the lease for the leased premold equipment can be broken, in view of the departments' shutdown.

Based on the foregoing and the record as a whole, I conclude that at the time of the representation election Wendell Ross enjoyed an expectancy of recall and that this expectancy was a reasonable one. I rely particularly on the fact that as of the date of the election, i.e., December 5, it was anticipated that a sizable premold contract would be obtained which would result in reinstating both the premold department and according to Somers, Ross as an employee. "The test for determining the expectancy of recall is the situation as it existed at the time of the election." Atlas Metal Spinning Co., 266 NLRB 180 (1983) (emphasis added), citing Thomas Engine Corporation, 196 NLRB 706 (1972). The fact that the Company learned on December 9 that this contract would not be obtained after all is inconclusive as to Ross' voting eligibility on December 5. Likewise, Somers' testimony that there were no prospects for premold orders at the time of the hearing has no bearing on Ross' voting rights at the time the election was conducted. Atlas

[6] According to Somers' testimony, the average monthly sales volume from the premold department was $8,018.

[7] Somers' testimony that, on the basis of the Control Data report, the premold department might reopen in February 1984 is consistent with an affidavit given to the Board during the investigation of Case No. 18-CA-8516, which affifavit was admitted into evidence at the December 22 hearing herein. However, my findings and conclusions are based solely on Somers' testimony at the hearing and were made without reference to or reliance upon this affidavit.

Metal Spinning Co., above. Further, nothing in the Company's past revealed to Ross that his layoff would be permanent; in fact, Ross' uncontradicted testimony indicated that the Company's no-layoff history was specifically emphasized during Ross' employment interview. Therefore, Somers' October 13 memo to Ross that he was compelled "to lay you off at this time" reasonably created an expectancy of recall. The facts that the duration of the layoff was not specifically stated or that the future personnel needs of Foam Fabricators were still unclear do not negate the reasonableness of this expectancy. See, e.g., Atlas Metal Spinning Co., above; Jobbers' Supply Inc., 236 NLRB 112, 113 (1978), enforced, 625 F.2d 754 (6th Cir. 1980).

RECOMMENDATION

In accordance with the foregoing facts, I recommend that the challenge to the ballot of Wendell Ross be overruled, and that Ross' ballot be opened and counted in order that a Revised Tally of Ballots may be issued and served on the parties.

I further recommend that if the Revised Tally of Ballots reveals that the Petitioner has received a majority of the valid votes cast, a Certifiation of Representative issue. On the other hand, if the Revised Tally of Ballots reveals that the Petitioner has not received a majority of the valid votes cast, it is recommended that a Certification of Results issue.[8]

[8] As provided in Section 102.69 of the Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, Series 8, amended, within 10 days from the date of issuance of this Report, any party may file with the Board in Washingion, D.C. an original and seven copies of exceptions thereto. Immediately upon the filing of such exceptions, the party filing same shall serve a copy thereof on the other parties and shall file a copy with the Regional Director and a statement of service shall be made to the Board simultaneously therewith. If no exceptions are filed hereto, the Board will adopt the recommendations of the Hearing Officer.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

Upon a charge duly filed on 17 March 1978 by Carvel Corporation, herein called Carvel, against Respondent Teamsters Local 456, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Acting Regional Director for Region 2, issued a complaint on 14 April 1978, alleging that the Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act. Copies of the charge and complaint and notice of hearing before an administrative law judge were duly served on the Respondent and the Charging Party. Thereafter, the Respondent filed a timely answer denying the commission of any unfair labor practices. A hearing before an administrative law judge was scheduled for 15 May 1978.

Meanwhile, pursuant to the provisions of Section 10(l) of the Act, a petition for an injunction was filed by the Acting Regional Director for Region 2 on behalf of the National Labor Relations Board in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. In lieu of a hearing on the petition for an injunction, the parties agreed to submit to the court, as the official record, the testimony and exhibits adduced at the hearing before an administrative law judge.

A hearing was held on 15 May 1978, before Administrative Law Judge George F. McInerny at which time certain exhibits were received into evidence and certain stipulations were entered into on the record. At the close of the hearing, the judge granted the General Counsel's motion to transfer the proceeding to the Board for decision. By order dated 3 August 1978, the Board granted the General Counsel's motion, transferred the proceeding to itself, and set a date for the filing of briefs. Thereafter, briefs were filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

On 10 October 1978, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York granted the Board's petition for a preliminary injunction.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record herein, including the briefs, and makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

Carvel Corporation is a Delaware corporation with its principal office and place of business in Yonkers, New York, where it maintains its offices and warehouse facilities. Carvel is primarily engaged in the licensing of individuals to operate retail ice cream stores and in the servicing of those ice cream stores. The complaint alleges, and the Respondent admits, that during the calendar year ending 31 December 1977, a representative period, Carvel, in the course and conduct of its business, purchased and received goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 from outside the State of New York. The answer also admits, and we find, that Carvel is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act and that it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The complaint further alleges, and the Respondent admits, that Barbara Grossman, herein Grossman, is an individual proprietor engaged in operating a retail ice cream store in Elmsford, New York, pursuant to a licensing agreement with Carvel. The Respondent also admits, and we find, that Grossman is a person within the meaning of Section 2(1) of the Act. In the absence of facts either in the pleadings or elsewhere in the record sufficient to prove that Grossman is, in fact, engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and since jurisdiction is otherwise established to our satisfaction, we need not make any findings regarding the "commerce" status of Grossman.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Local 456, Teamsters and Chauffeurs Union, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

In March 1978,[2] the Respondent began a campaign to organize a unit of drivers, dispatchers, and warehousemen employed by Carvel at its warehouse in Yonkers, New York. On 8 March the Respondent requested that Carvel recognize and bargain with it as the representative of those employees, which request Carvel refused. The Respondent then commenced picketing at the warehouse location in order to obtain recognition. On or about 25 March the Respondent sent a letter to independently operated Carvel licensees indicating its intention to set up picket lines at selected Carvel ice cream stores. On 1 April the Respondent picketed the store owned and operated by Grossman with picket signs saying, "Local 456 International Brotherhood of Teamsters to the Public Do Not Buy Carvel Corp. Products." The parties stipulated that the Respondent has no labor dispute with Grossman or other Carvel licensees, its dispute being only with Carvel Corporation.

As noted, Carvel is in the business of licensing individuals, such as Grossman, to operate stores which sell Carvel ice cream products. Pursuant to a license agreement drawn up by Carvel, the licensee obtains the right to operate the store under the Carvel name and to sell, at retail, Carvel products. Although Carvel Corporation does not manufacture its own products, it licenses independently owned and operated dairies to prepare the ice cream mix according to a recipe originated by Carvel. Carvel also licenses independent companies to manufacture the various paper and service goods such as napkins, plastic serving dishes, etc., utilized by the stores. Such items are required to have the Carvel name and trademark imprinted on them.

Carvel receives revenues from two major sources: store operations and trademarks. The former includes the sale of goods and services, such as ice cream mix, commissary items, and equipment and machinery, to store owners. The latter includes trademark license fees for the continuous "rental" of the use of the Carvel name and trademark.[3] It also includes a royalty fee, currently set at 59 cents a gallon, attached to each gallon of ice cream mix purchased by a store owner.

Carvel Corporation has assumed the responsibility of arranging for national advertising of Carvel products. To this end, it has established a "fair share" advertising program pursuant to which a majority of store owners contribute a sum of money, added on to each gallon of ice cream purchased by them, to help defray advertising costs. Until recently, a store owner was not required to participate in this advertising program. However, present licensing agreements require that advertising payments be made, even though a store owner may also advertise on his own.

In order to apply for a license agreement, a prospective licensee must, after certain preliminaries, submit to a credit review and advance a good-faith deposit of $1000. Generally, a prospective licensee will suggest a general geographic area for the location of his store, and Carvel will search its files to determine if the requested area previously had been surveyed by it and found to be suitable. If so, this information is presented to a prospective licensee who must give final approval of any suggested site. If the location is considered to be inadequate or if Carvel had not done a prior market survey, Carvel would look for and survey a new location.

After the applicant has approved the location for the store, the real estate subsidiary of Carvel negotiates with the owner of the property to obtain a lease. Carvel is involved in these negotiations for a variety of reasons, not the least of which is the fact that Carvel has bargaining power not available to the average licensee. Utilizing Carvel's real estate knowledge will usually result in a better deal for the licensee. The real estate subsidiary signs the lease which contains a provision allowing Carvel to assign the lease. After the lease is, in fact, assigned to the licensee, he pays rent directly to the owner of the property, not to Carvel. The actual licensing agreement is issued to the licensee simultaneously with the lease for the premises.

The actual construction of the ice cream store is the responsibility of the licensee although Carvel, because of its knowledge of the business, provides plans and specifications for the licensee to submit to his contractor. However, the licensee may make changes in those plans, the most common of which is the addition of more equipment. In most instances, a licensee purchases his equipment and machinery directly from Carvel. Except for certain items available only from Carvel, the licensee remains free to purchase most other equipment and machinery from sources other than Carvel, although Carvel must approve that outside source. As a practical matter, most licensees do purchase their equipment from Carvel, since Carvel can provide them more cheaply because it buys these items in large quantities. Furthermore, since most licensees must finance these major purchases, they turn to Carvel who will finance only equipment purchased from it, not from other sources. However, a licensee is not obligated to obtain financing from Carvel and, in fact, is encouraged to seek financing elsewhere.

Two items which Carvel requires the licensees to have are leased, rather than sold, by Carvel: the front gate plate assembly, which is an attachment to the ice cream machine, and the Carvel sign on the exterior of the store. Carvel and the licensee enter into a separate, sign-equipment lease to cover these two items, which are patented by Carvel.

The license agreement governs the rights and obligations of the parties thereto. The licensee is also required to adhere to the provisions of the Standard Operating Procedure manual which contains, inter alia, trade secrets relating to the manufacture of Carvel ice cream. Failure to abide by the terms of the license agreement or the SOP Manual is considered a breach of the agreement.

The licensee is, for the most part, free to operate his store as he sees fit. Pursuant to the terms of the license agreement, the licensee is required to operate the store 11 months of the year and the hours of the day as specified in the manual. Additionally, Carvel suggests that the store remain open 7 days a week. In actual practice, a licensee is free to determine his own hours and days of operation without prior consulation with or approval from Carvel. Carvel also suggests the price at which a particular product may be sold, although a licensee may sell his products at any price he wants. Carvel retains the right to inspect the store at any time. Most problems found either in the appearance or operation of the store are of a minor nature and the owner is asked to correct them and to certify that they have been remedied. The most flagrant violation of the license agreement is the sale of non-Carvel products, which constitutes a breach of a primary provision in the agreement by which a licensee agrees to sell only Carvel products. Such a breach could lead to the termination, by Carvel, of the agreement. Grossman testified that she sells only ice cream products, although it appears that Carvel does supply pretzels to some stores. While a licensee may sell such items as coffee and soft drinks, these items account for only a negligible percentage of sales. While only Carvel products may be sold as a general rule, the licensee is not required to sell all the items in the Carvel products line; he may choose from among those items.

The licensee agrees to purchase from Carvel, or some other source approved by Carvel, "all special formula mixes, toppings, flavorings, and other ingredients, cones and any other items sold as a part of the end product that is offered for consumption to the retail purchaser"; certain items of machinery, as noted infra, and commissary items (spoons, dishes, etc.). While the majority of ingredients used in the preparation of ice cream products are purchased from Carvel, the licensee is free to purchase such items as coffee, fruit, and milk from sources which do not require Carvel's approval. Should a licensee wish to purchase printed items, such as napkins, from a source other than Carvel, he must obtain written approval from Carvel which will then enter into a license arrangement with the outside source to have the required name and trademarks printed on the requested items.

A licensee is not required to pay to Carvel any percentage of his gross profits. A licensee may advertise on his own and, even if he does contribute to the national advertising program managed by Carvel, he is not required to participate in the sale of advertised specials.

Carvel has no involvement in the labor relations policies set by the licensee who may hire and fire employees as he sees fit and who may determine salaries, benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment. The license agreement requires only that the licensee undergo a period of training and staff his store with properly trained personnel. Carvel may inform a licensee that an employee has not been trained properly and that it expects that corrective action will be taken. However, that is as far as Carvel could pursue the matter inasmuch as it has not reserved the right to tell a licensee to terminate an employee.

All ice cream products sold at retail by an individual store are manufactured in that store. As noted previously, Carvel does not manufacture any products. Each store owner has been trained to manufacture his own ice cream products using the machinery in his own store. When in need of ice cream mix, a store owner contacts Carvel which transmits an order to the appropriately licensed dairy which in turn makes delivery directly to the store. Packaging and service items, while not manufactured by Carvel, are warehoused by Carvel and delivered to the stores on request. The majority of these items are delivered by Carvel trucks.

B. Contentions of the Parties

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent's threat to picket licensees and its actual picketing of Grossman's store was conduct directed toward secondary persons in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act. According to the General Counsel, an object of the Respondent's conduct was to force or require Grossman and other licensees to cease doing business with Carvel. The General Counsel disputes the Respondent's claim that the licensees are, in effect, allied with Carvel and thus not entitled to the Act's protection of neutral parties. The General Counsel further argues that this case is distinguishable from Tree Fruits.[4] Thus, the General Counsel notes that licensees buy from Carvel the components necessary to make the final product which is sold to the public, and that those components are integrated into that product in such a manner that the consumer cannot boycott Carvel Corporation without boycotting the entire operation of the licensee, thus forcing the licensee out of business.

The Respondent initially contends that Carvel and its licensees are so closely related in an interdependent straight line operation as to negate their status as neutrals in this dispute. In support of this argument, the Respondent urges that the provisions of the license agreement reveal that the integration of operations between Carvel and its licensees is all pervasive. The Respondent claims that its argument is particularly telling where, as here, the sole purpose for the existence of the licensee is to distribute and sell the products of Carvel Corporation. Contrary to the General Counsel, the Respondent argues that Tree Fruits does, in fact, apply to the instant case.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

Section 8(b)(4)(B) of the Act permits a union to exert economic pressure on an employer with which it has a primary labor dispute. At the same time, it prohibits activity aimed at an employer with which a union does not directly have a labor dispute in order to disrupt that employer's relations with the primary employer. Thus, this section of the Act was designed to insulate neutral third parties from labor disputes in which they are not involved. However, the protection of the Act is not afforded to a third party employer which is so closely identified or allied with the primary employer that it ceases to be a neutral to the dispute.

With these considerations in mind, our initial inquiry herein is whether Grossman, the licensee, is a neutral party and thus subject to protection by the Act from secondary picketing. The answer to that question "can be resolved only by considering on a case-by-case basis the factual relationship which the secondary employer bears to the primary employer up against the intent of the Congress as expressed in the Act to protect employers who are 'wholly unconcerned' and not involved in the labor dispute between the primary employer and the union."[5] In resolving this question, the Board traditionally looks to such factors as the degree of common ownership; common control of daily activities, including labor relations policies; the extent of integration of business operations; and the dependence of one employer on the other for a substantial portion of its business.[6] No one of these factors is, in and of itself, sufficient to either confirm or deny the alleged neutral status of a party to a dispute. Rather, all factors must be weighed in order to assess accurately the nature of the parties' relationship. Applying these principles to the facts of the instant case, we find that Grossman and Carvel are neutral parties in their relationship to one another.

Thus, at the outset, there is no common ownership between the parties here; neither party owns stock in the other and there are no interlocking directorates. Neither party shares the other's premises; there is no exchange of employees; and there is no interchange of functions. The store and its contents, save for the two leased items, are owned by the licensee. Additionally, the licensee operates his business on a daily basis with a high degree of autonomy, notwithstanding the provisions of the license agreement. There is no active or actual control by Carvel in the daily management of the licensee's business. In this regard, the licensee makes his own marketing decisions, as he decides which products to sell and at what price. A licensee may advertise on his own in addition to participating in Carvel's national advertising program. Furthermore, the licensee decides where his store is to be located, how it is to be set up, and what hours it will remain open. Moreover, the licensee decides how and with whom his store will be staffed and what the labor relations policies pertaining to that staff will be, all without the involvement of Carvel.

On the other hand, there are certain critical areas in which the licensee is heavily dependent on Carvel. The most obvious is the total reliance on Carvel as the exclusive supplier of the liquid ice cream mix used by a licensee to manufacture the ice cream products sold in his store. There is no other source for this secret mix which is critical to the operation of a licensee's store as a Carvel franchise. In addition, Carvel is the sole supplier of the front gate plate assembly of the ice cream machine. The assembly apparently is not necessary to the operation of the machine, but every licensee has one.[7] Carvel also supplies a sign for the exterior of the store; the store could clearly operate without it, although it is good advertising and the licensee is required to have it.

It is in the area of integration of operations and economic interdependency where the licensee is linked most closely to Carvel. Such mutual interdependence, necessary for the economic survival of both parties, is characteristic of franchise operations. However, the level of economic interdependence and functional integration here does not lead to the conclusion that the licensee has, in fact, lost its neutral status, for there are other factors to consider in assessing the parties' relationship.

[6] Graphic Arts Local 262 (London Press), 208 NLRB 37, 39 (1973).

[7] The franchisee is much more dependent on Carvel than is Carvel on any one franchisee. This factor, among others, persuaded the district court that Grossman was a neutral party in the Respondent's dispute with Carvel. See Bennett v. Teamsters Local 456, fn. 1 above.

Again, we note that there is neither common ownership nor common managerial control. Furthermore, the factor of most significance is control of labor relations policies: Grossman and other licensees operate their businesses almost entirely independent of Carvel, the provisions of the license agreement to the contrary notwithstanding. They are free to hire and fire employees, and set their salaries, benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment without Carvel's approval or interference.

Accordingly and considering all the circumstances, it is our opinion that Grossman is, in fact, just the type of neutral third party which the Act was intended to protect from disputes not her own.

We turn now to a determination of the legality of the Respondent's picketing of this neutral third party. In finding that the Respondent has violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act, we rely on the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Retail Store Employees Local 1001 (Safeco Title Insurance Co.).[8]

Safeco underwrote real estate title insurance through the Land Title Company, which has five local subsidiaries engaged in issuing title insurance policies, the majority of which are underwritten by Safeco. Safeco owned from 12 percent to 53 percent of the outstanding stock in each of the five subsidiaries. An officer of Safeco had always served as an officer and member of the board of directors of each land title company. Local 1001 represented certain Safeco employees. When contract negotiations reached an impasse, the union picketed not only Safeco's office, but also picketed each of the five Land Title Company locations. Picket signs read as follows: "Safeco Nonunion—Does not Employ Members of or have Contract With Retail Store Employees Local 1001."

The issue before the Supreme Court was whether the Act prohibited the above-described picketing where "such picketing predictably encourages consumers to boycott a neutral party's business."[9]

At the outset, the Court reviewed the applicability to Safeco of its Tree Fruits[10] decision. In that case, a union engaged in secondary picketing of a retail store in order to persuade customers of that store not to buy apples from a company with which the union had a primary dispute. The retail store sold numerous other products in addition to apples, the struck product. The Supreme Court determined that it was not the plan of Congress to proscribe all consumer picketing at secondary sites; such picketing would be deemed unlawful when it was used to "persuade the customers of the secondary employer to cease trading with him in order to force him to cease dealing with, or to put pressure upon, the primary employer."[11] It was the opinion of the Court that this reflects the critical distinction between picketing at the secondary site which is directed toward the nonpurchase of only the struck product and picketing at the secondary site which is directed toward requesting the consumer not to trade at all with the secondary employer. In Tree Fruits, the product of the primary employer, apples, was the struck product and was clearly distinguishable from other products sold by the secondary. The Court held, therefore, that the union could, and did, lawfully picket the secondary since it confined its public appeal to the struck product.

In Safeco, the Court went on to note that there was a "critical difference" between the picketing there and that in Tree Fruits. In Tree Fruits, the struck product was but one of many items offered for sale by the supermarket and any successful consumer appeal against that product would result in a decline in sales or in the supermarket dropping the item. The Court was careful to point out that "marginal injury to the neutral retailer [supermarket] is purely incidental to the product boycott."[12]

However, the Court observed that the Tree Fruits situation contrasted starkly with the Safeco facts in that the title companies sell only one product, i.e., the primary employer's product. The result that predictably follows from picketing of the neutral secondary party is described by the Court:

> Secondary picketing against consumption of the primary product leaves responsive consumers no realistic option other than to boycott the title companies altogether. If the appeal succeeds, each company "stops buying the struck product, not because of a falling demand, but in response to pressure designed to inflict injury on [its] business generally." Thus, "the union does more than merely follow the struck product; it creates a separate dispute with the secondary employer." . . .

[8] 447 U.S. 607 (1980).

[9] Id. at 609. The Court expressly noted, at fn. 5 of its decision, that there was no challenge to an underlying finding that the title companies are neutral parties in the dispute. Id. at 611.

[10] 377 U.S. 58.

[12] Safeco, supra at 613.

> Such an expansion of labor discord was one of the evils that Congress intended § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) to prevent. [Citations omitted.][13]

The Court summarized its holding in Safeco by noting that "[a]s long as secondary picketing only discourages consumption of a struck product, incidental injury to the neutral is a natural consequence of an effective primary boycott."[14] However, Local 1001's appeal in Safeco was

> . . . "reasonably calculated to induce customers not to patronize the neutrals at all." The resulting injury to their businesses is distinctly different from the injury that the Court considered in Tree Fruits. Product picketing that reasonably can be expected to threaten neutral parties with ruin or substantial loss simply does not square with the language or the purpose of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). [Citations omitted.][15]

Accordingly, the Court concluded that Local 1001's picketing of the secondary employers in Safeco "violates the statutory ban on the coercion of neutrals"[16] under Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B).

The Supreme Court did not limit its discussion to the facts presented in Safeco. Nonetheless, the Court exhibited its awareness of the extent to which factual situations differ:

> The picketing in Tree Fruits and the picketing in this case [Safeco] are relatively extreme examples of the spectrum of conduct that the Board and the courts will encounter in complaints charging violations of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). If secondary picketing were directed against a product representing a major portion of a neutral's business, but significantly less than that represented by a single dominant product, neither Tree Fruits nor today's decision necessarily would control. The critical question would be whether, by encouraging customers to reject the struck product, the secondary appeal is reasonably likely to threaten the neutral party with ruin or substantial loss. Resolution of the question in each case will be entrusted to the Board's expertise.[17]

In our opinion, the facts of the instant case fall squarely within the Court's discussion in Safeco, for here, as in that case, the neutral secondary has only one significant product for sale, i.e., the primary employer's product, which is Carvel ice cream.[18] The Union's appeal here, as in that case, was directed towards that one product. A successful consumer boycott of that product would inescapably lead to the total collapse of Grossman's business, for she has no goods to sell other than the struck product. Obviously, then, the Union is requesting that the public cease dealing with Grossman, that the public not trade at all with her. To reiterate what the Court stated in Safeco: "Product picketing that reasonably can be expected to threaten neutral parties with ruin . . . simply does not square with the language or the purpose of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B)."[19]

Accordingly, we find that the Union violated the Act by its picketing of Grossman.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth above have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Carvel Corporation is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 456, Teamsters and Chauffeurs Union, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By its picketing at the premises of Barbara Grossman in furtherance of a dispute with Carvel Corporation, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist thereform and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Local 456, Teamsters and Chauffeurs Union, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Elmsford, New York, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from threatening, coercing, or restraining Barbara Grossman, or any other person, where an object thereof is to force or require any of them to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of Carvel Corporation, or to cease doing business with Carvel Corporation.

2. Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its business offices and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[20] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Furnish to the Regional Director copies of the aforementioned notice for posting by Barbara Grossman, if willing, at her picketed ice cream store.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT, by picketing her premises, threaten, coerce, or restrain Barbara Grossman, or any other person, where an object thereof is to force or require any of them to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of Carvel Corporation, or to cease doing business with Carvel Corporation.

LOCAL 456, TEAMSTERS AND CHAUFFEURS UNION, AFFILIATED WITH THE INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF TEAMSTERS, CHAUFFEURS, WAREHOUSEMEN AND HELPERS OF AMERICA

Local Union No. 85, affiliated with the Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL–CIO (Suburban Sheet Metal Co. Inc.) and Lee McFarland, Jr. Case 10–CB–4305

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 13 August 1984 Administrative Law Judge William N. Cates issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Local Union No. 85, affiliated with the Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL–CIO, Atlanta, Georgia, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Insert the following as paragraph 1(a) and reletter the subsequent paragraph.

"(a) Restraining or coercing Suburban Sheet Metal Co., Inc., in the selection and retention of its representative for the purpose of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by preferring charges, fining, suspending from membership, or attempting otherwise to cause the removal of such representative from performing supervisory, executive, or managerial functions for said employer."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We shall modify par. 1(a) of the recommended the order to conform with the standard language used in cases of this sort.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

To all members of Local Union No. 85, affiliated with the Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL–CIO.

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT restrain or coerce Suburban Sheet Metal Co., Inc., in the selection and retention of its representative for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by preferring charges, fining, suspending from membership, or attempting otherwise to cause the removal of such representative from performing supervisory, executive, or managerial functions for said employer.

WE WILL NOT engage in any like or related conduct constituting such restraint and coercion.

WE WILL rescind the fine levied against Lee McFarland Jr., and expunge from our records all references to the charges against him and the imposition of said fine.

WE WILL restore Lee McFarland Jr., upon his tendering regular membership dues, to a member in good standing with all attendant rights as necessary.

WE WILL notify Lee McFarland Jr., in writing, that the fine has been rescinded, that all records of the charge and fine have been expunged, and that he will be restored to a member in good standing with all attendant rights as necessary.

LOCAL UNION NO. 85, AFFILIATED WITH THE SHEET METAL WORKERS INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION, AFL–CIO

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM N. CATES, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on June 5, 1984. The original charge in the instant case was filed on March 23, 1984, by Lee McFarland Jr., an individual (McFarland). Thereafter, on April 18, 1984, McFarland amended the charge he filed against Local Union No. 85, affiliated with the Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL–CIO (Respondent), and a complaint and an amended complaint issued on May 1 and May 8, 1984, respectively, by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) alleging violations of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). In substance, the amended complaint alleges that Respondent, by disciplining McFarland, an alleged supervisor employed by Suburban Sheet Metal Co., Inc. (Suburban) has restrained and coerced and is restraining and coercing Suburban, an employer, in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. Respondent's answer denies the commission of the unfair labor practices.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after due consideration of briefs filed by the General Counsel and counsel for Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER INVOLVED

Suburban, a Georgia corporation, with an office and place of business located at Austell, Georgia, is engaged in the fabrication and installation of sheet metal pipes and duct work. During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint herein, Suburban purchased and received at its Georgia place of business goods valued in excess of $50,000 from suppliers located in the State of Georgia, who in turn purchased the goods and supplies directly from manufacturers outside the State of Georgia. The amended complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Suburban is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent is now, and at all times material herein has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

This case presents certain issues which have been thoroughly litigated. The issues generally summarized are as follows:

1. Whether at all times material herein McFarland was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act and an employer representative within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

2. Whether Respondent restrained and coerced Suburban in the selection of its supervisor and employer representative by requiring McFarland to plead on charges filed against him by an agent of Respondent and by fining McFarland and suspending him from membership in Respondent because he performed supervisory duties for a nonsignatory employer.

3. Whether Respondent's lack of knowledge of McFarland's supervisory status constitutes a lawful defense to its actions.

B. Chronology of Events

The following facts are either established beyond question, admitted, undisputed, or not contradicted. McFarland commenced work for Suburban as a field foreman in approximately mid-July 1983.[1] He worked at various jobsites in Georgia where Suburban was the subcontractor installing sheet metal pipes and duct work. Suburban employs roughly 80 employees. Prior to McFarland's suspension from membership in Respondent, he had been a member of Respondent for approximately 9 years.

On September 14, 1983, McFarland telephoned Respondent regarding the employment situation in the local area.[2] McFarland spoke with Respondent Business Agent Mike Cannon. Cannon asked McFarland if he was making a lot of money for himself and for Suburban. Cannon told McFarland he was in a position to help Respondent and stated, "[T]he [Respondent] was going to try and organize Suburban Sheet Metal again, and . . . asked . . . if [he] could help." McFarland told Cannon he could not help Respondent because he felt an obligation to the president of Suburban. McFarland then asked Cannon if Respondent was going to bring charges against him. Cannon told McFarland he did not know but that Business Representative Hankins had observed him working for Suburban on September 7, 1983.[3]

In a letter dated September 21, 1983, Business Representative Hankins notified McFarland that he was charged with violating certain provisions of the constitution and ritual of Respondent. Hankins' letter to McFarland stated:

> You are hereby charged by the undersigned with violation of the Constitution and Ritual of the Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Article 17, Section 1(b) 1(e) and 1(m) which states as follows:
> Article 17, Section 1(b)
> Refusal or failure to perform any duty or obligation imposed by this Constitution the policies of this Association, the valid decision of any officer or officers thereof or the valid decision of the General Executive Counsel or Convention or the valid rules and regulations of any local union or counsel.
> Article 17, Section 1(e)
> Violating the established union collective bargaining agreements and rules and regulations of [1] McFarland's authority and duties are discussed elsewhere in this decision inasmuch as an issue exists regarding whether he, at material times herein, was a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[2] It appears Respondent had been unsuccessful in obtaining employment for McFarland. It likewise appears that McFarland had ceased working as a field foreman for one area contractor, Metro Sheet Metal, after being told by Respondent Business Representative Ronnie Hankins that he could not work for Metro because Metro was a nonunion contractor and that if he continued to work for the nonunion contractor he would press charges against him.

[3] It is admitted that at all times material herein Cannon and Hankins were agents of Respondent within the meaning of the Act.

any local union relating to rates of pay, rules and working conditions.

Article 17, Section 1(m)

Engaging in any conduct which is detrimental to the best interests of this Association or any subordinate unit thereof or which will bring said unions into disrepute.

I observed you working on the second floor at Perimeter 400 on Wednesday, the 7th of September, 1983. The contractor doing the duct work on this project is Suburban Sheet Metal, a nonsignatory contractor with Sheet Metal Workers International Association and Local 85 [G.C. Exh. 2].

McFarland was notified in writing on or about November 2, 1983, that a trial on the charges against him would be held on December 6, 1983 (G.C. Exh. 3). A trial on the charges was held as scheduled. Respondent trial committee found McFarland guilty and levied a $7500 fine against him. Thereafter, Respondent's membership approved the trial committee's findings, and on December 30, 1983, McFarland was so notified in writing (G.C. Exh. 4). McFarland has never paid the fine levied against him. On or about April 4, 1984, McFarland was notified in writing that he had been suspended from membership in Respondent for nonpayment of dues (G.C. Exh. 5).[4]

Respondent did not at any time notify Suburban of the charges involving McFarland. Respondent never at any time took any action against Suburban in support of its charges or actions against McFarland. There is no collective-bargaining relationship between Respondent and Suburban.

C. McFarland's Supervisory Status

1. The facts

Respondent called no witnesses of its own on the issue of McFarland's supervisory status. All evidence in the record relating to the supervisory status of McFarland is contained in the testimony given by Suburban President James Harris and McFarland. Respondent contends no credence should be given to McFarland's testimony on the supervisory issue because he has a pecuniary interest in whether or not he is found to be a statutory supervisor. Respondent also contends McFarland and Harris gave inconsistent testimony regarding McFarland's authority and duties. While there were some inconsistencies in their testimony, my findings and conclusions on the supervisory issue would be the same if I considered either Harris' or McFarland's testimony standing alone. Therefore, I find it unnecessary to dwell on any inconsistencies that may exist between their testimony regarding McFarland's supervisory authority. I shall, however, consider McFarland's testimony with respect to his authority and duties because I am persuaded his testimony was based on more firsthand knowledge of what his exact authority and duties were than was Harris'.[5]

McFarland stated he was responsible for seeing that the sheet metal work on any particular project that Suburban was working on was installed correctly and in a safe manner. In accomplishing that task McFarland stated he assigned employees to whatever work he felt needed to be done at the time. McFarland stated he served as Suburban's liaison with the general contractor on any project he was on and that he also served as Suburban's liaison with other subcontractors at the various projects he worked on.

McFarland testified he hired employee William Ervin to work for Suburban. McFarland stated he did not consult with anyone in management at Suburban prior to hiring Ervin.[6] McFarland testified he hired Ervin because he was increasing the size of his work crew.

McFarland testified he discharged employees Jerry McDaniels and Herman Dean. McFarland stated he had difficulty with McDaniels because he came to work late and on certain occasions did not show up for work at all. McFarland stated he discussed McDaniels' attendance problems with Superintendent Mallory and Mallory told him to counsel McDaniels and then use his own judgment on whether to fire him or not. According to McFarland, McDaniels' attendance did not improve and he discharged him. McFarland testified he terminated employee Dean because of Dean's inability to perform sheet metal work. McFarland stated he did not speak with anyone in management at Suburban about Dean before he terminated him.

McFarland testified he recommended that employees Kevin Jones and Bill Barnett be given pay raises. Both thereafter were granted wage increases. McFarland testified he granted time off to employees Dennis Barnett and Kevin Jones without consulting with anyone. McFarland testified he performs no hands-on work and that he is paid a higher wage rate than the rank-and-file employees who work with him.

2. Analysis and conclusion

Section 2(11) of the Act reads as follows:

The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

[4] Respondent's constitution and ritual precludes the receipt of membership dues from any member until all fines owed to Respondent by that member are paid in full (R. Exh. 1).

[5] McFarland testified in a straightforward and detailed manner and he responded to questions in a sincere and believable manner without hesitation. I credit McFarland's testimony as it relates to his authority and job duties.

[6] McFarland testified that Superintendent Mallory gave him W-2 forms to keep in his toolbox and told him, "if you hire someone, have them fill out these W-2 forms and notify us as soon as possible."

It is clear from the statute as well as case law that possession of any one of the powers enumerated is sufficient to confer supervisory status. See, e.g., NLRB v. Edward G. Budd Mfg. Co., 169 F.2d 571 at 576 (6th Cir. 1948), cert. denied sub nom. Foremans Assn. v. Edward G. Budd Mfg. Co., 355 U.S. 908 (1949). Also actual existence of supervisory authority rather than its exercise is determinative. See, e.g., Eastern Greyhound Lines v. NLRB, 337 F.2d 84 at 88 (6th Cir. 1964).

In the instant case it is clear from the facts outlined above that McFarland had and exercised a number of the powers set forth in Section 2(11) of the Act. It is not necessary to repeat the facts relating to all the powers exercised by McFarland; however, I specifically note that he had and exercised with independent judgment the authority to hire and discharge employees. Accordingly, I find McFarland was a Section 2(11) supervisor at all times material to the instant case.

D. McFarland's Status as an Employer Representative Within the Purview of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act

It is an established Board principle commonly referred to as the "reservoir doctrine" that all persons who are found to be supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act are also employer representatives within the intent of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. See, e.g., Sheet Metal Workers Local 141 (Glenway Investments), 270 NLRB 1350 (1984), and Teamsters Local 296 (Northwest Publications), 263 NLRB 778, 779 fn. 6 (1982).

In the instant case it is not necessary to rely solely on the reservoir doctrine referred to above inasmuch as the record provides an evidentiary basis for finding McFarland to be an employer representative for the adjustment of grievances. Both McFarland and Harris testified McFarland was authorized to resolve employee disputes or problems.

Accordingly, I find that McFarland, at all times material herein, was a representative of Suburban within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

E. The Alleged Unlawful Restraint and Coercion

In agreement with the General Counsel, I find Respondent restrained and coerced Suburban in the selection and retention of its representative for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.[7] Respondent required McFarland to plead on charges, imposed a fine on him, and suspended his membership in Respondent because he worked as a statutory supervisor for an employer which did not have a contract with Respondent.[8] McFarland only performed customary supervisory duties for Suburban. Therefore, for McFarland to have honored Respondent's request not to work for a nonsignatory contractor he would have had to quit his job with Suburban and in doing so Suburban would have been deprived of the services of its selected representative for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances. It is clear and I find that the actions of Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 73 (Chewelah Contractors), 231 NLRB 809 (1977), enf. denied 621 F.2d 1035 (9th Cir. 1980).[9]

F. The Lack of Knowledge by Respondent of McFarland's Supervisory Status

I have considered and reject Respondent's contention that its lack of knowledge of McFarland's supervisory status serves as a defense to any unfair labor practice finding in the instant case. There is nothing in the language of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act that suggests scienter is an element of that unfair labor practice. Carpenters Wisconsin River Valley Council (Skippy Enterprises), 211 NLRB 222 at 227 (1974). As noted by Administrative Law Judge Leff with Board approval in Carpenters Wisconsin River Valley Council, supra, a respondent's good faith is not involved because the test of restraint and coercion under Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act does not turn on a union's motive but on whether the conduct engaged in reasonably tends to restrain or coerce employers within the meaning of that Section of the Act.

Accordingly, on all of the evidence and for the reasons I have stated, I conclude and find Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act when it required McFarland to plead on charges, fined him $7500, and suspended him from membership in the Respondent.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
2. Suburban is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
3. McFarland is, and has been at all times material herein, a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act selected by Suburban for the purpose, among others, of the adjustment of grievances within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.
4. By requiring McFarland to plead on charges, fining him $7500, and suspending him from membership in Respondent, Respondent restrained and coerced Suburban in the selection and retention of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining and the adjustment of grievances, and thereby has engaged in and is engag-

[7] Sec. 8(b)(1)(B) states: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents to restrain or coerce . . . an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances."

[8] It is recognized that McFarland's membership in Respondent was actually suspended because of a failure to pay dues; however, Respondent would not accept McFarland's dues because he had not paid the fine levied against him. I consider the suspension to be an inseparable part of the action Respondent took against McFarland because he worked as a statutory supervisor for Suburban.

[9] The court of appeals denied enforcement of the Board's order in Chewelah, supra, because there was no evidence the union in that case sought to represent that employer's employees. The instant case is distinguishable in that Respondent, through its agent Cannon, sought to have McFarland assist Respondent in an attempt to organize Suburban's employees. Cannon's comments to McFarland demonstrate Respondent intended to organize Suburban's employees if it could have obtained the assistance of McFarland.

ing in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I have found that Respondent required McFarland to plead on charges, fined him $7500, and suspended him from membership in Respondent. I have found such actions of Respondent to violate the Act. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the fine be rescinded and that McFarland, upon tendering regular membership dues, be restored to a member in good standing in Respondent with all attendant rights, and that Respondent notify him in writing that the above action has been taken. I also recommend that Respondent post the attached notice marked "Appendix."

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The Respondent, Local Union No. 85, affiliated with the Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL-CIO, Atlanta, Georgia, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Restraining and coercing Suburban in the selection of its representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances by charging, fining, suspending from membership, or otherwise disciplining McFarland or any other representative of Suburban when Respondent is engaged in a labor dispute with that Employer.

(b) Engaging in any like or related conduct constituting such restraint or coercion.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Rescind and expunge from its records the fine and membership suspension imposed on McFarland because of his employment by Suburban.

(b) Restore McFarland, on his tendering regular membership dues, to a member in good standing in Respondent with all attendant rights as necessary.

(c) Notify McFarland in writing that the fine has been rescinded, that records of the charges and fine against him have been expunged, and that he will be restored to a member in good standing with all attendant rights as necessary on his tendering regular membership dues.

(d) Post at its business office and meeting hall copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Furnish the Regional Director signed copies of the notice for posting by Suburban, if Suburban is willing, where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 20 May 1982 Administrative Law Judge Earldean V. S. Robbins issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed an exception and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an opposition to the General Counsel's exception.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

1. The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting employee grievances and implying that it would correct them. The Respondent excepts to this finding contending that the statements made by its president Goldman and vice president Homes were merely expressions of their opinions and a reiteration of company policy, both of which are privileged under Section 8(c) of the Act. We find merit in this exception.

The judge found that in a 3 October 1980[3] letter and at employee meetings held 17 October and 24 November Goldman and Homes crossed the line of permissible speech by stating that "[their] door was always open and employees could bargain directly with [them] without going through a third party" and that "[they] would be happy to discuss any matter concerning [the employees'] jobs or anything else the employees cared to discuss at any time." In various meetings this statement drew a response from employee Dorene Gonderman as to why she had not received a raise that was promised her by a former supervisor named Schultes. Homes answered that "she should not have been promised the increase, that he had just become aware of it, that other promises had been made and they were working on it." Also, in these meetings another employee made a suggestion regarding changes to the annual raises. Although Goldman repeatedly told employees that "he was prohibited from promising or granting wage increases outside [the Respondent's] stated policy," the judge found that the Respondent solicited grievances and implied that it would remedy them by asking for comments and by its response to these comments or questions. The judge further found that the Respondent, in response to an employee's question, promised a dental plan by commenting that "it was not easy to set up one and that later on, as there were more employees, they could all get together and join a dental plan but as far as the company being able to handle a dental plan, it could not do that"; that "he hoped in the future there would be one"; and that "he might consider [a dental plan] in the future if the company became profitable."

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), the Supreme Court established that "an employer is free to communicate to his employees any of his general views about unionism or any of his specific views about a particular union, so long as the communications do not contain a 'threat of re-

[1] The General Counsel and the Respondent have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings. Further, we specifically find no merit in the General Counsel's exception to the judge's finding that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act when its supervisor Kathy Smith questioned employee Dorene Gonderman regarding the Union. Concerning this allegation the judge credited Smith's testimony over Gonderman's because she found that Smith's testimony was "honest and reliable" whereas Gonderman's was characterized as vague and confusing. Moreover, we agree with the judge's findings that this incident was isolated and occurred before the inception of the Union's campaign, and we can find no evidence of any further conversations between Smith and Gonderman that could be characterized as interrogation. Contrary to the Respondent's exceptions, however, we also find that in all other respects Gonderman gave credible testimony regarding the Respondent's unlawful behavior.

[2] We adopt the judge's findings that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by providing its employees with free coffee and doughnuts, by discussing its profit-sharing plan, by promoting certain of its employees to full-time status during the preelection period, or by granting wage increases to some of its employees; and that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act by its discharge of employees Funseth, Sterling, Campbell, Schwarz, and Rodrigues. We note that the complaint was withdrawn with regard to Funseth, Sterling, and Campbell.

We also adopt the judge's findings that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with loss of employment if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, by promoting employees to full-time status outside its established criteria in order to induce them to withdraw or withhold their support for the Union, and by granting employees wage increases in order to persuade them to give up their support for the Union.

Chairman Dotson would dismiss the allegation that the Respondent threatened its employees with discharge, finding instead that the Respondent's comments were noncoercive and permissible under Sec. 8(c) of the Act.

Chairman Dotson also finds the evidence insufficient to establish a causal connection between the transfer of employee Murphee and an unlawful motive on the part of the Respondent nor would the Chairman find the subsequent increase in wages to be lawful.

prisal or force or promise of benefit.'" Further, an employer may attempt to influence the outcome of an election by presenting facts and even making predictions based on fact, as long as the employer avoids using its influence to interfere with employee rights of free association.[4] It is also well established that employers are free to hold meetings with their employees in response to a union campaign regardless of whether a past practice existed or not. It is equally well established that a solicitation of grievances is not, per se, a violation. It is only when there is a promise to remedy those grievances that the violation occurs.[5]

Although the Respondent's "door is always open" comments may be viewed as an implied solicitation of grievances, we are persuaded that these comments and the Respondent's subsequent comments do not rise to the level of unlawful conduct anticipated by Gissel, supra, for the following reasons. Unlike the judge, we find it significant that the Respondent repeatedly told its employees during its discussions that "it could not make any promises regarding resolution of their problems." Thus, any possible inference of a promise of benefits was specifically negated by the express "no promise" responses to employees' comments. Uarco Inc., supra. Additionally, the Respondent's specific reply to a question about a raise that the employee "should not have been promised the increase" shows clearly a disavowal by the Respondent of any unauthorized promises. Moreover, the Respondent's comment that "they were working on it," when assessed in the context of the Respondent's overall statement, appears ambiguous and susceptible to meanings other than the discriminatory one ascribed to it by the judge. Further, in considering the Respondent's comments regarding a dental plan, we find that the Respondent was very candid with its employees by stating "it could not handle a dental plan," and that its further explanation that "if it became profitable it would consider it, if it was something everyone wanted" was nothing more than an expression of the Respondent's opinion that it hoped to be in a position at some unspecified time in the future to offer more to its employees in terms of wages and working conditions, a statement which is privileged under Section 8(c) of the Act. See, e.g., Allied Business Systems, 169 NLRB 514, 517 (1968). Furthermore, viewing these statements in the context of the employee meetings, we are not persuaded that they are sufficient to support or reinforce any employee's anticipation of improved conditions of employment which would warrant withdrawal of support from the Union.[6] Moreover, there is no evidence in the record tending to establish any coercion in fact from these comments. Accordingly, we shall dismiss these allegations of the complaint.[7]

2. The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by urging employees to revoke their authorization cards. The Respondent excepts to this finding contending that its conduct in this regard was not violative of the Act. We find merit in this exception.

In a letter dated 17 October and during a meeting with employees on that same date, the Respondent's president Goldman explained the procedures to employees of how they could have their authorization cards returned to them. The judge found that Goldman's remarks violated Section 8(a)(1) because they were made gratuitously as the Respondent had begun the preparation of the letter before any employee had inquired about the revocation procedures. Acknowledging that providing information to employees regarding revocation of their authorization cards is not, per se, a violation, the judge nevertheless found a violation based on her finding that the Respondent gave its advice in a coercive and threatening atmosphere. We disagree. An employer may lawfully inform employees of their right to revoke their authorization cards even if employees have not solicited such information, as long as the employer makes no attempt to ascertain whether employees will avail themselves of this right nor offers any assistance or otherwise creates a situation in which employees would tend to feel peril in refraining from such revocation. R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575 (1982). Here, the Respondent did not attempt to monitor whether employees would actually revoke their authorization cards and there is no evidence that the Respondent requested or gave assistance to any employee. This is unlike the cases relied on by the [7] Member Zimmerman dissents from the dismissal of these allegations. He agrees with the judge that the Respondent unlawfully solicited grievances from employees by implicitly promising to correct them and unlawfully promised to consider establishing a dental plan. Contrary to his colleagues, he finds that the Respondent's mere recitation of the stock "no promises" phrase did not negate these implied promises. Under similar circumstances, the Board in Raley's, Inc., 236 NLRB 971, 972 (1978), stated:

> [T]he structure of such preelection meetings provides a "compelling inference" that the employer by its conduct at such meetings impliedly promises that the grievances raised would be corrected. Were we to conclude that Respondent, by merely reciting a "no promises" formula, had clearly discharged its duty to avoid giving the employees the impression that their complaints would be remedied, we would be forced to conclude that the parties at these meetings were engaged in a largely meaningless exchange concerning the employees' grievances and complaints.

Further, he notes that the disputed statements were made in a context not free of union animus, inasmuch as it has been found that the Respondent at the same meeting unlawfully threatened employees with the loss of employment if they voted for the Union.

judge, for in Kut Rate Kid & Shop Kwik, 246 NLRB 106 (1979), the respondent specifically requested revocation letters from its employees and threatened them with plant closure. See also L'Eggs Products, 236 NLRB 354 (1978), in which the respondent interrogated and threatened its employees and requested that employees revoke their authorization cards. Furthermore, it is undisputed that the Respondent, in the employee meetings discussed supra, assured its employees that it was their right to support a union and that it would not discriminate against anyone who wanted "to vote for or talk up a union and if the union won [the Respondent] would bargain with the Union." From the neutral tone of the Respondent's letter, we are persuaded that no employee could have reasonably felt any peril in refraining from revoking his card, nor do we find any evidence that any employee was threatened, coerced, or prompted into revoking his card. Under these circumstances, we do not find that the Respondent's conduct constituted unlawful encouragement or solicitation of employees to revoke their authorization cards. Accordingly, we shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint.[8]

3. The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by its refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union based on the Union's card majority and recommended a bargaining order to remedy the Respondent's unfair labor practices. The Respondent contends, inter alia, that there was no showing that its unfair labor practices interfered with employee free choice in the election held 26 November 1980, nor would they preclude the possibility of a fair rerun election. We find merit in the Respondent's latter position.

The essential justification for a bargaining order in this type of case, as stated by the Supreme Court in Gissel, supra, depends on findings (1) that the union once had a majority status, (2) that such status had been dissipated by pervasive misconduct on the part of the employer, (3) "that the possibility of erasing the effects of [these] past [pervasive] practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight," and (4) "that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order."[9]

The judge, in her recommendation of a bargaining order, based her conclusion on her assessment that the acts of the Respondent "were pervasive and egregious" unfair labor practices which had "undermined the Union's majority and rendered doubtful or impossible the holding of a free and fair second election." However, the judge also found that the alleged discharges were not violative of the Act and based her findings of "pervasiveness" solely on 8(a)(1) conduct. We have herein reversed two of the judge's 8(a)(1) findings—that the Respondent unlawfully solicited grievances and implied that they would be remedied and that the Respondent unlawfully induced revocation of employees' union authorization cards. This leaves five incidents of 8(a)(1) conduct involving two threats of loss of employment and three incidents of granting wage increases, one of which involves transferring an employee to full-time status. These are hardly the kinds of "hallmark" violations, such as discharges, threats of plant closure, or reprisals, contemplated by the Court in Gissel, supra, nor is this the type of case marked by substantial employer misconduct which has a "tendency to undermine [the Union's] majority strength and impede the election processes." 395 U.S. at 614. We find that these 8(a)(1) violations do not provide an adequate basis for a bargaining order in the absence of any credible finding that there is any "likelihood" that the Respondent's misconduct will recur or that the residual impact of these practices is sufficient to make the likelihood of a fair election slim, if not impossible, despite the salutary effect of a cease-and-desist order.[10] We are not unmindful that the Respondent's conduct was directed at a small unit of employees and that its threats of loss of employment were disseminated to all of its employees in various meetings. Although the 8(a)(1) violations did interfere with the employees' free choice, they did not, in our opinion, have a permanent impact on employee voting sentiments. Moreover, any initial impact will have dissipated prior to the next election, especially since our cease-and-desist order and the posting of the Order finding the Respondent guilty of unfair labor practices will provide added protection against the likelihood of the recurrence of misconduct.[11] Therefore, we also find that the Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(5) by its refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union.[12] Accord-

[8] Member Zimmerman would adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent unlawfully induced employees to revoke their authorization cards when it proffered unsolicited advice about the procedures for revoking their cards and passed out written instructions to that effect. He notes that the Respondent committed other unfair labor practices at the same meeting in which the advice was given. Kut Rate Kid & Shop Kwik, supra at 119; and L'Eggs Products, supra at 389.

[12] The judge, in finding that employees Steiner and Vaught should be excluded from the unit found appropriate herein, analyzed their status from the criteria applicable to students. CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The following unit is appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

All regular part-time and full-time production and maintenance employees of the Respondent at its Concord, California facility, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. By threatening employees with loss of employment if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative and by transferring an employee to full-time status with the accompanying benefits and wage increase and granting certain other employees wage increases in order to induce them to withdraw or withhold their support from the Union, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has not engaged in the other unfair labor practices alleged in the amended consolidated complaint.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, we shall order the Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Mariposa Press, Concord, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees with loss of employment if they select Western Graphic Arts Union, No. 14, International Printing and Graphic Communication Union, AFL–CIO as their collective-bargaining representative.

(b) Granting employees wage increases and transferring employees to full-time status with the accompanying grant of benefits and wage increases in order to induce them to withdraw or withhold their support from the above-named Union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facility in Concord, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by ience, and they receive a special oncall pay rate which is different from the pay received by the Respondent's other regular part-time and full-time employees. Moreover, there is no evidence in the record showing that Steiner and Vaught have any reasonable expectation of continued employment with the Respondent. Accordingly, we find that these factors are sufficient to sever any community of interest they may have had with the Respondent's regular part-time employees. Maietta Contracting, 251 NLRB 177 (1980); Muncie Newspapers, 246 NLRB 1088 (1979); Quick-Lahmann Express, 262 NLRB 220 (1982). In sustaining the Union's Objection VII alleging that the Respondent made material misrepresentations regarding wage rates secured by the Union for employees at other companies, the judge analyzed the evidence under the principles of Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 NLRB 221 (1962), and General Knit of California, 239 NLRB 619 (1978). However, since the issuance of her decision, the Board has established a new standard regarding misrepresentations. In Midland Life Insurance Co., 263 NLRB 127 (1982), a Board majority stated that misrepresentations made during an election campaign are not grounds for setting aside an election. Therefore, in light of Midland Life we have reviewed the alleged misrepresentation and find that it is not objectionable. The judge, in her discussion of this objection, inadvertently referred to it as Objection VIII rather than Objection VII. We have made the corrections where it is appropriate.

In view of their denial of a bargaining order, Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter find it unnecessary to pass on the issue of the validity of certain union authorization cards and the Respondent's exceptions thereto. They also deny the Respondent's motion to reopen the record for the same reasons.

Member Zimmerman would find the authorization cards signed by employees Lowe, Thorsen, David Gonderman, and Foltz to be valid, inasmuch as the record does not support the Respondent's contention that the Union misrepresented the purpose of the cards or stated that they were solely to get an election.

Because they have found that the Respondent did not solicit grievances or imply that it would remedy them or induce employees to revoke their union authorization cards in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1), Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter overrule the Union's Objections III and V which allege the same conduct.

[13] Member Zimmerman agrees with Member Hunter that the Respondent's alleged objectionable conduct which parallels the unfair labor practices that the Respondent was found to have committed warrants the direction of a second election. Member Zimmerman, however, dissents from the majority's failure to issue a bargaining order. He agrees with the judge that the Respondent's unfair labor practices were sufficiently widespread and serious to warrant a bargaining order. He notes that threats of loss of employment, solicitation of grievances, granting of raises, and inducing of employees to revoke their authorization cards are likely to have a lasting inhibitive effect on a substantial percentage of the small work force, and therefore are considered "hallmark" violations which support the issuance of a bargaining order, unless some significant mitigating circumstances exist. See Patsy Bee, Inc., 249 NLRB 976 (1980). No such circumstances exist here. Although the Respondent has apparently experienced substantial employee turnover, he finds that such turnover would not warrant withholding a bargaining order. Jamaica Towing, 247 NLRB 353 (1980), and Glomac Plastics, 241 NLRB 348 (1979). Accordingly, he would deny the Respondent's motion to reopen the record on this issue. Finally, having validated, above, the authorization cards of employees Lowe, Thorsen, David Gonderman, and Foltz, Member Zimmerman concludes that the Union achieved majority status on 1 October 1980.

Although Chairman Dotson agrees with Member Hunter that a bargaining order is not appropriate, he would not direct a second election because he would have dismissed the complaint. Therefore, he would certify the results of the election.

[14] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that all allegations of the complaint not sustained are dismissed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election held 26 November 1980 is set aside, the petition in Case 32–RC–1175 is reinstated, and this case is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 32 for the purpose of conducting a new election.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT do anything that interferes with these rights. More specifically,I11WE WILL NOT threaten employees with loss of employment if they select Western Graphic Arts Union, No. 14, International Printing and Graphic Communications Union, AFL–CIO as their collective-bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT grant employees wage increases and transfer employees to full-time status with the accompanying grant of benefits and wage increases in order to induce them to withdraw or withhold their support for the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

MARIPOSA PRESS

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EARLDEAN V. S. ROBBINS, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard before me in Oakland, California, on June 16–24, 1981. The charge in Case 32–CA–3135 was filed by Western Graphic Arts Union, No. 14, International Printing and Graphic Communications Union, AFL–CIO (the Union) and served on Mariposa Press (Respondent), on October 16, 1980; and a first amended charge therein was filed by the Union and served on Respondent on November 19, 1980. A complaint issued in that matter on December 3, 1980, alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act. The charge in Case 32–CA–3262 was filed by the Union on December 11, 1980, and served on Respondent on December 15, 1980; and a first amended charge therein was filed by the Union and served on Respondent on January 14, 1981. The amended consolidated complaint in Case 32–CA–3135 and 32–CA–3262 issued on January 16, 1981, alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

The petition in Case 32–RC–1175 was filed by the Union on October 6, 1980. Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election approved on November 5, 1980, an election by secret ballot was conducted on November 26, 1980, which resulted in 7 ballots for and 13 ballots against the Petitioner, with 7 challenged ballots, which are sufficient in number to affect the results of the election. On December 2, 1980, the Petitioner filed timely objections to the election, certain of which were later withdrawn. On January 21, 1981, the Regional Director determined that the objections to the election and the challenged ballots in Case 32–RC–1175 and the matters alleged as unfair labor practices in Case 32–CA–3135 and 32–CA–3262 constitute a single overall controversy and ordered that Case 32–RC–1175 be consolidated with Cases 32–CA–3135 and 32–CA–3262 for purposes of hearing, ruling, and recommended decision.

The basic issues are:

1. Whether Respondent unlawfully discharged Robert Sterling, Clifford Funseth, Gary Campbell, Allen Schwarz, and Ed Rodrigues.

2. Whether Respondent unlawfully induced employees to revoke authorization cards designating the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

3. Whether Respondent promised and/or granted employees wage increases and/or other benefits in order to discourage them from joining or supporting the Union and/or designating the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

4. Whether Respondent unlawfully solicited grievances from employees regarding their working conditions.

5. Whether Respondent interrogated employees regarding their union activities and/or threatened employees with loss employment if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

6. Whether Becky Stein and Karrie Vaught are casual employees, as the Petitioner contends, or regular part-time employees, as the Employer contends.

7. Whether Respondent has engaged in conduct which interferes with the exercise of a free and untrammeled choice of the employees in the election held on November 26, 1980.

8. Whether a bargaining order is appropriate herein.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material herein Respondent, a California corporation with an office and place of business in Concord, California, has been engaged in the nonretail business of printing books and other materials. During the calendar year 1980, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, sold and shipped goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the Union is now, and at all times material herein has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Union's Organizational Campaign

Allen Schwarz and Robert Sterling were hired by Respondent on September 10, 1980.[1] Shortly thereafter, they began discussing the possibility of obtaining union representation for Respondent's employees. Schwarz contacted the Union and obtained union authorization cards to be distributed to Respondent's employees. Sterling and Schwarz signed cards authorizing the Union as their collective-bargaining representative on September 19. By the end of September a number of Respondent's employees had signed authorization cards for the Union. On September 25, by mailgram, union organizer James Ziolkowski notified Respondent that Schwarz, Sterling, and Clifford Funseth were on the employees volunteer organizing committee for the Union.

On October 6, the Union filed a petition in Case 32–RC-1175 seeking to represent all regular part-time and full-time production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its Concord, California location, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act. On that same day, by certified mail, the Union notified Respondent that a majority of the employees in said unit had designated the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, and demanded recognition as such. This letter was received by Respondent on October 7.

B. Respondent's Election Campaign

On October 3 Respondent distributed a letter to employees signed by Respondent President Earl M. Goldman. The letter acknowledged that Respondent had heard that a union was requesting them to sign union authorization cards. The letter further explains the purpose of authorization cards and the various ways in which one can be used by a union. The letter then states that "we feel that we can talk over whatever problems you might have directly with us, and that you have no need for a third party to represent you. My door is always open to you and I will be most happy to discuss any matter concerning your job, or anything else you care to discuss at any time."

1. The October 17 meetings

Respondent held two meetings of employees during its preelection campaign—on October 17 and November 24. Each meeting was held in two sessions, with Goldman as the principal speaker. It is undisputed that the meetings were held for the purpose of apprising the employees of Respondent's position in opposition to union representation. Thus Goldman admits that he said that Respondent would prefer remaining nonunion and would like for the employees to vote no in the election. He further said that he did not feel there was a need to have a union because they were a small company, management was there every day and they knew most of the employees on a first-name basis, there was good communication and there really was no reason for a third party to be interjected between management and the employees. He said he felt strongly that, in a company of Respondent's size, with its general attitude and benefits, there was just no need for a third party between the employees and management; they had always been able to communicate in the past and should be able to continue to do so in the future without putting someone between them, that his door had always been open. However, according to Goldman, he also said that, as far as the Company was concerned, they believed in democracy and in the event an election was held and the Union won, Respondent would recognize the Union and bargain with them in a fair manner. He further said that Respondent would not discriminate against anyone who wanted to vote for or advocate a union, that they would be treated no differently from anyone who voted against the Union.

Homes testified in essential agreement with Goldman. Employee Edward Rodrigues testified that Goldman said he would bargain with the Union and the other employee witnesses do not deny that Goldman said Respondent would recognize and bargain with the Union if the Union won the election. Employee Dorene Gonderman admits that Goldman said something to the effect that it was all right with him if the employees wanted a union. She further testified that he said they should be able to work without a union, that his door was always open and they were welcome to bring up any suggestions that they might have. Homes testified that, in response to Goldman's statement, his door was always open and employees could bargain directly with Respondent without going through a third party. Gonderman said she had been trying to get a raise for some time. Employee Annie Llamas testified that either Goldman or Homes said that Respondent would provide a suggestion box if the employees wanted one. Rodrigues also testified that Goldman said there was no suggestion box, but he would provide one. Holmes denies that Goldman made any mention of a suggestion box, however Goldman does not deny it.

It is undisputed that Goldman mentioned union authorization cards. However, the witnesses are in disagreement as to whether he discussed the revocation of these cards. Dorene Gonderman testified that Goldman said several people had received authorization cards. He then proceeded to tell them the procedure that could be used to have the authorization cards revoked. She does not recall any employee asking for such information. Employee Isaac Camp testified that Goldman said if the employees wanted to rescind their union authorization cards there was a mechanism that they could use. He explained what the procedure was, but Camp does not recall exactly what he said in this regard. No employee at the meeting had inquired as to what they should do in order to rescind their authorization cards. Rodrigues testified that Goldman further said that he encouraged the employees to withdraw their cards, that there were procedures for doing this and, if they were unfamiliar with the procedures, he would explain them so that their rights could be protected. Rodrigues does not recall him elaborating on that.

Homes testified that Goldman said an authorization card was not just to get an election, that it authorized the Union to become the collective-bargaining agent of the person who signed the card. He also explained that, in the event there was an NLRB hearing, an employee's authorization card could possibly be disclosed to them. As Goldman was discussing authorization cards, he was referring to a brochure from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. An employee, whose name Homes does not recall, asked whether it was possible to revoke an authorization card. Goldman said that he did not know, but that he would find out. Homes denied that Goldman said he thought employees should, or hoped they would, revoke the authorization cards.

Goldman testified that he said the union had been passing out authorization cards, he explained what the authorization cards were and said, contrary to what they might have heard, the cards were not simply a means to have an election in which they could vote no; that they should understand that, in reality, the cards authorize the Union to become their bargaining agent. Goldman further testified that, when he mentioned authorization cards, one of the employees gave the impression that, now he understood it, he should not have signed the card and asked if it would be possible to rescind it. Goldman said he did not know but he would find out. The employee said he thought signing an authorization card would cause an election to take place and that he could vote no at the election, much like signing a petition for a state constitutional amendment. He said he did not realize he was authorizing the Union to represent him for collective bargaining. Goldman denies that he told the employees they should revoke their cards, or that he wished they would. Goldman testified that he thinks it was Michael Foltz who asked whether he could revoke his union authorization card, but he is not absolutely sure.

The consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent made an implied promise to implement a profit-sharing plan and a dental plan if employees voted against the Union. In support thereof, Gonderman testified that at the October 17 meeting Goldman briefly mentioned a profit-sharing plan. He said all full-time employees were part of the plan, but Respondent had not had a profitable year yet, so they had not received a share. According to Gonderman, this was the first time she had heard anything about being a part of a profit-sharing plan.

Gonderman further testified that someone asked why Respondent did not have a dental plan. Goldman explained that it was not that easy to set up one and that later on, as there were more employees, they could all get together and join a dental plan, but as far as the Company being able to handle a dental plan, it could not do that. Rodrigues testified that Goldman mentioned profit sharing at both the meetings. At the October 17 meeting he discussed the profit-sharing plan, but Rodrigues does not recall exactly what was said as to who would participate in the plan. Goldman also said something to the effect that the profit-sharing plan would not work unless the Company made a profit. Rodrigues further testified that Goldman said there was a health plan, he regretted there was no dental plan, and hoped in the future there would be one. This is the first time Rodrigues had heard a dental plan mentioned.

Neither Camp nor Llamas included in their account of this meeting any mention of a dental plan. However, Camp testified that Goldman mentioned profit sharing. He does not recall whether Goldman said that the Company already had a profit-sharing plan. Goldman did not say that if, within the next year or so, Respondent started showing a profit, the employees could get involved in profit sharing. According to Camp, he had never been told previously that he was part of a profit-sharing plan. He does not recall whether Goldman said the profit-sharing plan was already in effect as to full-time employees. Llamas testified that Goldman said Respondent had a good profit-sharing plan.

Homes testified that Goldman explained the benefits that were available for full-time employees. He said Respondent had a good medical plan with a $100 deductible which had been waived. He covered the life insurance, long-term disability, vacation, holiday, and paid holiday benefits. He said Respondent had a profit-sharing plan and that, in 1 year, up to 15 percent of a person's annual wages can be contributed to that plan. However, he also said, to have a profit-sharing plan, Respondent had to be profitable. The question as to the dental plan came up at the afternoon meeting. Someone asked why Respondent had no dental plan. Goldman said that would be something, along with other benefits, he might consider in the future if the Company became profitable.

According to Goldman, someone asked about the benefits offered by Respondent. Goldman then went over the various benefits including the medical insurance with no deductible, long-term disability insurance, group life insurance, profit-sharing plan, paid vacation, sick leave, and lunchroom facility. He explained these in as much detail as he thought the employees were interested. One of the employees asked why there was no dental plan. Goldman replied because they had all those other benefits which he thought was a good package. Someone asked if they would have a dental plan in the future. Goldman said that it was entirely possible, that it was something Respondent could consider in the future if Respondent became profitable and it was something everyone wanted. It is undisputed that during the meeting Goldman also stated that he could not make any promises. According to Goldman and Homes, he repeated this several times.

As to the allegation that, at the October 17 meeting, Respondent threatened employees with loss of employment if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, Gonderman testified that Goldman said all the contracts, that he had looked over, required a ratio of so many journeymen to so many apprentices. He said, since the employees were all fairly new at what they were doing, they would be considered apprentices and there would not be sufficient journeymen to cover them, and therefore some of them might have to be laid off to make way for journeymen. According to Gonderman, he mentioned this also at the second meeting.

According to Camp, Goldman gave a comparison as to what it would be like if a union was in the shop compared to the way it was at that time. Goldman said that if the Union got in, more than likely, Respondent would have to lay off employees because they would have to pay a journeyman over at the other end of the shop union wages which would probably take away from the less skilled workers. Goldman referred to other situations where the Union was involved and said that, in order to have a certain ratio of journeymen to apprentices, Respondent would have to hire more journeymen and, as a result, some employees would have to be discharged.

Employee Annie Llamas testified that she attended both the October 17 and the November 24 meetings but, as to the statements she recollects, she is unable to distinguish which were made at each meeting. At one of the meetings, Goldman had charts setting forth wage rates. He said, based on contracts that he had seen, they would have to have a certain number of journeymen working there so Respondent would have to get rid of some of the pressmen. According to Llamas, she does not recall very much about the first meeting. The main thing that stands out in her mind is that one of the employees asked whether she could return to her job if the Union got in and she did not want to join the Union. McCain spoke up and said that he had been in the Union before when he worked for a different employer, that there was no open shop in California and she would not be able to work there, she would have to join the Union or leave. Goldman said that McCain was right, there was no open shop in California and she would no longer be able to work there unless she joined the Union.

Homes testified that someone asked whether everyone would have to be member of the Union if the union was voted in. Goldman started to say that he did not know, but he was interrupted by McCain. McCain said that in his union experience, as far as he knew, there were no open shop in California, that everyone would have to be a member of the Union. Goldman said that he did not know because he did not have any experience with the Union.

According to Homes, Goldman further said that one had to be a journeyman to receive journeyman rates and, according to the copies of Local 14 contracts that Respondent had acquired, employees who are trainees or apprentices receive a percentage of the journeyman wages. He also mentioned that there was a ratio of three journeymen to every one apprentice or trainee. Goldman said, although it would be subject to bargaining with the Union, if that kind of ratio was important, Respondent would not be able to have as many trainees as it currently had. Goldman said that he could not promise anything, that the wage rates would be part of the bargaining issue with the Union, and the rates posted on the bulletin board would not be necessarily relevant to anything.[2] He said there was no guarantee that they would receive that rate or anything like it, that it appeared to be a journeyman's rate and a trainee would receive only a percentage of that. Homes denies that anything was said to the effect that, if the Union won the election, people would have to be laid off. Goldman did say he was not in favor of a union, and he felt Respondent paid competitive wages for the area. On cross-examination, Homes denied that the ratio between journeyman and apprentice was discussed at the October 17 meeting.

Homes also testified that soft drinks and coffee were available free at one of the afternoon meetings. Doughnuts were available free at the morning sessions on October 17 and November 24. Coffee was available at all sessions of the meetings because coffee is available free to employees at all times.

The only reference to journeymen and trainees contained in Goldman's account of the meeting was his statement that Respondent had a great many trainees and it was a good opportunity for people to work their way up to become journeymen. Goldman denies he said anything to the effect that employees would lose their jobs if the Union won the election. Employees Trina Stupp and Sonja Vaught asked whether employees would be required to join the Union if the Union won the election. Goldman testified that he responded that to his knowledge they would have to belong to the Union, that there would probably be a closed shop, that the union contracts he had seen had that provision in them. McCain said, from his experience, closed shops were the rule in [2] Someone other than Respondent had posted on the bulletin board a list of job classifications and wage rates which appeared on its face to have been taken from a collective-bargaining agreement.

California and you had to be in the Union if you were working there.

Goldman also mentioned wage increases. Thus the text of his prepared speech, which he read, states that although Respondent is prohibited from promising or granting wage increases outside its stated policy to review employees and consider merit and cost-of-living wage increases on an annual basis at the end of each calendar year, "We would welcome the opportunity to personally discuss your wage rate and current wage range with you. To arrange such a meeting contact your immediate Foreman/Supervisor."

2. Respondent's campaign letters

On October 17 Respondent distributed a letter to employees, both by mail and with their paychecks. The letter stated, inter alia:

> We have heard that some of you who signed the Union authorization cards would now like to withdraw those cards, but don't know how to go about it. If you want to withdraw, you should send a letter addressed jointly to the union and the National Labor Relations Board, telling them you wish to withdraw.

Respondent's letter then sets forth a sample statement which the employees could copy and send to the Union and the Board agent handling the representation case herein, stating that the employee hereby withdrew and revoked the authorization card previously signed for the Union and no longer wanted the Union to represent the employee. The letter then advised the employees to telephone the Board agent, to tell her that the card had been revoked. The letter also states:

> If either the union or the Board agent tells you that you can't withdraw, if the Board agent tries to talk you out of it, please tell me immediately so we can take steps to protect your rights. You have the legal right to sign a card if you want, but you also have the same right to withdraw. Don't let anyone tell you different.

Homes testified that the October 17 letter was prepared in response to the question asked at one of the meetings that day and a question asked of McCain by employee Mike Foltz. McCain testified that within 10 to 15 minutes after the conclusion of the morning session of the October 17 meeting,[3] Foltz approached him and said he did not know what the authorization card was and asked if there was any way he could get out of it. Foltz further said that he thought he should revoke the card. McCain said that he did not know, he would ask. According to McCain, about 15 or 20 minutes later, he went to Homes and told him that one of the binder employees wanted to know if there was any way they could revoke an authorization card. Homes said that he would check on it. McCain then returned to Foltz and told him that the front office was checking to see what, if anything, had to be done.

[3] The meeting was scheduled for 8 a.m.

Homes testified that McCain told him that Foltz had just asked how he could revoke his union authorization card. McCain then asked, "Have we done anything on that yet?" Homes said no, but they were working on it and would let McCain know as soon as they found out anything. Homes testified that following the meeting, and prior to speaking with McCain, he sought the advice of Respondent's counsel. Respondent's counsel drafted the letter. Homes had it prepared and it was distributed to the employees by mail that evening and placed in their paychecks the next payday. The parties stipulated that the letter was included with the paychecks which were distributed to employees on October 17.

Employee Ken Thorsen did attempt to revoke his authorization card. In accordance with the instructions contained in the October 17 letter, he sent a letter to the union representative and the Board agent on October 20, the body of which reads:

> After much thought and consideration I withdraw and revoke my previously signed card for Local 14 to represent me at Mariposa Press. I do no longer want to have any union represent me in any manner.

According to Thorsen, he never requested from any supervisor or management official at Respondent any information regarding the procedure for revoking his union authorization card.

In addition to the October 17 letter, Respondent distributed campaign letters to the employees on November 14, 19, and 20. The November 14 letter informed the employees of the time and place of the election and urged them to vote. It further stated that Respondent strongly opposed the Union and outlined the collective-bargaining procedure, explaining that the Union's promises would not automatically become reality if the Union won the election. The November 19 letter was devoted to the expenses concomitant to the union representation and membership. The November 20 letter reiterated that wages do not automatically increase when a union comes in. Attached to the letter was a schedule of wage rates, which the letter described as a sheet "containing wage rates apparently used in a contract that Local 14 had with an unnamed printing company" which was posted on the bulletin board by "someone apparently connected with the union." The letter refers to the sheet as an indication that one cannot rely on any promise by the Union that they will gain wage increases. The letter further states that, in one Local 14 contract, untrained employees began at a wage rate 55 percent of the contract rate and did not obtain the full contract wage rate until after 4 years of employment and training. The letter then proceeds to apply that graduated percentage scale to the contract rates posted on the bulletin board and concludes that Respondent's employees make more money than they would under the union rates posted on the bulletin board. Also attached to each individual letter was a specific comparison of the individual employee's present wage rate to the one Respondent contends the employee would earn under such a graduated scale.

3. The October 24 meetings

On October 24 Respondent had another meeting of employees. On this date Goldman and Homes had two sessions of the meeting and also met with the press crew alone. Goldman and Homes testified that Goldman read a prepared speech; however, they do not dispute that some additional comments were made. Employee Wayne Lowe testified that, at the press crew meeting, Goldman asked for suggestions. Employee Dave Gonderman testifies that he does not recall who brought up the topic of suggestions, but that certain suggestions were made. According to Lowe, he suggested changing to a quarterly review, even if it did not necessarily include a wage increase. Gonderman testified that someone suggested a change in the policy of reviews. Apparently, this is a reference to quarterly reviews. According to Gonderman, neither Goldman nor Homes promised to adopt this suggestion. Rather, they said it would be something they would look into after the election was over, that it was a good suggestion, but they could not say one way or the other. Gonderman also testified that, at the beginning of the meeting, Homes and/or Goldman said that they could not promise anything or give raises or anything like that because of the election.

Goldman admits that this was the first formal meeting he had had with the press crew. According to him, he had a separate meeting with them on that day because they wanted to talk to each group separately to make it as informal as possible and to be sure that everyone had a chance to communicate. Homes testified that they met with the press crew separately because they had a heavy press schedule and it would have been nonproductive to interrupt the running of the press for the meeting, so they decided to meet with the press crew prior to the beginning of their shift. Goldman testified that he read his prepared speech verbatim at the press crew meeting. He further testified that at his meeting with the press crew, when he outlined the various benefits, he covered the profit-sharing plan. According to him, he said Respondent had had a profit-sharing plan since the inception of the Company and that although Respondent had never made contributions to the profit-sharing plan because it was in the startup phase and had not yet become profitable, Respondent's other affiliated companies in previous years had made such contributions. He also stated that it was Respondent's intention in profitable years to contribute to the profit-sharing plan and that contributions could run as high as 15 percent of the payroll. Homes testified that Goldman asked for comments and, in response, there was some general discussion regarding productivity on the press, work quality, and minimizing paper waste. He corroborates that Wayne Lowe suggested quarterly reviews rather than the annual wage and performance reviews. According to him, Goldman responded that this was something he would consider but he could not promise anything.

As to the other meetings on November 24, it is undisputed that Goldman used charts to illustrate that the union wage rate which had been posted on the bulletin board was less than Respondent's wage rate if one applied the graduated percentage scale for apprentices and trainees to the contractual wage rates. As a further illustration, according to employee Barbara Murphee, Goldman said that Dave Gonderman had worked for Respondent for about a year but he would not automatically become a journeyman, he would not automatically get journeyman wages and, if Respondent had to pay him journeyman wages, they would just get a journeyman to do the job. Murphee said she had just received the Respondent's November 20 letter which stated that she would be making only $2.94 an hour and asked how could that be true inasmuch as it was below minimum wage. Homes said, in her case it was different and indicated that it was obvious that she would not be making less than minimum wage.

Dorene Gonderman testified that Homes explained wage increases were based on annual reviews, which would start again in January. Gonderman said other employees would be getting raises in October. Homes said those raises were scheduled, that trainees get scheduled wage increases and people who become full time get wage increases. Gonderman asked why some employees were receiving increases and others who had been promised increases were not. She said when she started on a machine she had been promised a wage increase and a review 3 months later but had never received it. Homes said she should not have been promised the increase, that he had just become aware of it, that other promises had been made and they were working on it. It is undisputed that Goldman again mentioned the ratio of journeymen to apprentices required by union contracts. Murphee testified that someone asked about profit sharing and Goldman said they did have plans for profit sharing, something similar to what Earl Goldman Insurance had, but not at this time.[4]

Homes testified that the statements as to a dental plan were in the November 24 meeting, rather than the October 17 meeting. He also testified that the subject of profit sharing came up at the November 24 meeting. According to him, when Goldman was itemizing various benefits he made a statement that Respondent did not have a profit-sharing plan or that Respondent had not been making a profit, that such opportunity certainly existed down the road, but at this point in time there could be no profit-sharing contribution because Respondent was not making a profit. He recalls that Dorene Gonderman made the comment that the wage rates quoted to employees were below minimum wage. According to him, he responded that it was not meant to imply that anyone would be paid wages below minimum but, rather, it was meant to illustrate what happens if one was to take a trainee and training rates and apply the percentage on the bulletin board. He said it was not meant to be a representation of fact, but an exercise in illustrating the percentage rates paid under the two union contracts available to Respondent.

As to the journeyman-apprentice ratio, Homes testified that Goldman said that the union contracts available to Respondent called for a ratio of three journeymen to one apprentice and, if that clause became part of the contract between Respondent and the Union, Respondent would not be able to have as many trainees as they currently had. Goldman further said, according to Homes, that Respondent had recently found posted on the bulletin board a wage schedule which appeared to be from a Local 14 contract. He said those appeared to be journeyman rates, there was no guarantee that if a union won an election and Respondent bargained with the union that the employees would receive these rates or any other posted rates, that this would be an item that would have to be negotiated. He also discussed the minimum number of years it takes to become a journeyman and the percentage of journeyman pay one would receive based on the amount of time one had been working, using charts to illustrate these points.

Murphee testified that something was mentioned at the meeting regarding a suggestion box. However, Homes denied that, at either of the meetings, Goldman asked employees for complaints or suggestions or made any promises regarding a dental plan. He also denies that Goldman referred to Dave Gonderman at either meeting.

Goldman testified that in his speech he said the contracts they had seen had ratios between trainees and apprentices and journeymen and that the ratio was usually three journeymen for each apprentice or trainee. He further said it would be difficult to know what would happen if the Union won and there was a contract, that Respondent might not be able to have as many trainees and apprentices. However, the text of the speech sets for the recommendation ratio of 3-to-1, and then states:

> Once again this issue would be subject to negotiations. However, the contracts we have seen, if applied to Mariposa Press, would severely limit our ability to offer training programs.

As to any discussion aside from his prepared speech, Goldman testified that he more or less responded when someone said something or asked a question. He recalled some discussion about the journeyman rates and testified that his tendency was to go back to his prepared speech in making any response. McCain pointed out that trainees did not make journeyman wages, that they started at a lower wage and worked their way up over a period of years from trainee to apprentice to journeyman. McCain also said that it had been his experience with unions that there was a ratio of journeymen to apprentices and trainees, that it was normally 3-to-1; in the event Respondent had a union contract, Respondent might not be able to have as many trainees. Goldman further testified that he reiterated he was unable to make any promises and would not make them, that Respondent felt it was the employees' right to have a union if they wanted one and that Respondent would recognize and bargain with the Union if the Union won the election. McCain also said it took several years to become a journeyman, that Respondent did not really have any journeymen and very few of the employees could hold a job as a journeyman. Goldman testified that he does not recall making any reference to Dave Gonderman. He also denies making any promise to remedy employee complaints or grievances.

4. Conclusions

a. Credibility

A number of the alleged violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act involve the October 17 and November 24 meetings. Much of the testimony as to these meetings is uncontradicted. However, other testimony is in dispute, mainly that adduced by the General Counsel in support of the complaint. Goldman and Homes testified that Goldman read a prepared speech at the November 24 meeting. I credit this testimony which is corroborated by some of the employee witnesses. However, it is undisputed that Goldman also made additional statements. The testimony of the employee witnesses, while not as detailed as that of Goldman and Homes, tended to be mutually corroborative in some critical aspects and was given without written texts to refresh recollection. On the other hand, both Goldman and Homes had prepared for their testimony by referring to the prepared text and outline of Goldman's speech. Nevertheless, their testimony was contradictory in some respects and appeared in some regards to be slanted in a manner favorable to Respondent's position.

Homes testified that Goldman read a prepared speech at each meeting. Yet when confronted with the "text" of the October 17 meeting, which was not a speech but a list of points to cover, Goldman admitted that he could not have read the document verbatim as a speech. Homes testified that when someone asked if everyone would have to be a member of the Union, Goldman said he did not know because he did not have any experience with the Union. Goldman testified that he said to his knowledge they would have to belong to the Union, that there would probably be a closed shop, that the union contracts he had seen had such a provision. Homes testified that they met with the press crew separately because of a heavy press schedule. Goldman testified they had a separate meeting with the press crew because they wanted to speak to each group separately for informality and to facilitate communication. Both Goldman and Homes deny that Goldman mentioned suggestion boxes. Yet more than one employee witness testified that Goldman mentioned a suggestion box.

Also, Homes testified that Goldman never mentioned Dave Gonderman. Goldman testified only that he does not recall making any reference to Dave Gonderman. Yet Murphee testified that Goldman mentioned Gonderman, who is her nephew, as an illustration of an employee who would be replaced with a journeyman. On direct examination, Homes testified that on October 17 Goldman made statements regarding a ratio of journeymen to apprentices. On cross-examination, he denied that the ratio between journeymen to apprentices was discussed at that meeting. Goldman testified that, during the October 17 meeting, his discussion of the various benefits was in response to a question asked by someone as to what benefits were offered by Respondent. Yet the outline of his speech, which he claims he followed faithfully at the beginning of each session, states, "Explain to employees all the benefits they presently enjoy." Homes and Goldman both testified that, during the October 17 meeting, the issue of the revocation of authorization cards was initiated by an employee inquiry as to the procedure for revoking an authorization card. However, I note that Homes could not recall the identity of the employee who allegedly made an inquiry in his presence. Yet he does not recall the identity of the employees who spoke to McCain. Goldman also testified that he cannot recall the identity of this employee. He thinks however that it was Foltz. Neither McCain nor Smith was questioned in this regard. I find it incredible that Goldman and Homes, who Goldman claimed were on a first name basis with the employees, would consider this inquiry important enough to furnish all employees with the requested information and yet not recall the employee who made the inquiry.

I also note that McCain testified that Foltz told him he did not understand the significance of the card and asked if there was any way he could get out of it. According to McCain, he told Homes one of the binder employees wanted to know if there was any way he could revoke an authorization card. Homes said he would check on it. Homes also testified that McCain told him about the inquiry. However, his testimony differs from McCain as to what was said after McCain relayed the substance of the inquiry. Homes' account is very neatly phrased to buttress his version of what occurred at the meeting. Thus Homes testified that McCain asked, "Have we done anything on that yet," to which he replied that they were working on it.

On the other hand, Gonderman and Camp both testified that, during the October 17 meeting, Goldman told them the procedure to follow to revoke their authorization cards and that no employee at the meeting requested such information. Rodrigues does not recall Goldman actually explaining the procedure, but testified that Goldman said there were such procedures which he would explain to them if they were unfamiliar with the procedures.

In all the circumstances, including a consideration of the contradictions set forth above, in light of the totality of the testimonial and documentary evidence and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I find that, as to their testimony regarding the meetings, Homes and Goldman were not reliable witnesses and I do not credit them to the extent that their testimony is contradicted by that of Murphee, Gonderman, Camp, and Rodrigues, whom I credit in this regard.

b. The free coffee and doughnuts

The complaint alleges that Respondent provided the employees with free coffee and doughnuts at the October 17 meeting in order to discourage them from supporting the Union and/or designating the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. Murphee and Goldman testified that coffee and doughtnuts were provided during the morning meeting. Llamas testified that soft drinks were provided during the meeting she attended. Goldman testified, without contradiction, that Respondent regularly provides employees with free coffee, tea, and hot chocolate and that it subsidizes a lunchroom which serves sandwiches and a light lunch at a cost to employees of about 50 percent of the prevailing rate in the area. In these circumstances, I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by providing free beverages and doughnuts to employees.

c. The implied promise of a profit-sharing plan

The complaint also alleges that Respondent made an implied promise to implement a profit-sharing plan for employees if the employees voted against the Union. However, the evidence establishes that Respondent's employees are covered under the same plan which has been in effect for several years for companies affiliated with Respondent. Goldman simply informed employees that such a plan was one of the employee benefits, that no contributions had ever been made under the plan for Respondent's employees and would not be made until Respondent showed a profit. Accordingly, I find that Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by Goldman's statements regarding the profit-sharing plan.

d. The solicitation of grievances and the implied promise of a dental plan

The complaint alleges that Respondent solicited grievances from employees concerning their working conditions and made an implied promise to implement a dental plan for employees if they voted against the Union. It is well established that an employer's solicitation of grievances at preelection meetings carries with it an inference that the employer is implicitly promising to correct the inequities it discovers as a result of its inquiries. It is equally as well established that it is the implied promise to correct grievances, rather than the solicitation, that constitutes unlawful interference with employee rights and that the solicitation of grievances merely raises an inference that the employer is making such a promise, which inference is rebuttable by the employer. Uarco Inc., 216 NLRB 1 (1974); Merle Lindsey Chevrolet, 231 NLRB 478 (1977).

Here Respondent contends that it did not solicit grievances. I disagree. Thus Goldman stated in his October 3 letter that employees could discuss directly with Respondent any problems they might have without any need for a third party to represent them, that his door was always open to employees and he would be happy to discuss any matter concerning their jobs or anything else the employees cared to discuss at any time. He reiterated this idea of dealing directly with employees and maintaining an open-door policy at the October 17 meeting and continued to proffer the idea of direct dealings at the November 24 meeting.

Homes admits that Goldman asked for comments at his meeting with the press crew. I find that in the context of a speech where Goldman was comparing Respondent's wage program with that which could be expected under a collective-bargaining agreement and was listing the benefits offered by Respondent to employees, a solicitation of comments would reasonably be assumed by employees to be a solicitation of their views regarding their wages and working conditions. The employees certainly took it as such since they proceeded to make certain suggestions, including one with regard to changing from an annual review to a quarterly one. Also, in response to Goldman's statements with regard to his open-door policy, Dorene Gonderman complained that she had been attempting unsucessfully to secure a wage increase and she continued to complain in this regard at the November 24 meeting. At this time, while stating that she should not have been promised the wage increase, Goldman said he had become aware that this and other promises had been made and they were working on it. Further in his prepared speech, he stated that, even though Respondent was prohibited from promising or granting wage increases outside its stated policy, they would welcome the opportunity to personally discuss with each employee his wage rate and current wage range. The employees were invited to contact their immediate supervisors to arrange such a meeting. Additionally, Goldman said he would provide a suggestion box.

I further find that Respondent has failed to rebut the inference of an implied promise to correct the inequities it discovered as a a result of its inquiries. In this regard, I note that the record does not reflect that Respondent has previously announced an open-door policy or encouraged its employees to discuss their problems with its president. Further, this invitation was extended during speeches and in letters which were clearly in response to the Union's organizational campaign and part of Respondent's campaign to persuade its employees to deal directly with it and to reject union representation. In these circumstances, the mere recitation of a "no promises" formula does not negate the implied promise. Raley's, Inc., 236 NLRB 971 (1978). Accordingly, I find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting grievances from employees and by implicitly promising to correct any inequities found, including a promise to consider establishing a dental plan in the future. Uarco Inc., supra; Merle Lindsey Chevrolet, supra; Cutting, Inc., 255 NLRB 534 (1981); Permanent Label Corp., 248 NLRB 118, 130 (1980); Raley's, Inc., supra.

e. The threat of loss of employment

According to the credited testimony, in his October 17 speech,[5] Goldman said that the union contracts he had seen required a ratio of so many journeymen to apprentices, that most of Respondent's employees would be considered apprentices or trainees, and in order to maintain the required ratio Respondent would have to lay off some of the employees and hire journeymen. In one of the November 24 sessions, he specifically mentioned employee David Gonderman and said if Respondent had to pay him journeyman wages, they would just get a journeyman to do the job. I find this to be a threat of loss of employment if the employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. Accordingly, I find that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Delco-Remy Division, 234 NLRB 995 (1978); Durango Boot, 247 NLRB 361, 364 (1980).

The General Counsel also argues that Respondent unlawfully threatened its employees during one of the sessions of the October 17 meetings by Goldman's and McCain's statements that there was no "open shop" in California and, if the Union won the election, employees would have to join the Union or leave Respondent's employ. This was in the context of a speech where Goldman had pointed out the "disadvantages of union membership such as the obligation to abide by union rules, punishable union offenses, fines and assessments." He thereby conveyed an erroneous impression that the mere selection of the Union as their bargaining representative would inevitably result in either the financial and other obligations of union membership or loss of employment. I find this to be a threat of loss of employment which is violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

f. The inducement of employees to revoke union authorization cards

The complaint alleges that Respondent induced employees to revoke the authorization cards they had signed designating the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. Respondent did, in fact, provide employees with information as to a procedure for revoking the cards. Respondent contends that it merely did so in response to an inquiry from an employee as to the procedure for revoking his authorization card. However, the evidence does not support this contention. No employee inquired regarding the revocation of authorization cards prior to Goldman's statements at the October 17 meeting and Homes admits that he had commenced the process of preparing the October 17 letter prior to McCain informing him of Foltz' inquiry. Thus, the idea of the revocation of union authorization cards was, in fact, initiated by Respondent.

Where employees in a noncoercive atmosphere request their employer to advise or assist them in revoking union authorization cards, an employer may lawfully do so if the employee has the opportunity to continue or halt the revocation process without the interference or knowledge of the employer. KDI Precision Products, 176 NLRB 135 (1969); Payless Drugstore of Port Angeles, 210 NLRB 134, 136 (1974); Jimmy-Richard Co., 210 NLRB 802 (1974); Aircraft Hydro-Forming, Inc., 221 NLRB 581, 583 (1975). Further, advising employees that they can revoke union authorization cards and furnishing information as to the procedure for doing so is not a per se violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, even though such advice may not have been requested by any employee. Aircraft Hydro-Forming, Inc., 221 NLRB 581, 582 (1975). However, such conduct has been found coercive where the employer has also attempted to elicit information as to whether employees availed themselves of this advice. Hatteras Yachts, AMF, 207 NLRB 1043 fn. 3 (1973); where unrequested advice has been accompanied by employer assistance in the actual mechanics of the revocation, Deutsch Co., 180 NLRB 8, 20 (1969), and where the advice was given in the context of other unfair labor practices, Kut Rate Kid & Shop Kwik, 246 NLRB 106,

[5] Respondent argues that the testimony of Gonderman and Camp is not reliable as to their placing the discussion on journeyman-apprentice ratio during the October 17 meeting. I find no merit in this argument. Camp testified that he attended a meeting but does not recall whether it was in October or November. However, he also testified that revocation of authorization cards was discussed at this meeting and it is undisputed that revocation of authorization cards was mentioned at the October 17 meeting, not at the November 24 meeting. Moreover, Homes initially testified that these ratio were discussed at the October 17 meeting.

119 (1979); L'Eggs Products Inc., 236 NLRB 354, 389 (1978).

Here Respondent proferred its unsolicited advice which was later elaborated on in the October 17 letter in the same meeting where it threatened its employees with loss of employment if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative and implicitly promised that, if they rejected union representation, and dealt directly with Respondent, it would correct any inequities. In these circumstances, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by inducing employees to revoke their authorization cards.

5. The alleged unlawful interrogation

Dorene Gonderman testified that she and Supervisor Kathy Smith had been personal friends for about 4 years and that, at one time during this period, they were next door neighbors. According to Gonderman, she had approximately 10 conversations with Smith concerning the union during the months of September, October, and November. They were casual conversations and never very long. Most of the conversations were indistinguishable as to what was said in which conversation. However, she does recall that, in October during a break, Smith asked her how the union drive was going, if she had heard whether supervisors would be allowed to vote, and if there were very many people at work involved. Gonderman replied that things were going fine and she did not think supervisors could vote because they have the authority to hire and fire. She also told her when the next meeting was scheduled but did not tell her who was involved with the Union. Gonderman also testified that, sometime in October, Smith asked her who was involved in the Union. It is unclear whether she was referring to another conversation or whether she was changing her testimony as to this conversation. After being shown her prehearing affidavit which states that her first conversation with Smith about the Union was around the beginning of July, and denied that this first conversation was in reference to the organizing campaign of a previous union. According to her, this other union was organizing in June; however, the parties stipulated that the organizing campaign of the Union at Mariposa Press began during the first week of September and that, if Ziolkowski was called to testify that to the best of his knowledge, prior to September, there was no contact made directly between the Union and Dorene Gonderman.

Smith testified that during the summer, around June, when the other union was organizing she asked Gonderman if she could be included in the union activity. Gonderman said no, because Smith could hire and fire. Thereafter, during the summer, Homes told Smith she was not allowed to ask any employees about union matters and, if employees asked her questions, she could answer them and could express her own opinion but she was not to ask employees anything. Following that discussion with Homes, according to Smith, she did not ask Gonderman any further questions. However, she did eat lunch with Gonderman frequently, as did other employees, and union matters were discussed in her presence. Smith denies that during any of these discussions she ever asked Gonderman if she had gone to a union meeting.

Respondent attacks Gonderman's credibility on the basis of her confusion as to the time the Union's organizational campaign commenced. Unquestionably, her testimony was completely unreliable in that regard and I credit Smith, whom I found to be an honest and reliable witness who was endeavoring to tell the truth, that this conversation occurred around June. I also credit Smith that she did not ask who was involved in the Union nor when any union meeting would be held. Gonderman admits that her recollection is vague as to any conversation which occurred after the initial one. I credit Smith that, following this June conversation, Homes told her she was not to question employees and she did not do so. In this regard, I note that, even though Smith admits that the Union was frequently discussed in her presence and does not deny that she participated in these discussions, there is no other evidence that Smith interrogated employees. In the circumstances, including the absence of any evidence as to any other unfair labor practices around June or at any time prior to October, and the absence of any evidence of other incidents of interrogation during Respondent's rather active campaign against the Union, I find that Smith's asking Gonderman, in June, whether many employees were involved was an isolated instance of interrogation which did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

C. Granting of Benefits

1. The transfers to full-time status

All of Respondent's unit employees are classified as either full time or part-time. It is undisputed that part time employees sometimes work a 40-hour week and that full-time employees work less than a 40-hour week if no work is available. A part-time employee does not become full-time simply by regularly working a 40-hour workweek over a period of time. Rather, some affirmative action has to be taken by Respondent to transfer an employee from part-time to full-time. The principal difference between part-time and full-time employees is the benefits they receive. Full-time employees receive a full complement of benefits, including medical and life insurance, paid holidays, and paid vacations. On the other hand, part-time employees receive, in lieu of all other benefits, one paid vacation day every 110 regular hours worked. During October five employees were transferred from part-time to full-time status. They were Mel Pacheco, Wayne Lowe, Ron Murphee, Gary Marin, and Annie Llamas.

Homes testified that employees are transferred from part-time to full-time status as the work load demands. With the possible exception of the press crew there are no guidelines by which a supervisor can determine when an employee is to be transferred to full-time. Further, all such decisions are made by Homes. However, after a part-time employee continues to work 40-hour weeks over a period of time, the supervisor will normally recommend that the person be transferred to full-time status. Then, assuming that the workload demands are favorable, Homes will consider, as to an individual employee, facts such as seniority, skills or aptitude for the particular job, training, and background.

In 1980, prior to the union organizational campaign, five employees were transferred to full-time status. They were Kirsten Carpenter and Sonja Vaught in April; Catrina Stupp and Dorene Gonderman in May; and Jennifer Rossi on September 1. Carpenter and Gonderman worked in the bindery, Vaught in the warehouse, and Stupp and Rossi in the press department. Of the five employees who were transferred to full-time in October, Pacheco worked in the warehouse, Lowe in the press department, and Marin, Murphee, and Llamas worked in the bindery. Homes testified that the transfers to full-time status in 1980 reflected an increase in Respondent's business which stemmed from a change in its operations. According to Homes, Respondent was initially engaged as a warehouse and shipping operation of Nitty Gritty Productions, one of Respondent's affiliated companies. A warehouse was opened in Concord in September 1977. At that point, Respondent's sole customer was Nitty Gritty and its work complement was one full-time warehouse and shipping supervisor and four to five part-time employees who were on-call. In early 1978, Respondent commenced the construction of a new facility with the intention of expanding Respondent's operation into printing and binding. When Respondent moved into that facility in May 1979 and commenced its printing and binding operation, it was still working exclusively for Nitty Gritty as the delays occasioned by the move into the new facility had resulted in a tremendous backlog of printing and binding work for Nitty Gritty. At that point in time, Respondent had about five or six full-time employees and about six part-time employees.

In January Respondent began to aggressively seek outside commercial printing and binding work. Its success in this regard was somewhat erratic. During the summer there was a significant decrease in its bindery and warehouse operations and July and August were particularly dissatrous for the bindery. There was a dramatic increase in the printing operation in September and October and there were also substantial increases in the bindery department and in the warehouse. Respondent's records indicate that its income by departments for 1980 was as follows:

	BINDERY	PRINTING	WAREHOUSE
Jan.	-------	--------	---------
Feb.	$34,455	$60.326	$14,592
March	39,248	71,935	18,113
April	21,600	66,347	17,896
May	19,127	67,012	13,059
June	14,905	56,881	9,304
July	8,442	68,135	9,680
Aug.	5,901	60,636	9,828
Sept.	17,650	106,355	13,838
Oct.	37,323	127,543	16,518
Nov.	28,151	74,249	20,298
Dec.	37,036	94,156	10,814

Pacheco was hired on July 7 primarily as a driver in the warehouse department and was promoted to full-time status on October 2 at the end of his 90-day probationary period. According to Homes, at the time Pacheco was hired he was told that when Respondent's business increased to the point where a majority of his time was spent driving he would be transferred to full time status. By the end of his probationary period he was spending 80 percent of his time driving a truck making deliveries and pickups. The remainder of his time was spent working in the warehouse.

Lowe was hired as a part-time employee in the warehouse on July 2. On July 29 he was transferred to the press department and began training as a "jogger." By the end of his 90-day probationary period he was working a 40-hour week. At that time, on October 2, he was transferred to full-time status. Homes testified that in the normal course of business the press is run full time and that it is necessary for someone to occupy each position on the press at all times. Thus the four press crew positions—first and second pressmen, feeder, and jogger—are all full time positions. Accordingly, Lowe was transferred to full-time status at the completion of his probationary period.

Murphee was hired in October 1979 to work in the warehouse. He also worked sometimes in the bindery. In July he began training as an operator on the Perfect binder. The Perfect binder, the primary machine used in Respondent's bindery operation, is a large machine which requires several persons to man it in addition to an operator who is responsible for the overall operation of the machine. McCain was the principal operator of the Perfect binder; however, according to him, he needed to have another operator available to relieve him to perform other duties. Since Murphee had been satisfactorily training for that position and was the only employee besides McCain who could operate the Perfect binder, according to Homes, he was transferred to full-time status. At the time, Murphee was attending school and was working only about 32 hours a week.

Homes testified that in October, on receiving a payroll change notice from McCain recommending Murphee for a wage increase, he called McCain in to discuss the matter. He queried McCain as to his immediate and short-term need for a bindery trainee and asked if someone on a part-time basis was really what McCain needed or did he feel at this point that he needed a full-time employee in that position to relieve him to carry out his other duties. McCain said he had been in a hurry, that he wanted to get his paperwork done and had not really thought it through, and that he had meant to indicate on the payroll change notice that Murphee should be full-time with benefits. McCain also said that Murphee was available to work up to 32 hours per week. McCain further said he understood that Murphee had decided to leave school at the end of the year and would be available to work a full-time schedule.[6]

[6] Prior to this, according to McCain, Murphee had been working 20 to 30 hours on a regular basis. According to Murphee, in November he was working 30–32 hours a week.

McCain testified that Murphee had been training on the binder and was performing satisfactorily but was not working sufficient hours to permit McCain to perform his other responsibilities properly. Therefore, according to McCain, the work load actually caused him to recommend that Murphee be transferred to full-time status. McCain admits, however, that after Murphee was given full-time status his hours continued to vary through the end of the year from 22 to 36 hours. It was sometime around the first of the year that he began working 40 hours a week on a regular basis. According to McCain, when he transferred Murphee to full-time status, he spoke to him regarding the number of hours he wanted him to work. He asked if Murphee could put in 40 hours. Murphee said he was still going to school. McCain asked how many hours could he work. Murphee said he did not know and McCain said the more hours Murphee worked the better it would be for McCain insofar as relieving him for his other duties. McCain admits he had no subsequent conversations with Murphee concerning the number of hours he was working.

Murphee denies that McCain told him he was going to be transferred to full-time status. He admits he knew Respondent's policy was that an employee received the full complement of benefits upon being transferred to full-time status. However, according to him, he did not tell McCain that he was going to be quitting school the first of the year nor did anyone tell him to begin working 40 hours a week. Rather, he just began to show up at 8 a.m. and ever since has worked a full-time schedule.

Llamas was hired on September 27, 1979, as a part-time bindery worker. Marin was hired on March 11 as a part-time worker in the warehouse and was later transferred to the bindery. In August, both Marin and Llamas commenced training on the saddle stitcher machine. In late August or September, Respondent started operating the sadle stitcher on a two-shift basis. Kirsten Carpenter, a full-time employee, and Marin were assigned to operate the machine on the day shift; and Dorene Gonderman, a full-time employee, and Llamas were assigned to operate the machine on the night shift. Marin was transferred to full-time status on October 15 and Llamas was transferred to full-time on October 17. McCain testified that these transfers were made because of the increase in work load, because Marin and Llamas had been performing satisfactorily on the saddle stitcher and because of their seniority.[7] With a few exceptions, Llamas has regularly worked a 40-hour week since at least the time she began working on the saddle stitcher.[8] When McCain asked her to work nights on the saddle stitcher, he told her she would get a night wage differential and that he would try to get her a raise. He further said that all of the employees working on the saddle stitcher would be transferred to full-time status.

[7] According to Homes, Marin was more proficient on the saddle stitcher than Llamas.

[8] Llamas signed a union authorization card on September 10. According to her, she began working on the saddle stitcher about a month earlier.

2. The wage increases

Respondent granted wage increases to the 14 employees during the period between the commencement of the Union's organizational campaign and the election—10 in October and 4 in November. Homes, who has to approve all wage increases, testified that all these wage increases were granted in accordance with Respondent's normal practice. According to him, wage increases are granted as merit increases on the recommendation of the supervisor, to accompany a promotion, as a length of service increase which might be after 80 hours of employment, or at the conclusion of the probationary period, and as a result of their annual wage review which occurs in January.[9] Five of the wage increases involved here accompanied the promotions to full-time status discussed above. It is undisputed that it is Respondent's practice to grant a wage increase to employees when they are transferred to full-time status, and the timing of four of these five increases is consistent with this practice. However, Lowe was transferred to full-time status on October 7 but did not receive the increase in his paycheck until November 21.[10]

Lowe testified that after he began working as a jogger he asked Kerry Orton, the first pressman,[11] if his transfer to the press entailed a wage increase. Orton said Lowe was still "sort of on a temporary basis." Lowe further testified that he also should have been issued a uniform but had to wait about a month for the uniform. For 2 or 3 weeks after he began working on the press, he asked Orton about his uniforms and his pay increase and Orton said, "We'll wait and see how you work out." However, the parties stipulated that Lowe received a $1 wage increase on July 29, and Lowe testified that he began working as a jogger around the end of July. Lowe's November 21 paycheck reflected a wage increase retroactive to October 2. When Lowe received the check it was considerably more than he expected so he asked Orton to check to see if there was a mistake. The following week, according to Lowe, Orton told him that about a month after he had been transferred to the press he had been granted a wage increase, but it had not been logged into the computer so the money he received on his November 21 check was his wage increase retroactive to the date it had been granted.

Homes testified that he approved Orton's recommendation that Lowe be transferred to full-time status and given a wage increase. However, inadvertently the information did not get placed into the computer. Around mid-November, Orton told him Lowe had complained that he had never received the wage increase promised him by Orton. Homes researched the matter and, after he discovered the error, instructed the payroll clerk to rectify the problem. Homes then explained to Lowe what had happened and, according to him, told Lowe that his next paycheck would reflect the raise retroactive to October 2.

[9] In 1980, this increase was delayed until April.

[10] Respondent's payroll system involved a 1-week time lag between payroll period and paycheck.

[11] Orton is an admitted supervisor.

Orton testified that Lowe was not transferred to full-time status at the time he began working on the press because he had no prior experience on a web press and Orton wanted to be sure that he could perform satisfactorily before making him full time. He further testified that, at the time he asked Lowe to work as a jogger, they had no discussion about a wage increase. However, according to him, they did have such a discussion in October when he told Lowe that he was satisfied with his work performance and was going to speak to Homes about granting him a wage increase. He then recommended to Homes that Lowe be given an increase. Homes agreed, so Orton told Lowe he had the raise. On the following payday Lowe asked Orton why his wage increase was not reflected on his paycheck. Orton said he would look into it. He then spoke to the payroll clerk who said she would take care of it. When Lowe received the check which contained the retroactive pay, according to Orton, he asked Orton what the extra pay was for and Orton reminded him that it was backpay because he had not received his pay increase at the proper time. Orton also testified that he does not believe he had any conversation with Homes about Lowe not receiving his wage increase. However, he admits he does not remember how he learned that the problem had been caused because the increase had not been placed in the computer. He thinks that the payroll clerk mentioned it to him.

Of the remaining nine wage increases involved herein, Respondent contends seven were given in accordance with its general wage policy for new hires. Respondent's rules and procedures for employees, dated April 1, 1980, provide:

> COMPENSATION
> As a general rule, all employees will receive a compensation/performance review annually. Additional reviews may be conducted during the year.

Certain additions to and clarification of procedures and rules are contained in a memo from Homes to the plant manager dated April 14, 1980. This memo provides:

> NEW HIRES-FULL OR PART TIME
> New hires and wage rates other than replacements for part time employees must be approved by the office in advance. The following wage policy will apply to part time new hires.
> NEW HIRES—PART TIME PAY POLICY
> Until further notice new hires—part time will be paid at the maximum rate of $3.50 per hour. After 2 weeks or 80 hours worked, increase to $3.75 (or 25¢ an hour), after review. After an additional 2 weeks, or 80 hours, review with increase of 25¢ an hour to a maximum of $4.00. At 6 months performance review increase 25¢ an hour. Maximum wage for part time employees is $4.25 per hour.

Homes admits this is merely a guideline and that the increase is actually at the discretion of the supervisor. Generally the supervisors review such increases with Homes. Homes also admits that a review and wage increase does not necessarily have to be timed after 2 weeks, 4 weeks, and 6 months of employment. Rather, Respondent's policy is very flexible in an attempt to try to motivate, attract, maintain, and compensate good part-time people. In accordance with this policy Barbara Murphee, Issac Camp, Michael Flotz, Derrex Nash, Andy Navarro, Sherrill Orr, and Debbie Shipherd all received 25 cent raises at intervals ranging from 2-1/2 weeks to 1 month after their hire.

The other two wage increases, given to Kathy Seybolt and Edward Rodrigues, do not fit into any specific guideline for granting wage increases. Rather, according to Respondent, they are covered by the statement in the rules and procedures which states "additional reviews may be conducted during the year." Seybolt was given a 25-cent-an-hour increase on her first year anniversary date, October 17. Homes admits there is no written policy that an employee must be reviewed after 1 year of employment. However, according to him, Seybolt is a part-time employee who does not desire to work full time. At the time she was one of only two part-time employees who had worked for Respondent for as long as 1 year. The other was Llamas who was promoted to full-time. Seybolt's last raise had been in April.

Rodrigues' wage increase was the only one not based on length of service and merit. The increase was granted 2 months short of the time for a possible 6 months increase for new hires, and both Homes and Smith, his supervisor, contend that they had problems with him as to his job performance. However, they also contend, he had been requesting a wage increase and he was granted one in the hope that it would serve as an incentive to increase the quality of his work performance.

3. Conclusion

It is settled that increases and benefits to induce employees to vote against the union is violative of the Act for, as stated by the Supreme Court:

> The danger inherent in well-timed increases in benefits is the suggestion of a fist inside the velvet glove. Employees are not likely to miss the inference that the source of benefits now conferred is also the source from which future benefits must flow and which may dry up if it is not obliged. [NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409 (1964).]

The crucial question, of course, is motivation, because granting employee benefits during a union organizational campaign is not a per se violation of the Act. However, in determining whether a grant of benefits which coincides with a union organizational and election campaign is unlawful, absent an affirmative showing by the employer of some legitimate business reason for such timing, the Board will draw an inference of improper motivation and interference with employee rights under the Act. Litton Dental Products, 221 NLRB 700, 701 (1975); Somerset Shirt & Pajama Co., 232 NLRB 1103, 1111 (1977); see also Essex International, Inc., 216 NLRB 575 (1975).

As to the transfers to full-time status, the General Counsel argues that the circumstances under which each of these employees was made full time were suspicious and inadequately explained. On the other hand, Respondent argues that these transfers to full-time status were for legitimate business reasons and within Respondent's flexible policy and practice on such matters. Respondent has no definite objective policy guidelines as to when an employee will be transferred. However, I find that Respondent has met its burden as to Pacheco and Lowe.

Homes testified without contradiction that Pacheco was told at the time of his hire that he would be made full time as soon as the workload for a driver increased to the point where it constituted a majority of his work. When he was transferred to full-time status at the end of his 90-day probationary period, he was driving 80 percent of the time. Lowe was hired on July 2. On July 29, he began training as a jogger on the press. Homes and Orton testified, without contradiction, that all press positions are full-time positions since the press runs full time and the four positions must be occupied at all times. Lowe was made full time at the end of his probationary period.

A determination as to the motivation for the transfer of the three bindery workers to full time status is somewhat more involved. Whether they are transferred to full time seems to depend, at least partially, upon a determination as to whether the work load justifies such a transfer. The principal evidence as to general workload came from Respondent's summary of its 1980 income by departments. The increase in the income of the bindery department in October does not appear to corroborate Respondent's contention that there was an increase in work load in that department in October. However, there is no specific showing of any factors which would indicate that, in early October, Respondent had reason to believe this would be a sustained increase. The income of the bindery department had been comparable in February and March but steadily declined for several months thereafter. Yet during this decline, two bindery employees were transferred to full-time status—Kirsten Carpenter on April 1 and Dorene Gonderman on May 19. In all the circumstances, I find that overall department income does not, by itself, establish the sort of increase in workload which would cause Respondent to transfer employees to full-time status. Rather, it appears to be only generally corroborative of other evidence as to increased work load.

Respondent contends that Marin and Llamas were transferred to full-time status essentially because they were assigned to operate the newly acquired saddle stitcher machine. It is undisputed that, for at least several months commencing in the first week of September, the work load for that machine was sufficient to require operating it on a double shift. Llamas testified that during the latter part of August when she was assigned to begin training on the saddle sticher, McCain told her that everyone assigned to the saddle stitcher would become full time with benefits. In response to her request for a wage increase, he said he would try to get her an increase. However, when questioned as to why Marin and Llamas were not immediately transferred, McCain testified that he was not sure whether there would be sufficient work to keep the machine busy and that it took 3 weeks to a month to make that determination.

In the circumstances, I conclude that a delay of 3 or 4 weeks in effectuating the promise that the operators of the saddle stitcher would be transferred to full-time status was not so unreasonable as to support an inference that the transfers were motivated by the union organizational campaign. Thus, as with Pacheco, the transfer of Marin and Llamas was effectuated in accordance with promises to do so which were made prior to the Union's organizational campaign. Respondent had an obligation to effectuate this change in status as if the Union were not in the picture. Accordingly, I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by transferring Pacheco, Marin, Llamas, and Lowe to full-time status.

On the other hand, I find that the circumstances of Ron Murphee's transfer to full-time status do not establish a legitimate business reason for the timing of his transfer. He does not meet with Respondent's most basic requirement—that he regularly work a 40-hour week. I therefore conclude that the evidence supports an inference of unlawful motivation. This conclusion is buttressed by my finding below that the grant of certain wage increases was unlawfully motivated. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by transferring Murphee to full-time status with the accompanying grant of benefits and wage increase.

As to the wage increases granted to Pacheco, Lowe, Marin, and Llamas, in accordance with Respondent's prior practice, these increases accompanied their transfer to full-time status. Since I have found these transfers were not violative of the Act, I also find that the wage increases which accompanied the transfers were not violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[12]

Regarding the other wage increases granted during the election campaign, seven were granted to employees with less than 6 months' seniority and two were granted to employees with more than 6 months' seniority. The General Counsel correctly argues the burden is on Respondent to establish that the timing of such increases was motivated by factors other than the union campaign or the pendency of an election, Chester Valley, Inc., 251 NLRB 1435 (1980); and that the burden is met where the increases are shown to be granted in accordance with an established regular wage program. Doces Sixth Avenue, 225 NLRB 806, 810–811 (1976). The General Counsel also argues that a further indicia of unlawful motivation is the fact that wage increases were granted in "unprecedented" numbers for a 4- to 6-week period other than the period of the annual reviews. Adam Automation & Mfg. Co., 218 NLRB 1255, 1258 (1975).

Respondent's only regular established program of wage increases for part-time employees with more than 6 months' seniority is that which accompanies a transfer to full-time status based on an annual review. This review is not given on an employee's anniversary date but rather is given to all employees during the same time period. Annual reviews, and the resulting wage increases, were given in 1980 during the month of April. Any other raises are given at the discretion of the supervisor and Homes. The raises given to Seybolt and Rodrigues fall within this discretionary category and were not based on any regularly established wage plan. I find that Respondent has not established a legitimate business reason for the timing of the wage increase granted to Seybolt and Rodrigues. Accordingly, I find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by the grant of wage increases to them.

As to the wage increases granted the newly hired employees, Respondent's stated wage policy provides for review after 2 weeks or 80 hours with a 25-cent wage increase and a second review after an additional 2 weeks or 80 hours with a 25-cent wage increase. All the wage increases were granted within 1 month of employment except for Orr who was given a wage increase after 5 weeks of employment. Although it appears from the record that Respondent's practice has not been to give all new employees two wage increases during their first month of employment, there is nothing to suggest that they did not receive one wage increase during that first month.

The General Counsel finds it suspicious that Murphee and Shipherd were the only employees who received wage increases approximately 2 weeks after their hire dates. Also none of the wage increases were granted exactly 2 weeks or 4 weeks after hire. I find that neither circumstance is an indicia of unlawful motivation. There is no reason to conclude that the actual timing of the wage increases, as opposed to the 2 weeks and 4 weeks, or 80 hours and 160 hours, anniversary dates, was more advantageous to Respondent's election campaign. All the raises were granted after the initial surge of card signing and the Union's demand, and all of the pertinent anniversary dates would have been prior to the election.

I find no significance in the fact that the raises were not granted precisely on the appropriate anniversary dates. In all the circumstances, I find that the wage increases granted to new hires conformed generally to Respondent's wage plan for new hires. The fact that a large number of wage increases was given during the preelection period only reflects that a number of new employees were hired in September and October. There is no contention, or evidence, that the hiring of these new employees was unlawfully motivated. Accordingly, I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by granting wage increases to Camp, Foltz, Barbara Murphee, Nash, Navarro, Orr, and Shipherd.

D. The Discharge of Funseth, Sterling, and Campbell

As set forth above, on September 25 and 26 the Union notified Respondent that Funseth, Sterling, Schwarz, and Rodrigues were members of the volunteer organizing committee. Both Sterling and Funseth commenced working for Respondent in September and Campbell's first day of employment was October 7. On October 7, McCain discharged Funseth, Sterling, and Campbell for smoking marijuana during their lunch break. It is not disputed that they were in fact smoking marijuana. It is also undisputed that in September, prior to the union activity, McCain had told Sterling and two other employees that he thought he had observed them smoking marijuana and, upon their denial, warned them that if he caught them smoking marijuana again during their lunch break he would discharge them. In these circumstances I agree with counsels for the Respondent and the General Counsel that Respondent established the discharges would have taken place even in the absence of the union activity. Accordingly, the motion of counsel for the General Counsel is granted to withdraw subparagraphs 7(a) and 8(a) and (b) of the amended complaint insofar as they alleged the unlawful discharge of Funseth, Sterling, and Campbell. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

E. The Discharge of Schwarz

1. Facts

Allen Schwarz was hired on September 8 to work in the bindery. He had no prior experience doing bindery work. According to McCain, when he hired Schwarz he explained that there was a probationary period and that if his work was satisfactory he would receive a wage increase after so many hours and after so many more he would get another raise with the possibility of being transferred to full-time status; but, that if his work was not satisfactory, he could be discharged. Although McCain was Schwarz' supervisor, both Smith and McCain testified as to the reason for his discharge. According to Smith, Schwarz moved incredibly slow, he was always wandering around pretending to push his broom, talking to other employees, and "not doing much of anything." Smith further testified that on the day Schwarz was discharged she observed Schwarz pretending to sweep in a corner of an area between the bindery and the warehouse for a half hour when it only required 2 minutes at the most to sweep. According to her, she was furious and went to McCain, related to him what she had just observed, and told him that he had to do something about Schwarz, that Schwarz' work performance was terrible, other employees had been complaining[13] and, if McCain did not discharge him, she would.

According to McCain, he would assign Schwarz a job of cleaning up an area, emptying barrels or something of that nature, and then he would notice Schwarz leaning on his broom talking to other employees. As soon as McCain approached him, Schwarz would start moving his broom. McCain spoke to him regarding this a half-dozen or a dozen times, the first time being about a week after he was hired. Then he gave him a verbal warning on September 18 for leaning on his broom, not following instructions, and improperly feeding the pockets of the Perfect binder. According to McCain, on several other occasions he told Schwarz he was getting tired of him making mistakes and leaning on his broom, not doing his job, that he had better start straightening up or he was going to be out the door. Essentially McCain testified that Schwarz was lazy and did not have the aptitude to be a bindery worker.

[13] According to Smith, employee Larry Carpenter complained that Schwarz worked too slow and was too inept to be of any assistance in the operation of the three-knife trimmer. Kirsten Carpenter and Sonja Vaught generally complained as to Schwarz being permitted to stand around when they had to work.

McCain further testified that, on September 26, Schwarz was assigned to feed pockets which he proceeded to do incorrectly and too slowly. McCain wrote up a warning, called Schwarz into the office, and explained to Schwarz that he had been watching him, counting the mistakes that he made, and that he was tired of warning Schwarz about just being a broom leaner. He said that with his mistakes, Respondent could not afford him, and if he did not get his act together he was not going to be there. McCain showed Schwarz the written warning, pointed out to him that he could either concur or disagree, and that if he disagreed he could write in a statement of disagreement. Schwarz said he neither concurred nor disagreed with the statement. Schwarz signed the warning, but did not write a statement on the warning report nor did he check the box for either concurrence or disagreement with the supervisor's statement contained in the warning. McCain's written comment, which appears on the warning, reads:

> I have explained what jobs have to be performed and have had to take over for Allen because he could not keep up with machine or made mistakes.
> On 9–26–80 he could not keep up with the first pockets I assigned him so I put him on some easier ones and he feed [sic] them backwards on 4 occasions and let them run out also.

Schwarz testified that on the day he received the written warning he had been loading the pockets in the binder and had been unable to keep up with the binder. According to him, the material was going too fast and he had too many stations. He was removed from the binder and was replaced by two employees who were assigned the same number of pockets that Schwarz had been handling alone. On direct examination, Schwarz testified that he did not recall how many pockets this was; however, on cross-examination he testified that he thinks it was about five pockets. He further testified he never observed how many pockets one person would typically feed so he does not know whether five was an unusual number or not.

McCain denies that he ever assigned Schwarz five pockets. According to him, normally, he would assign Schwarz three pockets and would assign other employees four. He specifically denies that he assigned more than one person on September 26 to feed the same number of pockets that Schwarz had been feeding by himself. I credit McCain in this regard. In doing so, I note that, though given the opportunity to do so, Schwarz made no notation on the warning of his alleged version of what occurred.

McCain testified that at the time he gave Schwarz the written warning he was beginning to think there was no hope for Schwarz, that he could not perform any job assignment free of mistakes. However, following the September 26 warning, he assigned Schwarz to stack books at the end of the binder. According to McCain, this was the least complicated of the bindery assignments. Schwarz testified that two employees are assigned to the end of the binder, one sits in a chair at the end of the conveyor and removes the material from the conveyor and hands it to the other employee who stacks it on a pallet. Schwarz further testified that for at least a week or 10 days after he received the written warning he worked as one of these two employees. He also testified that it had been his obvservation that, generally, no employee spent more than a half day at a time working at the end of the binder. Nevertheless Schwarz was not reassigned from that position until about 3 days prior to his discharge. He also testified that when he worked at the end of the binder he actually had no contact with any employees other than the one working with him. However, when he was working loading the binder pockets he had more contact with the other employees. Employees would sometimes stop the machine and go down and help other employees with the pallets, help people load the bins and, in general, mix around.

McCain testified that Schwarz' work performance did not improve after the written warning. He did assign Schwarz to the end of the binder for several days, the reason being that he could no longer assign Schwarz to feed pockets because of the mistakes he made. According to McCain, the jobs they were running during that period of time were too critical and too close as to count to allow for very many bad books. On October 10 they were having some difficulty with a particular job mainly because of a customer's problem. This resulted in quite a bit of downtime during which McCain would assign employees to clean up, break down and repair pallets, empty barrels, sweep the floor, and anything else that needed to be done but is difficult to find time to do when the binder is running. Every time he assigned Schwarz to do something, Schwarz would go in a corner or behind the collator where he could not be seen "unless you were specifically" looking for him; he would lean on his broom and watch the press run and stand in a corner and look around to see what everyone was doing. McCain observed him do this twice for 3 or 4 minutes at a time.

At some point during that day, according to McCain, Smith asked what he was going to do with Schwarz. She said she had been watching him sweep the same 3-foot square in the courtyard for the last half hour, that there was nothing there, that he was just pushing the broom around in a circle, and why McCain did not do something with him. She further said that if McCain did not get rid of Schwarz, she was going to go crazy. At the time, according to McCain, he was busy and did not have time to do anything; however, he told Smith that as soon as he could catch Schwarz doing something wrong again he was going to discharge him.

Subsequently, when McCain was checking to see what each employee was doing, he did not see a couple of employees so he began to look around for them. He walked over to the end of the cutter and observed Schwarz leaning on his broom behind the collator just standing there. According to McCain, he stood and watched Schwarz for 5 minutes. During that time Schwarz did not move at all; whereupon McCain filled out Schwarz' termination report, came out and asked Schwarz to come into his office. Schwarz asked why. McCain said he was fired, that he was not doing what McCain asked him to do and McCain was getting tired of seeing him lean on his broom and making mistakes that cost money and books. Schwarz said he was doing as good a job as anybody and that the only reason McCain was discharging him was because he was a union affiliate. McCain said he was firing Schwarz because he was a lousy worker. Schwarz said he would take this either to the NLRB or to the attorneys. McCain responded that he did not care who Schwarz took it to, that he was discharged because he could not do the job. Schwarz said he was going to pursue it. McCain said, "You are free to pursue it as far as you want." McCain admits that at that time he knew Schwarz was interested in the Union. Schwarz's termination memo cites incompetence as the reason for termination and under comments notes: "Spent a good deal of time leaning on a broom talking to other employees and kept making the same mistakes—mainly loading pockets wrong."

Schwarz testified that on October 10 he spent the first half of the morning sweeping and the second half unloading the pallets into the bins. According to him, about a quarter of the signatures on the pallet had already been through the trimmer and that the signature mark, which is a black stripe on the side of the folds, had been trimmed off which made it more difficult to know in which direction the signatures should be placed in the bins.[14] When questioned as to whether it mattered whether the signatures are placed in the bin correctly, he testified that it helps to have them going in the same way as they are going to go into the binder or at least whatever way you are putting them in; if you are putting them in the bin all the same way, the person loading the pocket will have less chance of placing the signatures in the pockets incorrectly. He further testified that if signatures were placed in the bins incorrectly, the person loading the pockets could correct it, since all they had to do was simply to look at what they had in their hands and be sure that they placed it in the pocket correctly.

Schwarz testified that on the morning of the day he was discharged, he was loading bins and Larry and Kirsten Carpenter were loading pockets. According to Schwarz, neither of the Carpenters mentioned that he was loading the bins incorrectly nor did the binder make any significant stops. According to Schwarz when he returned from lunch McCain told him, "I'm sorry, I've got to let you go." Schwarz asked why and McCain replied that Schwarz had loaded three layers into the bin incorrectly and that the Carpenters had complained about it. Schwarz said that the Carpenters were the ones who were responsible for loading the pockets, not him. He further complained that he could not see the way the signatures were going, apparently referring to the alleged absence of the signature marks. McCain said that someone had said they saw Schwarz leaning on a broom that morning and that Schwarz only had two speeds, slow and stop. Schwarz said he thought the real reason for his discharge was his organizing activity. McCain said, "You go ahead and get your NLRB. I can get 10 employees to swear you are not a good worker." At this point, Schwarz walked away.

Schwarz admits he did not deny that he had loaded the bins incorrectly. Rather, he said that since he had been written up for loading pockets incorrectly, it was incumbent on the person loading the pockets to load correctly. He also told McCain no one had said anything to him and there had been no significant stoppage, to his recollection, and that based upon the written warning he had received, it seemed to him the primary responsibility for loading the pockets correctly lay with the person who was loading the pocket. He admits, however, that McCain was speaking to him regarding the proper loading of the bins. McCain testified that the Carpenters had complained to him about Schwarz on numerous occasions but does not recall for sure whether they complained on the day of Schwarz' discharge. Nor does he recall for sure telling Schwarz that day the Carpenters had been complaining regarding him loading bins incorrectly that morning.

There is no substantial disparity between the testimony of McCain and Schwarz as to this conversation. However, to the extent that Schwarz' version of the reason given by McCain for his discharge implies that Schwarz was discharged because the Carpenters complained. I credit McCain's version of what he said and his denial that complaints by the Carpenters were factors he considered in making the decision to discharge Schwarz. Further, I do not credit Schwarz that the binder did not make any significant stops that morning. It is apparent from his testimony that he is not very knowledgeable regarding bindery operations.

As to Schwarz' overall work performance, McCain testified that Schwarz made a number of mistakes, that he warned Schwarz he was making too many mistakes, and would have to watch what he was doing or he would be discharged. McCain specifically referred to Schwarz' work on the Perfect binder. The operation of the Perfect binder requires, in addition to the operator, employees to stack into bins forms consisting of several pages which are called signatures. Then other employes remove the signatures from the bin, jog them so that they are even, and fill the pockets that feed the Perfect binder. The machine then collates and binds the books and other employees are required to remove the bound books and stack them on pallets. From there, the books are moved to the three-knife trimmer where the edges are trimmed. Employees are then required to remove the finished books from a conveyor belt and box them or stack them on pallets.

According to McCain, Kirsten Carpenter, and Larry Carpenter, who is the operator of the three-knife trimmer, Schwarz was assigned to these various jobs and constantly made mistakes and/or worked so slowly doing all of them. Specifically, when he loaded the bins, he placed the signatures in the wrong direction and/or the wrong bin. When he was assigned to load pockets, he worked too slowly which resulted in the pockets not being kept filled which caused the machine to shut down. According to McCain, even prior to September [14] Apparently Schwarz referred to this stripe to determine the proper placement of the signatures.

19 he had spoken to Schwarz about loading pockets backwards. On at least one occasion, McCain stopped the binder and showed Allen what he was doing wrong. He took some signatures out of the pocket and showed Schwarz the correct way to place them in the pocket and immediately thereafter Schwarz again placed signatures in the pocket incorrectly. McCain told him he was doing it wrong and he would have to watch what he was doing. McCain cannot recall the date of this incident.

According to McCain, Schwarz put signatures into the wrong pockets and did not jog the signatures properly. Jogging requires a certain amount of manual dexterity which apparently Schwarz did not possess. He was all thumbs; he could not move his hands properly and he held the forms too tightly, McCain would explain and show him how to do it correctly but Schwarz could not seem to catch on. McCain assigned Schwarz to stack books off the end of the binder. These books have to be stacked on a pallet in a pattern so as to prevent the books from tumbling off when the pallet is moved. Schwarz could not keep up. He could not remember the pattern. He would get flustered and sometimes take 8 to 10 books and throw them on the ground and just start over. All of the books that he threw on the ground would be ruined.

McCain also testified that when Schwarz was assigned to work at the end of the binder, he complained that the books were too hot (from the hot pre-melt glue used in the binder) and began to wear gloves, he stacked the books incorrectly and when he got begind he threw them on the floor. At this point McCain told him that if he threw any more books away McCain was going to throw him away. This was 3 to 7 days prior to the written warning. As to why he did not give Schwarz a written warning at this time, McCain testified that he was trying to give him a chance. He wanted to see if he could at least improve.

McCain testified that most of the employees under his supervision are instructed that they are to find something to do when the binder shuts off such as pick up scrap, empty barrels, load bins, sweep, or anything they could do that makes them at least look like they are working. He further testified that when the binder is down, most of the employees load pockets if there are pockets to be loaded, pick up scrap, move skids, and sometimes repair bad books. It depends upon what needs to be done and how severe the stop is. If it is going to be brief, perhaps 5 minutes, he usually tells employees to clean up any bad books on the floor and load pockets. If it is going to be 15 minutes or more, he will tell them to sweep up any bad books, empty barrels, repair pallets, etc. He would assign different jobs to different employees. When questioned as to whether he considered these to be "make work" tasks or important tasks, McCain testified that he considers them to be important, that, when the binder is running, if 10 pallets are needed to pack a job and there are only 6 in the shop, then somewhere they have to find 4 additional pallets at a point when they really do not have time to do so. Therefore, if there is downtime and pallets are available to be repaired or garbage bins to be emptied, it is important to get those tasks done so that they are not required to do it while the binder is operating.

McCain admits that it is common for new employees to make mistakes on the binder but asserts that the extent of the mistakes made by Schwarz was uncommon, that most employees learn to perform satisfactorily within a few days or a week at the most. Schwarz never achieved this level of performance. McCain also testified that he does not recall seeing any other employees standing around like Schwarz and that, on the occasions when he observed Schwarz leaning on his broom, there were jobs to be done such as repairing pallets, emptying garbage, sweeping the floor, and loading the bins. According to him, he never had any problems on any consistent basis with any other employee not doing anything productive when the binder was down.

Employees Kirsten and Larry Carpenter testified as to Schwarz' work performance. Kirsten Carpenter[15] testified that Schwarz was lazy, that she does not know whether it was just that he did not want to work or whether he just could not handle the job, but she does know that he did not work very well. Specifically he would fill the pockets of the bins backwards and when she would tell him he had done it incorrectly and try to explain to him what to do, he would respond that he did not care, that other employees could fix it. When Kirsten explained that the other employees did not have time to fix it, he would again say "They can fix it."

She also testified that a couple of times she was feeding pockets while Schwarz was filling the bins and half of her time would be spent rearranging her pockets. Further, there were a couple of times when the machine ran out because he had wrong signatures in the wrong bin. He would place the signatures in the bins backwards or he would put signatures in the wrong bin. She further testified that McCain places the new employees by experienced employees on the binder so she has observed Schwarz feeding pockets as she was working next to him. According to her, when she would try to show him how to do it, he would say that he had a better way. When she told him that if he did it the way she was instructing, it was a lot easier and would get the job done, he would reply, "No, I'll do it my way." Then the pocket would shut off because he did not get the signatures jogged properly and, when he placed signatures in the wrong pockets, the result was bad books and damaged books that could not be fixed.

Kirsten Carpenter also testified that she has observed Schwarz stacking books at the end of the binder quite frequently. He worked too slowly, and stacked the pal-

[15] Kirsten Carpenter was the observer for Respondent at the election. However, according to her, prior to the beginning of November she had not made up her mind about the Union. She was just debating whether to vote for or against it. She once had a discussion with Schwarz regarding the Union during the lunch period which turned into an argument. According to her, she does not actually remember what was said but she was very upset when she finished talking to him. He promised a lot of things and she said she did not see how he could do that, that she thought the Union would have to discuss it, would have to bargain with the Company and it would be decided there. She admits that she was angry with him during that discussion but denies that she felt any personal animosity towards him or that she wanted to see either him or Rodrigues discharged because of their union activity.

lets incorrectly. The books are supposed to be turned on the pallet every so often so that the spines are distributed on the pallet in a way that keeps the books from falling off the pallet when it is moved. Schwarz just could not seem to do it correctly. He would not remember to turn the books, consequently the layer of books would be very uneven and they would fall when the pallet was moved. She further testified that she has worked with Schwarz boxing books as they come off the trimmer. The books which come out of the three-knife trimmer are finished product. They come out on a conveyor belt about 3 feet wide and approximately 6 feet long. There is a table placed sideways to the rollers and an employee stands on each side of the table and boxes the books in certain patterns. One person stands in the front and another in the rear. Usually the front person will box more books because that person is closer to the belt. According to Carpenter, she has worked with Schwarz when he has been in the front position. The books would come out and he would get so jumbled that instead of picking up the books he would just shove them at her so that she would be doing twice the work, with stacks of books. When the stacks get too piled up, then Schwarz would just throw them on the floor. She told him that the books were finished product and that was what was paying both of their salaries. Schwarz said he did not care.

After receiving that response on several occasions, Carpenter admits that she finally got upset and told him "Don't throw them on the floor and don't push them towards me," that he had to at least try to pick up every other stack of books. After this, Schwarz stopped throwing the books on the floor. He would throw them on the table and would push the books towards Carpenter. She switched positions with him. The books were coming out fast and she was still boxing probably three boxes to his one. According to her, Schwarz could not keep up and she was rushing and it was really a mess. The books fell off the end of the roller. Finally, Schwarz stopped trying to place books on the pallet and just handed them to Carpenter. When asked how she would compare Schwarz' work performance to that of other new employees working on the binder and the trimmer, she testified, "There's no comparison. Allen was the worst, plus when you try and teach him something he just didn't want to. It was like he didn't want to learn. He just felt, I don't care, You know, who cares? Or let me do it my way. And there are some things that you just can't do your way. You just have to do it the set way until you figure out or get good enough to figure out doing it your own way."

Kirsten Carpenter testified in agreement with McCain that all employees are required to clean up. According to her, a number of times Schwarz would sweep in a 3-foot wide square and just keep sweeping that place for half an hour when in a half hour you could get the entire plant done with a couple of people. Other times, he talked to press employees or other employees. On occasion, according to Carpenter, she would say to Allen, "Let's get busy, everybody else is cleaning up." Schwarz would say okay and walk away. She admits she complained to McCain regarding Schwarz, that he did not like to work with him and wanted him to be discharged because he was incompetent and made her job a lot more difficult so that sometimes she would have to work twice as hard. She further testified that in the 2-1/2 years she has worked for Respondent in the bindery she has never observed any new employee having as much trouble feeding pockets on the Perfect binder as Schwarz nor make as many mistakes as he did.

Larry Carpenter operated the three-knife book trimmer which takes a paperback book, cuts the top, bottom, and front square and feeds it out on a conveyor system where other employees remove them and stack them on pallets or box them. Larry Carpenter testified that Schwarz had been assigned to stack a box of books as they come off the three-knife trimmer which he was operating. According to him, Schwarz did not do a very good job. He told Schwarz to turn the books and showed him how, but Schwarz never turned the books the way he instructed him. Rather, he would place the books however he could stack them with the end result that the books would fall. Carpenter explained to Schwarz several times how to perform the job properly. Nevertheless, his performance did not improve after the explanation. According to Larry Carpenter, Schwarz seemed to lack the coordination and speed to keep up with the books. On one occasion, Schwarz got so far behind that the second person could not keep up with the books and the books backed up into the machine causing a jam which resulted in a loss of 4 hours of production time. This happened about 2 weeks after Schwarz began his employment. At this point, Carpenter requested that Schwarz not be assigned again to the three-knife trimmer. At the time of this incident, Carpenter had no knowledge of any union activities among the employees. According to him, he first learned about the union activity when Schwarz had worked there for a little more than 3 weeks. Carpenter further testified that he never had as much of a problem training anyone on the three-knife trimmer as he did with Schwarz.

Carpenter also testified that he has seen Schwarz feeding pockets on the Perfect binder and that Schwarz had a lot of problems jogging signatures. According to him, when you are feeding pockets, you have to jog the signatures square to the front edge. Otherwise, the machine will not pick them up and feed them. Schwarz never seemed to be able to do that very well. When asked if he could tell what the problem was with Schwarz in this regard, Larry Carpenter testified that Schwarz would work twice as hard as he needed to and still he would not get the job done the way it should be done; he does not know whether it was lack of coordination or what, but Schwarz just did not seem to have the ability. Carpenter also testified that he has observed the binder shut off when Schwarz was feeding pockets and that he knows it was Schwarz who caused the machine to shut off because, when he would go over to fix it he would pull Schwarz' signatures out and rejog them, show him how to jog them and put them back in. Schwarz could not seem to jog them flat. Instead of being all jogged down square to the front edge, some of them would be off a half-inch or better or would be turned the wrong way.

2. Conclusion

Where, as here, the determination as to whether a discharge was unlawful turns on motivation, the General Counsel is required to make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a motivating factor in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

I find that the General Counsel has made a sufficient prima facie showing based on the animus indicated by Respondent's election campaign and the concurrent unfair labor practices found above; Respondent's knowledge that Schwarz was one of four persons identified by the Union as members of the employees' volunteer organizing committee for the Union and the timing of the discharge within less than 3 weeks after Respondent acquired such knowledge and within 3 days after Respondent received the Union's demand for recognition; the absence of a single, major precipitating incident; and the coincidence of the other three known members of the Union's employee organizing committee all being discharged during the course of the preelection campaign.

However, I also find that Respondent has rebutted this prima facie case by demonstrating that Schwarz would have been discharged even in the absence of the union activity. Thus, Schwarz commenced work for Respondent on September 8. Within a week, McCain began speaking to him regarding the mistakes he was making. On September 18, the day before he, Funesth, Sterling, and Rodrigues signed union authorization cards,[16] he was given a verbal warning for leaning on his broom, not following instructions, and improperly feeding the pockets of the Perfect binder. Nevertheless he continued the same conduct which led to the verbal warning. On two or three occasions, McCain told him he would be discharged if his work did not improve and on September 26 McCain gave him a written warning regarding his unsatisfactory work performance. Despite all this, Schwarz' work performance did not improve. In this regard, I credit the mutually corroborative testimony of McCain, Smith, and Larry and Kirsten Carpenter as to Schwarz' incompetence, particularly since the General Counsel adduced no evidence to refute it. Further, there is no evidence which establishes disparate treatment[17] and Schwarz' employment—only one month—was too short, absent a contrary practice, to support any adverse inference from McCain's failure to discharge him earlier. In fact, excluding his first 10 days of employment, a discharge at any time during his probationary period would have raised suspicions as to timing. Similarly, any adverse inference which might have been drawn from the absence of a major incident on the day of his discharge is negated by the continuing pattern of unsatisfactory performance. Accordingly, I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Schwarz.

F. The Discharge of Rodrigues

1. Facts

Rodrigues was hired on June 17, 1980,[18] as a general cleanup employee. He was terminated on November 11, 1980, allegedly for incompetence and excessive tardiness and absenteeism. Initially he was supervised by Gary Shultes, the plant manager. His job was to clean the press and bindery areas, the warehouse and the courtyard and to gather and remove trash from those areas. Additionally, he did some painting and some light carpentry work. Around the first of September, when Shultes left Respondent's employ, Smith became his supervisor. About September 9, Rodrigues, who had been working a regular 40-hour shift, was transferred to part-time hours at his request. Thereafter, his working hours were from 12:30 to 5:30 p.m.

According to Smith, during the month of September, she spoke to him several times regarding mistakes he was making in performing his work such as using the wrong type of strap, failing to straighten up the pallets, not keeping boxes of paper full, not putting them on the right pallets, not keeping the aisles clear, not keeping the courtyard properly swept, and putting the wrong type of paper in the compactor. His frequent response, when she inquired as to why he had not done various things, was to say that he did not know he was supposed to do that. During this period, she made no notation of verbal warnings to be placed in his personnel file nor did she give him a written warning.

On October 3, Smith prepared a written schedule of Rodrigues' job duties which she gave to him. According to Smith, when she gave him the schedule they went over it item by item. She asked if he understood it and he said he did. She told him that she was getting tired of him saying he did not know he was supposed to do various things and the schedule should solve that problem. The schedule was as follows:

ED'S SCHEDULE

Throw away garbage between double doors & sweep.
Get all garbage around press & bindery into courtyard
Throw away—
Make sure pallets are straightened up.
Strap all pallets of cardboard, boxes & trash (with metal strapping).
Sweep press area & straighten up.
Make sure courtyard is swept up.

[16] There is no evidence that any authorization cards were signed prior to September 19.

[17] Contrary to the General Counsel, in the absence of evidence to establish that other employees had been similarly incompetent, I do not find it significant that neither McCain nor Smith could recall any other employee who had previously been discharged for incompetence.

[18] Rodrigues testified that he was hired on June 17 and a notation of his hire filled out by Shultes show 6/17/80 as the date of hire. Rodrigues' W–4 form and a notation made by Homes on his application shows May 28 as the date of hire. I find the testimony of Rodrigues and the notation by Shultes to be more reliable.

RULES

Always use metal strapping
Do not use MP pallets
Do not talk to employees leaving at 5:00 p.m.
Do not block isles [sic]
Do not leave any equipment outside.

Rodrigues agreed that Smith did give him a written list of duties and that the list contained no duties he had not previously performed under Shultes' supervision. On October 2, Smith prepared an employee performance evaluation of Rodrigues. The record is not fully clear as to why the evaluation was prepared at this point in time. Rodrigues testified that about September 15 he asked Smith if he was entitled to any benefits after 3 months because Shultes had said he was. Smith said, to her knowledge, no, but there would be a review made as to his progress. About a week later, he asked her if there was any new information about this review from a manager. Smith said she was still working on that. Smith testifies that on October 2 she had been his supervisor for about a month, and that she believes she prepared the evaluation because it was around the time to do it from a length of service standpoint. However, it was not the time for a 6-month evaluation and the record does not establish any practice of giving employees a formal evaluation a month after being assigned to a new supervisor. On its face, the evaluation indicates that it is an evaluation of a new employee. No rating was given for the various performance factors listed on the evaluation form. Under the heading "General comments as to employee's strengths, weaknesses and action taken to improve job performance," Smith wrote, "I feel I cannot give Ed a fair review since I have only been his supervisor for about 1 month. When Ed's next review comes up I feel I can fairly evaluate his job performance." She discussed the evaluation with Rodrigues on October 29 at which time Rodrigues wrote in the following comment: "I look forward to a better review in the future. Now, I have a written schedule."

On October 1, Rodrigues was 10 minutes late. On his daily timesheet for that date opposite the start time, Rodrigues made a notation, "No break at 3:00." Apparently this was to compensate for arriving 10 minutes late to work. On October 2, he was 1-1/2 hours late. On October 2, Smith spoke to him about his tardiness and about not taking his break. She told him not to skip his breaks and that if he was going to be 15 minutes late or more he should telephone her. On October 3, he was a half-hour late; On October 6, he was 40 minutes late; on October 7, he was 15 minutes late; and on October 8, he was a half-hour late. He did not call in on any of these occasions. October 9, Smith gave Rodrigues the following verbal warning:

VERBAL WARNING FOR ED RODRIGUES

Ed is not showing up for work on time. He is up to 45 minutes late at a time without calling in.

I am also warning Ed about a metal device I found that is quite dangerous. I was told that Ed has been seen with this object. I don't want to see him or anybody else with this object.

Ed is leaving piles of garbage in the courtyard & not picking it up. This is his job and I expect him to do it.

According to Smith, she told Rodrigues that he has been coming in late too often and had not been calling in. She told him that was not a good situation and the Company did not want it. She also told him that she had found the metal object in the pallet, that it could have really hurt someone, and that he had been identified as the person having the object. Rodrigues said he had found one and he had thrown it away. Smith told him she was not accusing him of throwing the object or of having it but if he ever found one again she wanted him to bring it to her, she did not want to see him or anyone else with one. She also told him that if he saw anyone else with one to tell her because it was such a dangerous article. He said fine and agreed that it was a dangerous article.[19] She told him he had been leaving piles of garbage in front of the compactor and that he was supposed to keep that courtyard area clean. He said he did not know he was supposed to do that. She said it was on his list and he said, "Yes, you are right." Smith also testified that she told him if he did not improve, she would have to give him a written warning.

Rodrigues testified that he was given two verbal warnings by Smith in August. This is clearly incorrect inasmuch as Smith did not become his supervisor until the day Shultes left Respondent's employ, a date which the parties stipulated was September 14. According to Rodrigues, the first verbal warning was for tardiness only. He does not recall exactly what Smith said but she did complain about the days that he had been late reporting to work. He does not recall whether Smith told him at this time that, if he ever had to be late or absent, he was to call in. He does recall that this was discussed at some point in time and that he was aware this was Respondent's rule. The second warning, according to him, concerned his work quality—specifically, cleaning up the courtyard area. He does not recall specifically what was said. However, Smith did ask him why the area had not been cleaned. He thinks he gave her a reason. He does not recall what her respnse was but she seemed to be dissatisfied with his explanation. He also testified that it was in the latter part of the day that Smith asked him why the area had not been cleaned and that he had not cleaned the area because he had been attending to other duties to which he gave priority—emptying the trash bin used by the pressmen. According to Rodrigues, these had to be constantly kept empty so he had not cleaned up the debris in the driveway. He agreed that the area was "quite a mess."

As set forth above, on October 17, Rodrigues was given a wage increase of 25 cents an hour. On October 27, Smith gave Rodrigues a written warning. The warning report shows that it was for work quality and that a previous verbal warning had been given on October 15. The statement written by Smith on the warning report reads:

> Ed was told during the week of 10–20 to 10–25 to clean the compactor on 10–27–80 this was still not done. Also on 10–27–80 Ed was throwing away books. The problem was that he was throwing them away one by one seeming to make a game out of his job. Ed is not performing his assigned duties satisfactorily.

Rodrigues signed the warning report and indicated thereon that he concurred with the statement written by Smith.

According to Smith, she had instructed Rodrigues to clean around, and in back of, the compactor and to clean the courtyard. Sometime during the afternoon of October 27, as she was standing on the loading dock, she observed him, for at least 10 minutes, picking up damaged books from a bin and throwing them away one by one. About every couple of books he would flip through the pages and read some portion of it.[20] She yelled at him, "Ed you can't do that. Start throwing them away faster." To which he responded, "But this is really interesting." Smith testified that this response really upset her and she prepared a written warning. According to Smith, when she gave him the written warning she told him she had asked him to clean up around the compactor and she noticed that it was still not being done. She told him she was very unhappy with the way he was throwing away the books, that she had watched him for approximately 10 minutes or so, and he was not handling that efficiently, throwing the books away one at a time and glancing through them. She said she was very unhappy about this and would not tolerate him continuing to do so. She further told him that, in general, he was not performing his assigned duties up to par, and if his performance did not improve he would be discharged. She also told him if he disagreed with anything, he could check the box on the warning report which said that he disagreed and then he could write anything he wanted to on the warning report. Rodrigues testified that Smith gave the written warning to him around 1:30 p.m. He does not recall what they discussed.

In October, Rodrigues was subpoenaed to testify in the representation hearing in this matter. On October 22, he showed the subpoena to Smith. Smith said she did not understand why they wanted Rodrigues. Rodrigues said he had never been subpoenaed before and he did not know what it was going to be about but he wanted to inform her that he might be a bit delayed that next day getting to work. According to Rodrigues, Smith said she wanted him to be there at his regular starting time regardless. Rodrigues testified that he did not in fact testify at, or attend, this hearing.

On Thursday, November 6, Rodrigues did not report to work and did not call in. According to Smith, when he came to work the following day she told him that he already had problems with his attendance and that she just could not put up with much more of his poor attendance. As usual, he agreed with her assessment of the situation but she does not recall that he offered any excuses. However, according to her, Rodrigues usually offered one of two excuses—either he had missed his bus or had to take his brother to the doctor.

On Monday, November 10, Rodrigues reported to work 1 hour late. He neither called in nor did he report to Smith upon his arrival at work. He testified he did not see Smith when he arrived so he proceeded with his job duties. He further testified that he boarded the wrong bus. When he realized his mistake and left the bus he was about a mile and a half from Respondent's plant so he proceeded to walk to the plant. When asked if it took him an hour to walk a mile and a half, Rodrigues testified, "No, I was already late from getting on a later bus. And when I realized my mistake, that I was on a 303 instead of a 306, I presumed it was most important just to start to work. And I did not have any change to make a phone call. That's why I did not call that day." Rodrigues was then shown his prehearing affidavit dated November 25, in which he claimed that he did not call to say he would be late because he was on his way and he thought it best to get there as soon as possible rather than taking the time to call. His prehearing affidavit further recites that when he got to work he saw Smith but she did not say anything to him at that time. He then testified that he seemed to remember that the reason he did not call in was both because he had no change and because he thought it was important to get to work as soon as possible; and that when he arrived at work he did see Smith, but she did not approach him, they just made eye contact.

Later that day, Rodrigues testified, about 1:45 p.m. Smith told him she wanted to speak to him and they went into the small luncheon area. She closed the door and said, "This is going to be your last day here." Rodrigues asked why. Smith said, "What time did you get in here to work?" Rodrigues replied, "I got in late because I got on the wrong bus." Smith said, "Well, I've been getting complaints about your work," and further stated that Rodrigues had been late before. To which Rodrigues replied, "Yes, I'm aware of that, but I've never been this late." Rodrigues then apologized and said he was looking for another job in the area because he had heard that a union was organizing in the plant and he thought if he remained in Respondent's employ he would have to join the Union. Smith said, "Well, I don't know if that's true. But it's probably part of the contract." He does not recall whether Smith explained exactly what complaint she had received about his work if he asked her what the complaints were, nor does he recall if there was any discussion of anything that had happened the previous week.

Rodrigues admits that he had not been looking actively for a job, that he had been making phone calls and asking people, but he was not going for employment interviews. He further testified he does not know why he made the statement to Smith about the Union and seeking other employment. However, his prehearing affidavit states:

[20] Prior to this date, she had observed him doing the same thing on two or three previous occasions and had told him that he had to throw them away faster and more efficiently. He said okay.

> I had been playing dumb about the union around supervisors like Smith and Jim McCain. And at the end of the conversation, I continued to do so. I did so at this time to see if she would tell me what she knew about the union and who was involved. I told her I would have been looking for another job sooner or later, because I had heard a union was trying to get into the plant. She asked me why I was looking for another job. I said because I had been told that if the union came in, I would have to join. She said she didn't know about that. But she guessed it was true. It would be part of the contract.

He further admitted that he was attempting to get Smith to tell him she knew he was involved with the Union.

Smith testified she spoke to Rodrigues in the breakroom around 3 p.m. According to her, she told him his absenteeism and tardiness had not improved but rather seemed to be getting worse, insofar as she would tell, that they could not use employees like that at Mariposa Press and she could have to let him go. She further told him his general work habits and productivity were not good enough. He said, "I think you're right and besides I'm already getting another job." He said he was going to get some other kind of job with some electronic place or something like that. She does not recall if he gave her a reason for being late that day nor does she recall whether he said anything about taking the wrong bus or missing the bus.

Smith further testified that her statement to Rodrigues with regard to his work performance referred to him being very slow and very erratic in his work habits. For example, when he swept between the double doors near the courtyard it would take a half-hour rather than the 5 minutes it should require. Part of the press crew is stationed on that side and he would yell back and forth to them. He was supposed to work until 5:30 but he did not accomplish very much after 5 p.m. when the other employees' shift ended. As other employees walked through the area to leave, he talked to them and worked very slowly so he could maintain a conversation. Further, he was always going from one thing to the other very quickly without finishing jobs. He still was not keeping the courtyard area clean nor was he keeping the pallets stacked properly or strapping the boxes tightly enough. Also, he was continually leaving baskets full of paper, etc., in the aisle.

Based on the above, Respondent contends that Rodrigues' discharge was justified. However, the critical question is not simply whether his discharge may have been justifiable, but rather would he have been discharged absent his union activity. Wright Line, supra. Viewed from this perspective, whether his discharge was justified for legitimate business reasons is only one of the factors to be considered rather than the sole factor. Respondent's rules and procedures provide, inter alia, that "the employee's immediate supervisor must be notified prior to the beginning of a work day of a non-attendance due to sickness or emergency" The rules and procedures contain no provision as to tardiness. As to Respondent's practice, there is no evidence in the record of any employee being discharged because of a tardiness problem.

However, Smith was questioned as to two employees who had an absenteeism problem, Andy Navarro and Derrex Nash. Nash quit his employment and Navarro was discharged.[21] Respondent's records show that Nash overslept and was 2-1/2 hours late on October 1. He did call in that day. He had unexcused absences on October 29 and November 5 for which, according to Smith, he received a verbal warning at least once. However, she placed no written notation of this warning in his file. He was also absent without calling in on November 10 and 11. On either November 11 or November 12 Smith placed a notation on Nash's November 11 daily timesheet, "Paula, please prepare his last check. He will pick it up on Friday." According to Smith, even though she thought Nash was a very good employee and she wanted to keep him she felt that she could not continue to tolerate his poor attendance. She did decide to terminate him on November 11. However, he telephoned and quit before she made out his termination papers. She does not recall whether when she talked to him she told him he was discharged and simply did not write "discharge" on his termination slip.

On October 6, Andy Navarro was not at work and did not call in. On October 8 he was given a written warning for attendance which indicated that he had been given a verbal warning on October 3 and states, "Andy was told that he must call when he cannot come to work. On 10–6–80 he did not call in. This is the second time this has occurred." On November 17 and 18, Navarro was absent and did not call in. On his daily timesheet for November 18 Smith wrote the notation, "Last day." Navarro was also absent on October 7 and November 3. Smith testified that Navarro was a former warehouse supervisor who had lost his job through no fault of his own and had come highly recommended by his previous employer. She considered him a very good worker and did not want to lose him.

Smith further testified that when she is confronted with an employee who is tardy or has unexcused absences, she considers several factors in determining whether she should discipline the employee. She tries to give everyone a chance. For one tardy, she does not get upset at anybody. She does consider though whether the employee is totally unproductive and whether that affects the production of other employees, although, even for a person like that, she does not fire them because they were late or had an unexcused absence for 1 or possibly 2 days. As to Navarro, even though she wanted to keep him, she felt she could not condone his conduct any further without being unfair to other employees. Navarro was still a probationary employee.

Smith testified that during the time Rodrigues was under her supervision she was trying very had to work with him and to motivate him to do a better job. However, she did not seem to be having much success and he probably would have been discharged for incompetence even if there had not existed the attendance problem. She admits that the attendance problem hastened his discharge. She also testified that Rodrigues' poor attendance caused a somewhat greater problem than Navarro's attendance. Navarro worked in the warehouse and there are three or four employees that are basically trained in each aspect of shipping. So if one is absent, his work is just covered by the other employees. On the other hand, Rodrigues was the only person who regularly performed the duties assigned to him. If he was absent, part of his work could be covered with little difficulty, but with the press running the press area gets bogged down with papers which is the reason Respondent has a special person just for that job. If Rodrigues was not there, Smith would have to assign someone else to the job and go through a short training session with them to show them where to put the different papers.

[21] Smith testified that she has discharged four employees—Rodrigues, Navarro, Teresa Allen, and Thomas Hendry. Both Allen and Hendry were discharged for poor productivity.

2. Conclusions

The General Counsel argues that "based upon the animus displayed by Respondent's active anti-union campaign and other unlawful actions, the timing of Rodrigues' discharge just prior to the election, his known position as an employee organizer and the weak, inapposite reason precipitating his discharge, the General Counsel has established a prima facie case in support of Rodrigues' unlawful termination." The General Counsel further argues that Respondent has failed to rebut this prima facie case inasmuch as his attendance and tardiness allegedly precipitated his discharge and the evidence shows disparate treatment of Rodrigues as to absenteeism and tardiness.

I agree that, based on the general animus displayed by Respondent, the unfair labor practices I have found above, the timing of the discharge, Rodrigues' status as the sole known employee organizer remaining in Respondent's employ is sufficient to establish a prima facie case of unlawful discharge. However, I do not agree that Respondent had engaged in disparate treatment of Rodrigues as to his attendance. The General Counsel's contention as to disparate treatment seems to be based on the argument that absenteeism is somehow more egregious than tardiness and that the improvement in Rodrigues' attendance between October 8 and November 6 was not given the consideration that it should have been given.

This argument is not persuasive. Unannounced tardiness can be just as disruptive as unannounced absenteeism for an employer has no way of knowing whether or not the employee plans to report to work, and may be required to make arrangements to cover the employee's work load just as would be necessary if the employee remained absent for the entire shift. Further, it is not unreasonable for an employer to conclude that any previous "improvement" in his attendance was negated by his unannounced absence on November 6 and his tardiness of 1-1/2 hours on Monday, November 10, particularly since Smith had warned him on the previous Friday that she could not tolerate much more of his poor attendance. In the circumstances, I do not find that the attendance record of Nash and Navarro were significantly worse than that of Rodrigues. I credit Smith that she had decided to terminate Nash.

Rodrigues does not deny Smith's testimony as to his work performance, or that he received the counseling and warnings described by Smith. No inference can be drawn from her failure to discharge him earlier because of his poor work performance since he had worked under her supervision only since around the first of September. I credit Smith that she decided to discharge Rodrigues because of his poor work performance coupled with his poor attendance record. In this regard, I note that she has discharged other employees for poor productivity and, as noted above, for poor attendance. I further note that notwithstanding that Rodrigues was tardy for one-half hour to 1-1/2 hours on 4 days and 10 and 15 minutes on 2 days within a period of 1 week, and that this record was established within the 2 weeks following Respondent's notification that he was one of four employee organizers for the Union and during the period of time when the other three employee organizers were discharged, Rodrigues was not discharged in October. Such forbearance does not appear to be the conduct of an employer bent on ridding itself of a union activist.

In all of the circumstances, I find that Respondent has demonstrated that Rodrigues would have been discharged in the absence of any union activity. Accordingly, I find that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Rodrigues.

G. The Alleged Refusal to Bargain

1. The unit

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the appropriate unit is:

> All regular part-time and full-time production and maintenance employees of Respondent at its Concord, California location, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The General Counsel contends that, during the period September 30 until October 15, the Union was the majority representative of the employees in the appropriate unit as evidenced by valid authorization cards. Of the nonsupervisory employees who performed unit work, only two—Karrie Vaught and Becky Steiner—are in dispute as to their inclusion in the unit during their term of employment. The General Counsel contends that Steiner and Vaught are casual employees who should be excluded from the appropriate unit and Respondent contends that they are regular part-time employees who should be included in the unit. Both of them are classified as "on-call" employees who are paid a special "on-call" rate of $4 an hour. As on-call employees, they are offered work whenever there is work available and they can either accept or decline. During 1980 Steiner, who was hired in 1979, only worked 2 days—8-1/4 hours on September 2 and 6-1/4 hours on September 25.

Karrie Vaught, a high school student whose mother is regularly employed by Respondent, worked on the day of the election and worked prior to the election in 1980 as follows:

September 2	8.5 hours
September 25	7.9 hours
September 27	8 hours
October 25	8 hours
November 8	8 hours
November 11	5 hours
November 15	8 hours
November 22	8 hours
November 26	9 hours

Whether students are included in a bargaining unit with other employees depends upon certain factors which the Board has set forth in Shady Oaks, 229 NLRB 54, 54–55 (1977), as follows:

> At least with respect to the commercial sector, the Board has traditionally included part-time students in units of full-time and regular part-time employees where the students have a substantial and continuing interest in the wages, hours, and working conditions of the other unit employees. In determining whether students have the requisite community of interest with other unit employees, the Board conducts an analysis along the same lines that it normally employs when determining "regular part-time" status. Under this analysis, the Board takes into consideration such things as: (1) regularity and continuity of employment; (2) tenure of employment; (3) similarity of work duties; and (4) similarity of wages, benefits, and other workings conditions. [Footnote omitted.]
> Where students' employment is shown to be sporadic, temporary, or seasonal in nature or where it is shown that students are treated differently with respect to wages, benefits, and other working conditions, the Board excludes them from the regular full-time unit. [Footnote omitted.]
> Where, on the other hand, students' employment is regular and of substantial duration and the students are treated the same as other unit employees, the Board includes them in the unit. [Footnote omitted.]

Here, although Steiner, who is not a student, and Vaught work under the same supervision as unit employees, presumably doing unit work, they are paid a special rate of pay and they work on an irregular basis at their convenience. In these circumstances, I find that they should be excluded from the unit.

2. Alleged majority status

As of October 1, the Union had signed authorization cards from 15 of the unit employees and, by October 6, it had obtained authorization cards from 3 additional employees. Respondent disputes the validity of the cards signed by Ken Thorsen, David Gonderman, Wayne Lowe, Gary Marin, Derrex Nash, Marc Elliot, and Michael Foltz. The basis for Respondent's position as to these disputed cards is that the solicitors—Ziolkowski and/or Schwarz—only told card signers that the cards were to get an election and failed to inform them that the cards designated the Union as their bargaining representative. Respondent argues that this was deliberate concealment and that such "misrepresentation" can be cured only if the employees read the cards, a fact which Respondent contends was not affirmatively established on the record. Additionally, Respondent argues that Foltz' authorization card should not be counted because he was "obviously misled" as to the purpose of the card;[22] and that the cards of David Gonderman, Thorsen, and Lowe should not be counted because they were under the influence of alcohol.

I find no merit in these arguments. Respondent misstates the law. However, even assuming, arguendo, there exists some requirement, in the circumstances, that it be affirmatively established on the record the authorization cards were read by the card signers, the facts do not support Respondent's position. The wording of the cards is as follows:

AUTHORIZATION FOR REPRESENTATION
LOCAL UNION NO. 14 SUBORDINATE TO THE INTERNATIONAL PRINTING AND GRAPHIC COMMUNICATIONS UNION
AFL–CIO–CLC

Gentlemen:

I, _____, hereby make application to your organization, and designate and delegate the officers of this Union as my chosen representatives for the purpose of negotiating wages, hours and working conditions.

My address is _____ City _____ Zone _____
Telephone No. _____
I am employed at _____ (Job Title) _____
I am receiving $_____ per hour
Shift _____ Dept. _____
Signed _____

The blanks on the cards in question were filled in[23] and the designation is in close proximity thereto. Thus it is apparent that the card signers must have read the cards.

As to Lowe, Thorsen, and David Gonderman, Gonderman admits that he had read the card earlier. Lowe testified that he read the card before he signed it[24] and neither he nor Thorsen claim that, at the time they signed their cards, they were incapacitated by alcohol. The only evidence as to intoxication comes from Gonderman. He testified that he was not intoxicated but he thinks that Lowe was. I find this insufficient to establish that any one of them was incapable of understanding the purpose of the card as set forth on its face. As to Foltz, he testified that he read the card prior to signing it and that the solicitor told him the card was to help bring a union into Respondent's facility.

[22] This is abused on Foltz' alleged statement on October 17 that he did not know the card designated the Union as his collective-bargaining representative, but rather thought the card was just to have an election.

[23] The card signed by David Gonderman is undated. However, the evidence establishes that the card was signed on September 22.

[24] Additionally, I credit Ziolkowski and Gonzales, another union representative, that Ziolkowski also explained the representational purpose of the cards.

It is well established that if an authorization card is unambiguous—i.e., states on its face that the signer authorizes the union to represent the employee for collective-bargaining purposes and does not speak of an election—it will be counted in the determination of majority status unless it is proved that the employee was told the card was to be used solely for the purpose of obtaining an election. Such explicit and unambiguous designation is not negated by statements by the solicitor to the effect that (1) the cards would be used to get an election; (2) the signer had a right to vote either way, even though he or she signed the card; or (3) the card would be kept secret and not shown to anyone except to the Board in order to get an election. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969); Walgreen Co., 221 NLRB 1096 (1975); Levi Strauss & Co., 172 NLRB 732 (1968) General Steel Products, 157 NLRB 636, 634–648 (1966); Cumberland Shoe Corp., 144 NLRB 1268 (1963).

As stated by the Supreme Court in Gissel:

> [E]mployees should be bound by the clear language of what they sign unless that language is deliberately and clearly canceled by a union adherent with words calculated to direct the signer to disregard and forget the language above his signature. There is nothing inconsistent in handing an employee a card that says the signer authorizes the union to represent him and then telling him that the card will probably be used first to get an election. Elections have been, after all, and will continue to be, held in the vast majority of cases; the union will still have to have the signatures of 30% of the employees when an employer rejects a bargaining demand and insists that the union seek an election. We cannot agree with the employers here that employees as a rule are too unsophisticated to be bound by what they sign unless expressly told that their act of signing represents something else. [395 U.S. at 606–607.]

Thus, neither the facts nor the law support Respondent's position.

Based on a full consideration of the evidence and of the arguments advanced by Respondent, I find that the authorization cards herein are unambiguous and that the evidence does not establish that the designation clearly stated thereon was negated by any statements of the solicitors. I further find that, by October 1, the Union had received valid signed authorization cards from 15 of the 27[25] employees in the appropriate unit and that it maintained its majority status through October 12. On October 7, the date Respondent received the Union's demand for recognition, the Union had valid signed authorization cards from 14 of the 24 unit employees.

[25] Kathy Seybolt's hire date is incorrectly set forth on the stipulated lists of employees. Other evidence establishes that she was hired in 1979.

3. The appropriateness of a bargaining order

The complaint alleges that, by its unlawful conduct set forth above, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. The General Counsel argues that Respondent's conduct was calculated to, and did, undermine the Union's majority.[26] The record establishes that, by October 1, the Union had secured authorization cards from a majority of the unit employees and had notified Respondent as to the identity of employee organizers. Respondent responded with its October 3 letter to employees acknowledging that it was aware of the Union organizational efforts. The letter further announced, for the first time, an "open door" policy whereby employees could bring their problems directly to Respondent's president and other agents, thus obviating any necessity for union representation.

On October 15, Ron Murphee was unlawfully promoted to full-time status with the accompanying wage increase and grant of benefits; on October 17 Ed Rodrigues and Kathy Seybolt were unlawfully granted wage increases. On October 17 and November 24, in speeches to employees, Respondent's president continued to urge employees to take advantage of the "open door" policy and deal directly with Respondent. During the October 17 and/or November 24 meetings and certain of its campaign letters to employees, Respondent solicited grievances from employees and unlawfully promised to correct any inequities found, including a promise to consider establishing a dental plan in the future; threatened employees with loss of employment; and induced employees to revoke their union authorization cards.

Thus, Respondent, while refusing to recognize the Union as the majority representative of its employees, engaged in a course of unlawful conduct designed to induce employees to withdraw their support from the Union and to convince them that their grievances would be redressed through direct dealing with Respondent and that union representation would be of no advantage to them. This conduct, particularly where, as here, it is directed toward a small unit, directly inhibits activity in support of the Union, and the threat of loss of employment strikes at the very heart of one of the principal reasons employees are apt to seek union representation—job security. Such conduct is likely to have had a significant impact on the employees' freedom of choice rendering the election an inaccurate register of employee desire as to union representation.

Further, the nature and extent of Respondent's unfair labor practices make it unlikely that their effects can be expunged by traditional Board remedies. I therefore conclude that Respondent's conduct has undermined the Union's majority and rendered doubtful or impossible the holding of a free and fair second election and that the employees' sentiment, once expressed through authorization cards, would, on balance, be better protected by the issuance of a bargaining order than by traditional remedies. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969); El Rancho Market, 235 NLRB 468 (1978).

In these circumstances, I find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the majority representative of its employees while coterminously engaging in conduct which undermined the Union's majority status and prevented the holding of a fair election. Trading Post, Inc., 219 NLRB 298 (1975).

IV. THE REPRESENTATION CASE

A. The Challenges

The challenged ballots involved herein were cast by James McCain, Kathy Smith, Edward Rodrigues, Allen Schwarz, Robert Sterling, Becky Steiner, and Karrie Vaught. The sole issue as to McCain and Smith is their supervisory status. Inasmuch as the parties stipulated, and the record establishes, that Both McCain and Smith are supervisors within the meaning of the Act, I shall recommend that the challenges to their ballots be sustained. I shall also recommend that the challenge to the ballot of Robert Sterling be sustained inasmuch as I have granted the motion of General Counsel to withdraw the allegations of the complaint relating to his discharge. As to Rodrigues, Schwarz, Steiner, and Vaught, I have found above that the discharges of Rodrigues and Schwarz were not violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, and that Steiner and Vaught should be excluded from the unit. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the challenges to their ballots be sustained.

B. The Objections

As set forth above, the Union filed timely objections to the election. These objections are as follows:

> I. The Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act.
> II. The Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act.
> III. The Employer violated Section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act.
> IV. The Employer granted Employees fringe benefits in order to discourage their Union activities.
> V. The Employer promised Employees fringe benefits in order to undermine their support for the Union.
> . . . .
> VII. The Employer made substantial misrepresentations of fact and law regarding the Union at a time when the Union was unable to respond to those misrepresentations.
> VIII. The Employer unlawfully terminated Employees in order to undermine the Employees' support of the Union.
> . . . .
> X. The Employer unlawfully interrogated Employees regarding their support for the Union.
> XI. The Employer unlawfully threatened Employees because of their support for the Union.

The critical period is from October 6, 1980, the date the petition was filed, to November 26, 1980, the date of the election. Ideal Electric & Mfg. Co., 134 NLRB 1275 (1961).

With the exception of Objection VII, these objections are based on the same conduct alleged in the complaint. Objection VII is based on Respondent's alleged misrepresentations as to wage rates if the employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. The specific conduct involved concerns the statements made by Goldman at the Monday, November 24, meeting that most of its employees were apprentices or trainees; under the Union's contracts, a certain number of years of working as an apprentice or trainee is required before one becomes a journeyman; and, in this interim, these employees would receive only a graduated percentage of journeyman wages. Earlier, by individual letters mailed to employees on Thursday, November 20, Respondent made this same point on an individualized basis.

Thus, the letter to each individual employee contained a comparison of the employee's current wage rate to what the employee's wage rate would be if this graduated percentage was applied to the applicable wage rate set forth in a wage schedule posted on the bulletin board in Respondent's facility. In some instances, this adjusted rate was less than the employee's current wage rate and, for some, it was even less than minimum wage. Respondent does not claim it knew the source of the posted wage schedule and Homes testified that he assumed the schedule had been posted by someone connected with the Union. Homes admits he did not attempt to ascertain the specific contract from which the posted schedule was taken, even though Respondent was a member of the Printing Industries of Northern California[27] and presumably had access to those contracts with which the organization was concerned.

Union Representative Ziolkowski testified that the posted wage schedule was taken from the Union's industrial contract which is executed by a number of small employers in the area and covers press and prepress employees as well as other employees, including bindery employees. This contract sets forth a progressive wage rate for "Pre-Press and Press" employees and also for "Assignments other than pre-press and press." The graduated percentages set forth in this contract for the latter are as follows:

Assignments other than pre-press and press

Up to 6 months experience	80% of appropriate rate
Up to 12 months experience	90% of approporiate rate
Up to 18 months experience	95% of appropriate rate
Up to 24 months experience	100% of appropriate rate

[27] This is an organization of employers in the printing industry. At least one of the contracts in Respondent's possession was negotiated by this organization. It is unclear whether the industrial contract was also negotiated by the organization.

The graduated percentage scale utilized by Respondent came from a contract which covers only prepress and press employees and which provides for wage rates for such employees which are substantially higher than those in the industrial contract.

The effect of Respondent's conduct is illustrated by the information given Annie Llamas, an employee with almost 14 months' seniority whose job duties, according to Homes, would place her in the classification of specialty worker. She was sent the following information:

November 20, 1980

Name: ANNIE LLAMAS
Curent Rate: $4.50
Posted Rate: $3.20

Note: The posted rate is for SPECIALTY WORKER adjusted by 66% for your length of service.

If the 95-percentage from the appropriate contract had been applied, the posted rate would have been $4.61 as compared to her current rate of $4.50. Thus, Respondent has clearly made misrepresentations.

The Board's policy as to the effect of a misrepresentation on an election is articulared in Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 NLRB 221, 224 as follows:[28]

> [A]n election should be set aside only where there has been a misrepresentation or other similar campaign trickery, which involves a substantial departure from the truth, at a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply, so that the misrepresentation, whether deliberate or not, may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the election. [Footnote omitted.]

Since the misrepresentations herein concern wage rates, a matter of utmost concern to employees, I find them to be substantial and ones which, if not rebutted, would be likely to have a significant impact on the election. See Information Magnetics Corp., 227 NLRB 1493 (1977). In reaching this latter conclusion, I have fully considered the possibility that the interchange during one of the November 24 meetings, regarding the adjusted rate shown for some employees being below the minimum wage, could have been sufficient to put the employees present on notice that Respondent was distorting the facts. However, this session was attended by less than half of the employees, whereas Respondent had sent the misleading information to each individual employee and later reinforced it through the November 24 speeches, illustrating the point with visual aids.

I find that, based on the manner in which wage comparisons were made for each individual employee, the employees could reasonably conclude that Respondent was not engaged in idle generalization, but rather had carefully gathered the relevant facts for this presentation. In these circumstances, I find the employees could reasonably conclude that the information was obtained from a union contract and was somewhat authoritative. I further find that, even though Goldman disavowed any intent to indicate what their wages would be with union representation, the employees could reasonably expect that this information reflected the Union's "track record" as to wages it had secured for represented employees performing work similar to that performed by unit employees.

The remaining question is whether the timing of Respondent's misrepresentations afforded the Union sufficient opportunity to make an effective reply. Ziolkowski contends that it did not. He creditably testified that he first learned of the meeting on the evening of November 24 when he spoke to Llamas on the telephone. However, her account of what transpired there did not reflect that Respondent had made material misrepresentation, and he did not receive a copy of the November 20 letter until November 25. Thus, it was during a meeting with employees on the evening of Tuesday, November 25, the night before the election, that he first learned of the misrepresentation. Only a few employees attended this meeting and, according to Ziolkowski, he did not thereafter have sufficient time to prepare a reply and have it reproduced prior to the election which was held on Wednesday, November 26. On election day, the employees commenced work between 7 and 8 a.m. and the election was held from 11:45 a.m. to 1:15 p.m. I therefore recommend that Objection VIII be sustained.

The remaining objections are based on the same conduct as are the allegations of the complaint which I have considered above. Since I have found that Respondent did not unlawfully terminate or interrogate employees, I shall recommend that Objections II, VIII, and X be overruled. However, I have found that, during the critical period herein, Respondent, by the conduct alleged in Objections I, IV, V, and XI, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, thereby undermining the Union's majority and preventing the holding of a fair election, while coterminously refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as alleged in Objection III. Accordingly, I shall recommend that Objections I, III, IV, V, and XI be sustained.

As I have found that said unlawful conduct interfered with the employees' exercise of a free and untrammeled choice in the election held on November 26, 1980, undermined the Union's majority, rendered doubtful or imposible the holding of a free and fair second election, I shall recommend that the said election be set aside and the petition in Case 31-RC-1175 be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. On October 1, 1980, the Union was designated as the majority representative for purposes of collective bargaining of Respondent's employees in the unit described as follows:

[28] This policy was abandoned in Shopping Kart Food Market, 228 NLRB 1311 (1977), but after a brief period was adopted in General Knit of California, 239 NLRB 619 (1978).

All regular part-time and full-time production and maintenance employees of Respondent at its Concord, California location, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The aforesaid unit is a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Commencing about October 7, 1980, the Union has requested, and is requesting, Respondent to bargain collectively with it as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

5. By refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the majority representative of its employees while coterminously engaging in conduct which undermined the Union's majority status and prevented the holding of a fair election, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting grievances from employees and implicitly promising to correct any inequities found; by threatening employees with loss of employment if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative; by inducing employees to revoke their union authorization cards; and by transferring an employee to full-time status with accompanying benefits and wage increase; and by granting certain other employee wage increases in order to induce them to withdraw or withhold their support from the Union.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

8. Respondent has not engaged in the other unfair labor practices alleged in the amended consolidated complaint herein.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 23 September 1982 Administrative Law Judge Joel P. Biblowitz issued the attached decision. Respondent Fugazy Continental Corporation of Connecticut (Fugazy) filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[2] Respondents Holland Industries, Inc. (Holland Industries) and Shortway Lines, Inc. (Shortway Lines) filed joint exceptions, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief.[3]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[4] findings,[5] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Orders to the extent consistent herewith.

1. The judge concluded that Respondents Holland Industries, Dell Bus Company, Inc. (Dell Bus),[6] Maintenance and Manpower, Inc. (Maintenance and Manpower), Shortway Lines, and Shortway Charter Corporation (Shortway Charter) were the alter egos of, and engaged in a single integrated business enterprise with, Respondent Airport Bus Service, Inc., Debtor-in-Possession (Airport Bus) at the time that the unfair labor practices found herein were committed. We have carefully reviewed, and hereby affirm, the judge's factual findings. We adopt, however, his alter ego and single integrated business enterprise conclusions only as clarified below.

It is well established that in determining whether two or more nominally separate businesses operating simultaneously are sufficiently interrelated so that they may be treated as a single integrated business enterprise, the Board looks to four principal factors: common management, centralized control of labor relations, interrelation of operations, and common ownership or financial control. No single criterion is controlling, although the first three factors, which reveal the degree of operational integration, are more critical than common ownership. Radio Union v. Broadcast Service, 380 U.S. 255 (1965); Bryar Construction Co., 240 NLRB 102, 104 (1979). Similarly, in making the related, but nevertheless distinct, determination of whether a business is the alter ego or "disguised continuance" of its predecessor, the Board will find alter ego status where the record demonstrates "substantially identical" management, business purpose, operation, equipment, supervision, customers, and ownership between the two businesses. Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees, 417 U.S. 249, 259 fn. 5 (1974); Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976).

[1] The name of this Respondent appears as corrected at the hearing.

[2] Fugazy also requested oral argument. This request is hereby denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and positions of the parties.

[3] The General Counsel's motion to strike Respondents' exceptions and Fugazy's supporting brief for failure to comply with the provisions of the Board's Rules and Regulations is denied.

[4] At the hearing, the judge granted the General Counsel's motion to consolidate the unfair labor practice proceedings in Cases 29–CA–6185, 29–CA–6251 and 29–CA–7174 with the backpay specification in Cases 29–CA–5134 and 29–CA–5148. Fugazy excepts to this ruling, arguing that the consolidation was an attempt to taint the present proceedings against Respondent Airport Bus Service, Inc., Debtor-in-Possession by revealing that Airport Bus was found to have violated the Act in Cases 29–CA–5134 and 29–CA–5148. We find no merit in this exception. It is apparent that the judge's unfair labor practice findings herein do not rely in any way on the earlier proceeding against Airport Bus. In addition, we find that consolidation was an appropriate conservation of Board resources since both cases involved Respondent Fugazy's alleged responsibility, as a successor, to remedy unfair labor practices committed by Airport Bus.

[5] Fugazy, Holland Industries, and Shortway Lines have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[6] The judge found, and we agree, that Respondent Cross County Coach Corporation (Cross County) was part of a single integrated business enterprise with Dell Bus.

At all times material herein Holland Industries owned Shortway Lines,[7] Shortway Charter, and Dell Bus. In addition, it effectively controlled and operated Airport Bus between June 1976 and 24 January 1978, and Maintenance and Manpower at least between October 1977 and October 1978. In October 1977, Airport Bus' operations were combined with those of Dell Bus and Maintenance and Manpower.[8] Although each of the three held itself out as a separate company, they were managed jointly by the same individuals, and they used the same buses,[9] supervisors, dispatchers, drivers, and mechanics.[10]

On 24 January 1978 Airport Bus was adjudicated bankrupt. Thereafter, the same individuals continued the bus operations at the same location under the corporate forms of Maintenance and Manpower, Shortway Charter, and Dell Bus, with the same buses and many of the same employees.

Based on these facts, we find that Holland Industries, Airport Bus, Dell Bus, and Maintenance and Manpower were a single integrated business enterprise (which, for ease of reference, we shall refer to here as Holland New York I) between October 1977 and 24 January 1978. We also find that, subsequent to Airport Bus' bankruptcy adjudication and continuing through the apparent cessation of operations in October 1978, Holland Industries, Shortway Charter, Maintenance and Manpower, and Dell Bus constituted another single integrated business enterprise (denoted hereinafter as Holland New York II). We further find that Holland New York II was the "disguised continuance" or alter ego of Holland New York I. We do not find, however, that Shortway Lines was a constituent company of either Holland New York I or Holland New York II. While it was owned by Holland Industries and it leased buses to Holland New York I and II, Shortway Lines, so far as this record shows, operated a completely separate business in the Midwestern States with its own management and labor relations policies. Accordingly, we find that Holland New York I is responsible for the unfair labor practices committed prior to 25 January 1978, and that Holland New York II is responsible for those unfair labor practices which occurred on or after 24 January 1978, and is responsible, as an alter ego, for those unfair labor practices committed by Holland New York I.

2. The judge found that Fugazy was a successor to the business operation of Airport Bus and its affiliates (that is, Holland New York I and II). Fugazy excepts to this finding, contending, inter alia, that its employee complement did not reflect a majority continuation of its predecessor's work force. We find merit in this exception.

An employer which takes over a business is a "successor" if there is continuity in the employing industry after the change of ownership. Although all the circumstances are considered, the key factor in making a successorship determination is whether a majority of the new employer's bargaining unit employees were members of the predecessor's unit work force at or near the time it ceased operations. NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972); Pacific Hide & Fur Depot v. NLRB, 553 F.2d 609, 612 (9th Cir. 1977); Stewart Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 362 fn. 5 (1982) (employee Woolcott).

On 13 June 1978 Fugazy purchased Airport Bus' ICC authority and the "airline crew" portion of Holland New York II's business and leased a part of Holland New York II's facility. In July Fugazy began operating a bus company, at least partially in competition with Holland New York II, utilizing its own management, buses, employees, supervisors, and dispatchers. On 9 October 1978 Fugazy purchased the charter bus portion of the Holland New York II operation and took over Holland New York II's entire premises. Holland New York II's remaining employees began working for Fugazy.

To establish successorship, the General Counsel must demonstrate that a majority of Fugazy's bargaining unit employees[11] in early July 1978 had been employed in the relevant units by Holland New York II in mid-to-late June and/or that a majority of the bargaining unit employees employed by Fugazy in mid-October 1978 were employed by Holland New York II immediately before its cessation of operations. We find that the General Counsel has not met his burden of proof.

Holland New York II's payroll records were unavailable, and the General Counsel, therefore, appropriately attempted to use secondary evidence to establish the identity of Holland New York II's employees in the relevant units. Unfortunately, much of this evidence is of little probative value. Thus, the General Counsel introduced into the record the payroll records for Airport Bus, union authorization cards signed by Holland New York I and II

[7] Shortway Lines was a bus company operating in Ohio and other midwestern States.

[8] These operations included regular charter bus service sold on a trip-by-trip basis and "airline crew work," that is, transporting airline crews under contract between JFK Airport and hotels.

[9] Some of the buses used were owned by Shortway Lines and apparently leased through Holland Industries to Airport Bus.

[10] It appears from the record that another corporation, JFK Parking Lot No. 7, Inc. was also part of this operation. We make no finding with regard to its status because it was not named as a respondent herein.

[11] The units involved herein are: (1) all full-time and part-time drivers and (2) all mechanics and helpers.

employees in the winter and early spring of 1978, and the testimony of four employees. Employee Gonzales named 12 individuals who had worked for Shortway Charter in June 1978 and who subsequently worked for Fugazy. Employee Beckles named approximately 34 employees who had worked for Shortway Charter both before and after Fugazy began using part of the Holland New York II facility in June and July 1978 and, in passing, noted that about 10 of these individuals subsequently worked for Fugazy. Employee Gibson testified regarding approximately 18 employees who worked for Holland New York II during the spring of 1978. Only the testimony of employee Goza, in which he named 16 Shortway Charter drivers who transferred directly to the Fugazy payroll in mid-October, is probative. The Fugazy payrolls for the periods 9–22 October 1978 list 48 drivers and 11 mechanics or cleaners.

Based on the above, we find insufficient evidence of work force continuity to establish successorship. In addition, there is no evidence that any of Fugazy's mechanics and helpers in mid-October 1978 had been recent Holland New York II employees. Also, the record affirmatively establishes only that 15[12] of 48 Fugazy drivers in mid-October 1978 were carryovers from Holland New York II's operation. Therefore, we find that Fugazy was not a successor to Holland New York II, and is not responsible for its predecessor's unfair labor practices.[13]

3. The judge found that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by conditioning the continued employment of unit employees upon two conditions: (1) their accepting wages and working conditions other than those provided in the then-current contract between Airport Bus and Teamsters Local 875 and (2) their willingness to relinquish union representation. The judge further found that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by withdrawing recognition from Local 875, abrogating the contracts, and unilaterally altering terms and conditions of employment. The Respondents except to these findings, asserting that the adjudication of Airport Bus as a bankrupt extinguished, by law, the collective-bargaining agreement between Airport Bus and Local 875. We find no merit in this exception.[14]

In light of the complete integration of the Holland New York I operation which we have found supra, we find that, subsequent to October 1977, the appropriate bargaining units were one of all drivers and one of all mechanics and helpers employed by Holland New York I and that Airport Bus' collective-bargaining agreements covered these units. South Prairie Construction Co. v. Operating Engineers Local 627, 425 U.S. 800 (1976); Land Equipment Inc., 248 NLRB 685, 688 (1980), Safety Electric Corp., 239 NLRB 40, 43 (1978). As the alter ego of Holland New York I, Holland New York II was obligated to continue to recognize Local 875 and to observe the collective-bargaining agreements.

The judge declined to compel the General Counsel to name Airport Bus' Trustee-in-Bankruptcy as a necessary party to these proceedings. In addition, it appears that the General Counsel may not have filed timely proofs of claims against Airport Bus' bankrupt estate. The Respondents contend that these failures constitute procedural irregularities warranting dismissal of the complaint. We find no merit in these contentions.

The record reveals that, on Airport Bus' bankruptcy adjudication, the Trustee ceased Airport Bus' participation in the Holland New York I operation, proceeded to liquidate its estate, and was not involved in the commission of the unfair labor practices found herein. We also note that, under the Bankruptcy Rule, a creditor who wishes to collect against a bankrupcy estate must file a timely proof of claim with the bankruptcy court. We do not see how the absence of either the Trustee as a party or of timely proofs of claims can impede our authority to adjudicate the unfair labor practice issues herein.[15]

AMENDED REMEDY

Because it appears from the record that Holland New York II ceased operations at least for some time period beginning in October 1978, we shall [12] The name of 1 of the 16 drivers identified by Goza does not appear on Fugazy's payroll.

[13] For the reasons stated by the judge, Member Zimmerman would find that Fugazy was a successor to Holland New York II and is therefore responsible for the latter's unfair labor practices. Accordingly, he dissents from the reversal of the judge's findings concerning Fugazy.

[14] We have duly considered the issues raised by the debtor-in-possession status and bankruptcy adjudication of Airport Bus in light of NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 104 S.Ct. 1188 (1984). On 29 November 1976 Airport Bus filed for debtor-in-possession status under Chapter 11. Subsequently, Airport Bus, as debtor-in-possession, was authorized to continue its business operations. On 29 December 1976 Airport Bus entered into two 3-year collective-bargaining agreements with Local 875 covering Airport Bus drivers and mechanics. Airport Bus was adjudicated a Chapter 10 bankrupt on 24 January 1978. There is no showing that during its term as debtor-in-possession Airport Bus sought to modify or reject the terms of its 29 December contracts. There is also no showing that the bankruptcy trustee or bankruptcy court disaffirmed these contracts following Airport Bus' adjudication as a Chapter 10 bankrupt. In comparison, Bildisco involved a company which, as a debtor-in-possession under Chapter 11, rejected, with court approval, a collective-bargaining agreement signed prior to its filing as a Chapter 11 debtor-in-possession. Accordingly, we find that Bildisco is inapplicable to the facts of this case.

[15] At most, these failures may diminish the Board's remedial opportunities against one of these Respondents. We leave to the bankruptcy court the determination of the effects of these failures, if any, under the bankruptcy laws.

order that the notice be mailed to the employees employed by Holland New York I and II during the time the unfair labor practices found herein occurred. Cerro CATV Devices, 237 NLRB 1153 (1978).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondents are each employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Locals 522, 819, and 875, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, are each labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Between October 1977 and 24 January 1978, Holland Industries, Airport Bus, Dell Bus, and Maintenance and Manpower constituted a single integrated business enterprise, known herein as Holland New York I.

4. Between 24 January 1978 and 9 October 1978, Holland Industries, Dell Bus, Shortway Chapter, and Maintenance and Manpower constituted a single integrated business enterprise, known herein as Holland New York II.

5. Holland New York II was the alter ego of Holland New York I.

6. Shortway Lines was not a constituent company in either Holland New York I or II.

7. Fugazy was not a successor to either Holland New York I or II.

8. Holland New York I violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act by:

(a) Assisting Local 522 in obtaining signed authorization cards from its employees.

(b) Executing a collective-bargaining agreement, dated 16 January 1978, with Local 522 at a time when Local 522 did not represent an uncoerced majority of its employees.

9. Holland New York II violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) by assisting Local 522 in obtaining signed authorization cards from its employees.

10. Holland New York I violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by executing a collective-bargaining agreement, dated 16 January 1978, with Local 522 which contained a union-security clause requiring membership in Local 522 as a condition of employment.

11. Holland New York II violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by conditioning the continued employment of its employees upon (a) their accepting wages and terms and conditions of employment other than those provided by the 29 December 1976 collective-bargaining agreements between Airport Bus and Local 875, and (b) their relinquishing their right to union representation.

12. Holland New York II violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing and refusing to continue to recognize and bargain with Local 875 on and after 24 January 1978; by refusing to enforce the terms and conditions of employment contained in the 29 December 1976 collective-bargaining agreements between Airport Bus and Local 875; and by unilaterally changing the terms and conditions of employment of the employees covered by these agreements.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that, in Cases 29–CA–6185, 29–CA–6251, and 29–CA–7174, Respondents Holland Industries Inc., Toledo, Ohio; Airport Bus Services, Inc., Debtor-In-Possession, New York, New York; Dell Bus Company, Inc., New York, New York; Maintenance and Manpower Inc., New York, New York; Cross County Coach Corporation, New York, New York; and Shortway Bus Charter Corporation, New York, New York; their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the following action.

1. Respondents Holland Industries, Airport Bus, Dell Bus, Maintenance and Manpower, and Cross County shall cease and desist from:

(a) Assisting Local 522, or any other labor organization, in obtaining signed authorized cards for said labor organizations.

(b) Entering into a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 522, or any other labor organization, at a time when said labor organization does not represent an uncoerced majority of the employees in an appropriate unit.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Respondents Holland Industries, Shortway Charter, Maintenance and Manpower, and Cross County shall cease and desist from

(a) Assisting Local 522, or any other labor organization, in obtaining signed authorization cards for said labor organizations.

(b) Conditioning the continued employment of employees on their acceptance of wages and terms and conditions of employment other than those contained in the valid collective-bargaining agreement covering their bargaining unit.

(c) Conditioning the continued employment of employees on their relinquishment of the right to be represented by a labor organization.

(d) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

3. Respondents Holland Industries, Dell Bus, Shortway Charter, Maintenance and Manpower, and Cross County shall take the following affirmative actions to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to all employees (as listed in the judge's Appendix A) who refused to accept employment at terms and conditions less than that provided for in the collective-bargaining agreements dated 26 December 1976 between Local 875 and Airport Bus and/or who refused to accept employment without representation by a labor organization, full and immediate reinstatement to their former jobs or, if these jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of pay suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the section of the judge's decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Make whole, with interest, each of the employees who, on or after 24 January 1978, accepted employment with any of the Holland New York II Respondents for the difference between their rate of pay and other terms and conditions of employment and what their rate of pay and other terms and conditions of employment properly were, as set forth in the collective-bargaining agreements dated 29 December 1976 between Airport Bus and Local 875.

(c) Reimburse all employees for dues and other moneys deducted from their pay, or paid directly to Local 522, under, or in consequence of, the collective-bargaining agreement, dated 16 January 1978, between Respondent Maintenance and Manpower and Local 522.

(d) Preserve and make available to the Board or its agents, on request, payroll and other records necessary to determine the amount due under paragraphs (a), (b), and (c), above.

(e) Post at their principal offices copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[16] In addition, mail a copy of said notice to each employee who was on any of their payrolls during the period 10 January 1978 through 9 October 1978. The notices shall be mailed to the last known address for each employee. Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted and mailed by the Respondents immediately upon receipt. The posted notices shall be maintained by Respondents for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the posted notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondents have taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the consolidated amended complaint be dismissed with respect to the allegations not specifically found herein to be violative of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that, in Cases 29–CA–5134 and 29–CA–5148, the Respondents, Clayton Wynn d/b/a Wynn V.I.P. Limousine Service, New York, New York, and Airport Bus Service, Inc., New York, New York, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

APPENDIX B

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT assist Local 522, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 522), or any other labor organization, in obtaining signed authorization cards from our employees.

WE WILL NOT enter into a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 522, or any other labor organization, at a time when said labor organization does not represent an uncoerced majority of our employees.

WE WILL NOT condition the continued employment of our employees on their acceptance of wages and terms and conditions of employment which are other than those contained in the valid collective-bargaining agreement covering their bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT condition the continued employment of our employees on their relinquishment of the right to be represented by a labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

[16] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

WE WILL reimburse, with interest, all our employees who had their union dues deducted from their pay, or paid directly to Local 522, under, or in consequence of, the collective-bargaining agreement between Maintenance and Manpower, Inc. and Local 522, dated 16 January 1978.

WE WILL offer to all employees, who refused to accept employment at terms and conditions other than those provided for in the collective-bargaining agreements, dated December 29, 1976, between Teamsters Local 875 and Airport Bus Service, Inc., and/or who refused to accept employment without representation by a labor organization, full and immediate reinstatement to their former positions or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings they may have suffered because of our discriminatory conduct against them.

WE WILL make whole with interest, each of the employees who, on or after 24 January 1978, accepted employment with any of us for the difference between their rate of pay and other terms and conditions of employment and what their rate of pay and other terms and conditions of employment properly were, as set forth in the collective-bargaining agreements, dated 29 December 1976, between Airport Bus and Local 875.

HOLLAND INDUSTRIES, INC.; AIRPORT BUS SERVICE, INC., DEBTOR-IN-POSSESSION; DELL BUS CO., INC.; MAINTENANCE AND MANPOWER, INC.; CROSS COUNTY COACH CORP.; AND SHORTWAY BUS CHARTER CORP.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL P. BIBLOWITZ, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in Brooklyn, New York, and New York, New York. The hearing opened on September 2, 1980; there were 22 hearing dates and the hearing closed on June 23, 1981.

The Cases Involved Herein

On November 1, 1977, the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued its Order (unpublished) in Cases 29–CA–5134 and 29–CA–5148; that Order adopted the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and directed Respondents Airport Bus Service, Inc. (Airport), and Clayton Wynn, d/b/a Wynn V.I.P. Limousine Service (Wynn), their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, to make Holrick White whole for any loss of earnings suffered by him because of their discrimination against him. On September 15, 1978, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit entered its judgment enforcing in full this Order of the Board. On July 15, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 29 of the Board issued an amended backpay specification and notice of hearing in this matter.

On January 30, 1978, Louis Lyons filed the charge in Case 29–CA–6185 solely against Airport; on February 28, 1978, William Moser filed the charge in Case 29–CA–6251 against "Airport Bus Service, Inc., Bankrupt" "and its successors and alter egos," naming Shortway Charter Bus Service, Inc., Cross County Coach Corp. (Cross County), Dell Transportation Service (Dell Transportation), and Manpower and Maintenance, Inc. On May 31, 1978, an order consolidating cases, complaint, and notice of hearing was issued, naming these employers as the Respondents. After the hearing in this matter was postponed on a number of occasions, Moser filed an additional unfair labor practice charge in Case 29–CA–7174 on May 7, 1979, against Fugazy Continental Corp. of Connecticut (Fugazy of Connecticut). On June 30, 1980, an order consolidating cases, amended complaint, and notice of hearing was issued in the three above-mentioned cases. The Respondents named are Airport and its successors and alter egos Shortway Bus Lines, Inc., Cross County, Dell Transportation, Manpower and Maintenance, Holland Industries, Inc. (Holland), and Fugazy of Connecticut. This consolidated amended complaint also names Local 522, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 522), and Local 819, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 819). The consolidated amended complaint alleges that Shortway Bus Lines, Inc. (Shortway Lines), Cross County, Dell Transportation, Manpower and Maintenance, Holland, and Fugazy of Connecticut are alter egos of, and successors to, Airport, and that Fugazy is the successor of, and alter ego to, Airport, as well as the other named companies; it further alleges that, at all times material since about 1976, Airport and Local 875, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 875), were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement covering Airport's employees, but since about January 24, 1978, the Respondents unilaterally changed the terms and conditions of employment of these employees without notice to Local 875, bargained directly with unit employees, and refused to recognize or bargain with Local 875; and it additionally alleges that on January 24, 1978, the Respondents discharged (and since, have failed to reinstate) numerous employees (some of whom were named in this complaint and others who were named pursuant to a demand for a bill of particulars) because the employees joined and assisted Local 875 and engaged in other protected concerted actions. The consolidated amended complaint further alleges that about January 1978 the Respondents urged their employees to sign cards designating Local 522 as their collective-bargaining representative, and about January 16, 1978, the Respondents and Local 522 executed, and, until June 1978, maintained and enforced a collective-bargaining agreement covering the Respondents' employees, providing, inter alia, that these employees shall become and remain members of Local 522 as a condition of employment; that about June 14, 1978, the Respondents and Local 819 executed, maintained, and enforced a collective-bargaining agreement covering the Respondents' employees, providing, inter alia, that these employees shall become and remain members of Local 819 as a condition of employment; that the Respondents and Local 522 and Local 819 executed and maintained these agreements in effect, notwithstanding the fact that at the time of the execution of the respective agreements, nor at any time thereafter, Local 522 and Local 819 did not represent an uncoerced majority of the employees covered by the agreements, and notwithstanding the fact that the Respondents were under an obligation to continue to recognize and bargain with Local 875. As a conclusion, it is alleged that by these actions the Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), (3), and (5) of the Act. During the hearing, pursuant to a motion to amend the consolidated amended complaint, I issued an Order dated February 12, 1981, wherein certain of the Respondents' names were corrected. Pursuant to that Order, the Respondents are Airport[1] and its Successors and Alter Egos Holland, d/b/a Dell Bus Co., Inc. (Dell Bus), Maintenance and Manpower, Inc. (Maintenance and Manpower), Cross County, Shortway Lines, and Shortway Bus Charter Corp. (Shortway Charter, its wholly owned subsidiaries), and Fugazy of Connecticut. On March 16, 1981, pursuant to a motion to consolidate by the General Counsel, Cases 29–CA–5134 and 29–CA–5148 were consolidated with Cases 29–CA–6185, 29–CA–6251, and 29–CA–7174.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Of the Respondents, only Fugazy of Connecticut, Holland, and Shortway Lines filed answers and appeared at the hearing. Summary judgment was granted as regards the other Respondents.

Airport is a New York State corporation engaged in the business of providing bus transportation services and related services. Prior to October 1977, Airport's office and principal place of business was located at Building 69 at Kennedy Airport (Building 69). In October 1977, Airport moved its office and principal place of business to 114–02 New York Boulevard, in Jamaica, New York (New York Boulevard). The Board, in Cases 29–CA–5134 and 29–CA–5148, has previously asserted jurisdiction over Airport. In addition, Michael Margolis, during much of the period herein the president of Airport, testified that Airport "probably" received revenues in excess of $50,000 (during 1977) for bus trips that originated in New York State and later crossed into a different State.

Dell Bus, Cross County, and Maintenance and Manpower are New York corporations engaged in providing bus transportation services and related services. At all times material herein, and until about November 1978, their principal offices and places of business were located at New York Boulevard, and they have been affiliated businesses with common officers, ownership, directors, and operators and constitute a single integrated business enterprise. During 1978, Dell Bus, Cross County, and Maintenance and Manpower purchased vehicular parts, fuel, and other goods and material valued in excess of $50,000 which were delivered to their places of business directly from points outside New York State.

Shortway Charter is an Ohio corporation engaged in providing bus transportation service and related services. All the stock of Shortway Charter is owned by Holland. At all times material herein it has maintained offices at the New York Boulevard location and at 645 Madison Avenue in the city and State of New York (645 Madison Avenue). During 1978, Shortway Charter purchased vehicular parts, fuel, and other goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were delivered to it directly from places outside the State of New York.

Holland is a New York State Corporation with its principal office located in Toledo, Ohio, and, at times material herein, it has maintained an office at 126 East 35th Street in the city and State of New York. Although Holland itself does not operate buses or employ employees, it acts as a holding company, owning subsidiaries that provide bus transportation service and related services. Holland derives revenues from charges to these subsidaries, and in 1978 and 1979, Holland received revenue in excess of $500,000 in this manner.

Shortway Lines is a subsidiary of Holland. It is an Ohio corporation with its principal office at the same location as Holland in Toledo, Ohio. Shortway Lines is engaged in providing bus transportation and related services mainly in Ohio and other nearby States. During 1980, Shortway Lines received in excess of $50,000 for services performed outside the State of Ohio. Holland and Shortway Lines admit, and I find, that they are each engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

Fugazy of Connecticut is a Connecticut corporation which, since June 1, 1978, has maintained its principal office at 645 Madison Avenue. Since about that time it has been engaged in providing bus transportation and related services. During the past year it purchased vehicular parts, fuel, and other goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which were transported and delivered to it directly from States other than the State in which it is located. Fugazy of Connecticut admits, and I find, that it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.

On the basis of the above, I find that Airport, Dell Bus, Maintenance and Manpower, Cross County, Shortway Charter, Shortway Lines, Holland, and Fugazy of Connecticut are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

The Respondents admit, and I find, that Local 875, Local 522, and Local 819 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] Later amended to read "Airport Bus Service, Inc., Debtor-in-Possession."

III. CREDIBILITY

The individual who maintains a presence throughout this entire commentary is Michael Margolies, who, at the least, held positions of authority with Airport and Holland and, for a time, was employed as a consultant by Fugazy of Connecticut. He was the individual who involved Holland with Airport until Airport was adjudicated as a bankrupt in January 1978. Between that time and June 1978, he was involved, at the same location, in the operation of other Holland enterprises, and later in 1978, after Holland sold its Interstate Commerce Commission rights to Fugazy of Connecticut, for a period of time he was employed by Fugazy as a consultant.

After observing Margolies on the witness stand for a number of days, I have sincere doubts as to his credibility. It was obvious that he and Arthur Wagner, counsel for Holland and Shortway Lines, took this proceeding less than seriously, talking back and forth and laughing while Margolies was on the witness stand. Additionally, it appeared that Margolies testified freely only where he felt it would not assist the General Counsel's case. My observation of Margolies convinces me that it is not the years that have clouded his memory, but rather a convenient loss of memory at certain times. This may have been due to the fact that at the time of the hearing he was still associated with Holland.

One example of Margolies' lack of credibility (in addition to his evasiveness) was his testimony in answer to a series of questions from the General Counsel regarding the tools and equipment in the garage at the New York Boulevard location:

> Q. . . . can I ask him if he was there after the move from Building 69 to New York Boulevard. Were you in the garage after—
> A. I was never in the garage.

Less than a minute later, Margolies was asked:

> Q. You have been in the garage?
>
> A. Certainly.
> Q. Did you say you had never been in the garage?
> A. No. I never said I have never been in the garage. I didn't work in the garage; I couldn't give you an independent verification of the items on there.

Whether this conflict was caused by a deliberate fabrication by Margolies or is just further evidence of his flippant attitude toward these proceedings, it further indicates his overall lack of credibility.

It should also be noted that at the time of the hearing Margolies was no longer employed by Fugazy of Connecticut as a consultant, and, in fact, had sued Fugazy of Connecticut for the alleged breach of this agreement.

I therefore did not find Margolies to be a credible witness for these reasons and others that will appear infra. I therefore have not credited him in many situations where there is conflicting testimony from other, more credible witnesses. At other times I have not fully credited him even where his testimony is uncontradicted, where his testimony appears to be highly unlikely. The credibility of the other witnesses, when necessary, will be discussed separately.

IV. AIRPORT

This tale begins about June 1976 when Holland asked Margolies to investigate the possibility of its purchasing Airport. At that time, and through January 24, 1978, the drivers and mechanics at Airport had been represented by Local 875 under separate collective-bargaining agreements.

Since at least 1976, Airport had been located at Building 69 at Kennedy Airport, which premises it leased from British Airways. During this period, and through January 1978, Airport performed two forms of bus transportation: crew work, for which it contracted with a number of airlines to transport their flight crews between Kennedy Airport and hotels in New York City,[2] and general bus passenger charter work for the public. In addition, to a lesser degree, Airport transported airline passengers between the numerous passenger terminals at Kennedy Airport and between Kennedy Airport and New York City, all pursuant to agreements between it and the airlines.[3] At that time, Airport had approximately 30 vehicles, all buses.

Margolies testified that about June 1976 he was in Toledo, Ohio, performing consulting work for Holland.[4] At that time either Wagner, an officer for Holland and counsel for Holland and Shortway Lines herein, Cappozzi, Holland's president at the time, or Wegerbauer, an officer of Holland and, at a different time, president of Holland, asked him to investigate the situation at Browns Limousine Service, Inc. (Browns),[5] and Airport; he testified that he was asked: "Could you stay an extra week in the United States? Could you go to New York and take a look at the situation?"

Margolies went to New York, spent some time at Building 69, and reported to Holland that, although Browns' situation appeared hopeless, Airport appeared to be viable and might serve as a starting point for a Holland operation in New York.[6] Later in his testimony,

[2] Margolies testified that Airport did not perform this crew work when he arrived at Airport in June 1976 and "may have" performed this work in 1977. However, I credit the testimony of employee Peter Pena, who testified that Airport performed crew work as well as charter work during this period. In addition, the decision in the case involving Holrick White found that Airport performed crew work under contracts with airlines. Finally on this issue, Margolies, in an affidavit submitted to the court on Airport's Chapter XI bankruptcy petition, dated November 29, 1976, referred to Airport's business as "providing general charter and crew service." Additionally, Steven Goldman, Airport's vice president, testified that Airport performed airlines crew work.

[3] Airport did not transport people from the airport on an individual passenger fare basis.

[4] He was residing, at the time, in Spain and "I was looking for something more permanent to do."

[5] There is some question as to the connection, if any, between Browns and Airport at the time. Margolies testified that when he investigated their viability on behalf of Holland their operations were intermingled. After he became president of Airport, he separated the management and payroll of the two companies.

[6] Margolies' answers herein were often "probably," "I certainly might have," or similar vague answers. Because I found that Margolies had difficulty making admissions to questions from the General Counsel, in this situation I have translated these answers to mean "yes."

Margolies testified that he reported to Holland that it was "questionable as to whether this might be a viable situation" and that Airport's operation was "so-so. I couldn't really tell, there was nobody there." Margolies testified that, at the end of his stay in New York investigating Airport and Browns on behalf of Holland, he informed Jack Feldman (a major stockholder of Airport at the time) that Holland was not interested in it at the time. Feldman asked him if he would be interested in remaining and running Airport.[7] No salary or position was discussed. Margolies answered that he might be interested and returned to Europe. A couple of weeks later Margolies called Feldman or Wagner and said, "I might be interested in coming back, I'm leaving my family here, I want to come over and give it a whirl." He returned to New York and went to Building 69. He testified that he became president of Airport although nobody appointed him or elected him to that position: "I walked in and I sat down; because I wore a suit and tie people—I sat in the president's office, the emperor's clothes or something. There I was, I ran the company." When asked who determined what his salary would be, Margolies testified: "I called in the bookkeeper and said put me on the payroll. She said how much. I think it was nine hundred dollars[8] a week and she said, 'Yes sir'"; "I picked a number for myself, told the girl to put me on the payroll." Margolies could not be any more specific about how his salary was determined. However, the General Counsel produced a transcript from the bankruptcy proceeding in which Margolies testified that, in a conversation with Cappozzi and Wegerbauer, Margolies agreed to become president of Airport, and at the same time they fixed the salary he was to receive in that position; Margolies testified that he remembered that testimony.

As stated, supra, Holland does not itself operate buses, but rather owns stock in, or assets of, other transportation companies. It attempts to learn of possible acquisitions in this industry and investigates these situations; this was how Margolies and Holland first became involved with Airport, as discussed supra. Margolies testified that, during the period of his presidency of Airport, he was informed by officers of Holland that they were negotiating to purchase Airport, but that no such agreement was ever consummated.

Louis Lyons was employed first by Browns as a mechanic in 1967. He testified that the company name of his employer changed "quite a few times" and changed to Airport Bus about 1976. He had also been the Local 875 shop steward since 1971. He testified that sometime in 1976, when Margolies first arrived at Airport, Margolies said to him, "I just want to get acquainted with you, I'm the new president, I'm taking over, Price Porter is the president of Browns, but I'm over the whole thing."

Robert Seymour, who was originally employed by Browns in 1972 and was employed by Airport in 1976, testified that when Margolies first arrived at Airport he made a speech to about 20 or 30 of Airport's drivers in the drivers' room. Margolies told them that Porter was his vice president and that he was the sole owner of Airport and Shortway and "Shortway would be in there too." He also made mention of Holland in this meeting.

From 1977 through January 24, 1978, Steven Goldman was vice president of Airport in charge of charter sales. Margolies appointed him to that position. Joseph Bonasia was the Airport executive who represented Airport in dealings with the airport, the port authority, and certain customers. He also supervised the dispatchers. About January 1978, Margolies was chairman of Holland. He testified that he could not recall how much before that time he assumed that position. The General Counsel produced a transcript dated September 14, 1979, where, in answer to questions from a representative of the Board, Margolies testified that he assumed the position of chairman of Holland "just about the same time" as he was appointed the president of Airport. In addition to that position, he has been the secretary[9] of Holland since 1978, and has been a stockholder of Holland since about that time. In 1978, Margolies appointed Goldman a vice president of Holland; it was a position he held for a short time.[10] Goldman, on December 29, 1976, signed the collective-bargaining agreement with Local 875 covering Airport's mechanics and helpers on behalf of Airport. He signed it on behalf of Airport because "I was available at the time." He did not take a major part in the negotiations leading to the agreement. After Airport was adjudicated a bankrupt on January 24, 1978, Goldman was employed as vice president for Shortway Charter; Margolies appointed him to that position as manager of charter sales for Shortway Charter. Sometime during the latter half of 1978, he was asked by someone (whose name he does not remember) from Fugazy of Connecticut to run their charter department. He was employed by Fugazy of Connecticut for a few weeks.

Airport operated out of Building 69 until October 1977; at that time they encountered difficulties with their landlord and they moved into a terminal and office located at 114–02 New York Boulevard, Jamaica, New York (New York Boulevard). Airport continued to operate from this location until the termination of its operation in January 1978.

New York Boulevard is a large two-story "L shaped" building with a large parking area in between. The building contains offices on both the first and second floor, a garage, and body shop. There is also a parking lot on the premises. Shortly prior to October 1977, Paulding Equities, which is wholly owned by Holland and was created

[7] Margolies testified that his inspection of the Airport operation revealed "that there was nobody there, no officers, there were people working, but unsupervised."

[8] In the affidavit to the bankruptcy court dated November 26, 1976, referred to supra, Margolies states: "Prior to the filing of this petition, Mr. Margolies was receiving $900 per week in the form of $400 paid directly to him and $500 paid to Holland Industries, Inc., as a return against advances which Holland paid on behalf of Margolies. Mr. Margolies is a consultant to Holland Industries, Inc."

[9] Beginning about March 1977, Airport paid Wagner $250 a week as "transportation consultant." Wagner was the secretary of Holland in 1977. In December 1977, Margolies, Wagner, and Wegerbauer were the sole Holland directors.

[10] He testified that he did not perform any duty specifically in that capacity as compared to his capacity as an officer of Airport.

specifically for the purpose, purchased New York Boulevard from Dell Bus. Shortly thereafter, Airport transferred its operations to New York Boulevard.

On August 24, 1977, Margolies executed an agreement[11] on behalf of Holland as "President" (although he testified that he never was president of Holland); the other signatures to this agreement were those of Gordon Dern and his brother Norman Dell[12] (with no company name beside their signatures). The agreement identifies Dell and Dern ("Sellers") as the owners of all the shares of Dell Bus Co., Inc (Dell Bus) and the real property at 114–02 New York Boulevard in Jamaica, New York (New York Boulevard) and states that they desire to sell all the outstanding shares of Dell Bus to Holland ("Purchasers"). Holland agreed to pay Dern and Dell the sum of $1 for the outstanding shares of Dell Bus, and agreed to "retain the services of" Dell and Dern "to devote their full time and efforts and generally manage the operational affairs of Dell and other subsidiary and associated transportation companies." A specific salary is provided for, and "in addition, Sellers shall be entitled to receive 25% of the net after tax profits of the New York Operation. Said compensation to continue so long as purchaser actively maintains its New York operation." The agreement is stated to be effective October 1, 1977.

During Margolies' tenure, Airport owned some of its own buses and leased 10 buses from Bus Exchange. Sometime between November 1976 and January 1978, Holland purchased five of the buses Airport owned[13] and leased them back to Airport. In addition, because Airport could not meet the insurance payments on the buses it was leasing from Bus Exchange, Holland purchased these 10 buses from Bus Exchange and likewise leased them back to Airport.[14] The accountant's report to the Trustee-in-Bankruptcy for Airport states that by March 1977 Airport was paying to Holland $33,500 monthly for rental of buses and had a security deposit of $23,500 with Holland for the leasing of 23 buses.

There were other transactions between Airport and Holland as well; some are set forth in the bankruptcy case docket. The docket indicates that Airport filed its Chapter XI petition, with the supporting papers, on November 29, 1976. The General Counsel's brief alleges that on December 29, 1976, Holland commenced a series of loans to Airport. The docket is not entirely clear on this issue; for December 29, 1976, the docket contains the following relevant items:

> Order signed authorizing execution of documents to complete transfer of certain buses.
> Order signed authorizing Holland Industries, Inc., to advance insurance payments for debtor.
> Order signed authorizing the granting to Central State Bank of a security interest in accounts receivable of debtor.

The docket entries for October 28 and November 3, 1977, are clearer, however:

> Order signed (October 25) authorizing Holland nunc pro tunc to lend the debtor $28,370 by paying the sum directly to Barbara Rosen.[15]
> Filed unsigned Order authorizing Holland Industries, Inc., to lend debtor a certain sum in a revolving fund.

In addition to this direct financial assistance, Holland also obtained some charter business for Airport through its wholly owned company Shortway Charter. Shortway Charter acts solely as a broker in the bus charter business; it owns no buses of its own and earns its income from brokerage commission of the charters it places. Prior to 1976, Shortway Charter, as broker, obtained the Thomas Cook charter account and brokered it to a bus company in Westchester. As Margolies testified before the bankruptcy court:

> When I came to Airport, Holland went back to X and said quote hey, we are now in business in New York. We have an operation in New York. We are involved with this Airport.

On the basis of this request from Holland, the Westchester bus company performing this charter work relinquished the work and Airport performed the work thereafter.[16]

Between October 1977 and January 1978, Airport had four dispatchers—Frank Capella, Frank Wurth, George Gaynor, and Stencil Stokes.[17] In addition, Dern often acted as dispatcher for Airport, although he was not actually employed by Airport. When the drivers reported for work in the morning, the dispatcher on duty at that time assigned him to a particular job; in addition, some of the buses had two-way radios and the dispatcher could make his assignment over the radio.

As stated, supra, through January 24, 1978, Airport performed a number of different services: charter work available to the public for periods ranging from a few hours to a week or more and crew work, under contract with the individual airlines, under which Airport would transport the airlines crews from the airport to a hotel in New York City or elsewhere. In addition, Airport also transported passengers to other airlines or to hotels on behalf of the airlines; no individual fares were received [11] Margolies testified that he also negotiated this agreement on behalf of Holland.

[12] Dell did not testify herein.

[13] These were the "typical Greyhound bus," with a lavatory, and were used for charter work.

[14] Petta testified that about October 1977 Airport operated approximately 10 Airport and Browns buses and 4 to 6 Shortway Lines buses. The Shortway name appeared on the sides of the buses in lettering about 2 feet high, in addition to being on the rear as well. The registration was also in the name of Shortway Lines.

[15] The identity of Barbara Rosen was not explained at the hearing.

[16] Margolies' testimony at the hearing herein was that the company performing the work (whose principal Margolies knew) took the initiative in relinquishing the Thomas Cook account to Airport, although it received nothing in return. Although on its face this appears to be questionable, I find it unnecessary to make such a credibility finding as the testimony otherwise establishes that Holland took part in Airport's obtaining this account.

[17] All except Stokes had been employed by Airport as dispatchers at Building 69. Stokes had previously been employed as a dispatcher by Dell Bus/Ominbus at the New York Boulevard location.

for these trips. When Browns ceased operations approximately 6 months after Margolies' appearance at Building 69, Airport attempted to capture whatever business it could from the former Browns operation. In addition to some charter work and crew work, Airport acquired work under Browns' contract with the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey (Port Authority), for the transportation from Parking Lot 7.

Parking Lot 7 is a parking lot located at Kennedy Airport which is used by individuals who are employed at Kennedy Airport to park their cars. They then board a bus at this parking lot which takes them to the location at the airport where they work. Through most of 1976 this bus service was provided by Browns under a contract with the Port Authority. About the end of 1976, Airport began to operate this bus service (although without benefit of a Port Authority contract) with its buses, drivers, and mechanics. In late 1976 or early 1977, Airport ceased performing this work when the Port Authority awarded the contract to Dell Bus. Lyons testified that in 1977 he observed that Dell Bus was using the same buses that Airport had used on the Parking Lot 7 operation, and, in fact, with registrations under the Airport name. Lyons further testified that, after the contract was awarded to Dell Bus, he was often sent to Parking Lot 7 to work on one of the buses.[18]

Jay Strauss,[19] who at the time of the hearing was employed by Schenck Tours[20] (Schenck), managing the Parking Lot 7 operation, was president of JFK Parking Lot No. 7, Inc. (Parking Lot No. 7, Inc.), although he testified that he neither managed the operation, nor was he present at the location. Parking Lot No. 7, Inc. was set up by Dell who gave it the work involved after Dell Bus was awarded the Parking Lot 7 contract by the Port Authority. Parking Lot No. 7, Inc. began performing this work on April 1, 1977. Notwithstanding that Strauss was president of the company, he testified that he did not know who owned Parking Lot No. 7, Inc., although Dell was his boss during that period and supervised his work; his Parking Lot No. 7, Inc paychecks were signed by Susan Margolies, the then wife of Margolies. During that period, Parking Lot 7 was managed by Robert Barkley.[21] There was a collective-bargaining agreement, dated April 1, 1977, between Parking Lot No. 7, Inc. and Local 875 covering the company's drivers. The agreement was executed by Strauss on behalf of the company. Strauss testified that Dell asked how to sign the agreement, although he did not know who negotiated the agreement on behalf of Parking Lot No. 7, Inc.; Strauss also did not know whether Parking Lot No. 7, Inc. was affiliated with Holland on April 1, 1977.[22]

During the latter part of 1977, Strauss and Pete Puglese were the service managers for Airport; Strauss testified that during this period he was paid personally by Dell, rather than by Airport or Dell Bus, although "it's possible" that he could have been paid by an Airport check "by mistake." Airport's payroll lists Strauss as having been paid $340 on November 6 and 13, 1977.

Petta testified that during the fall of 1977 he attended a meeting with Margolies, Lyons, and (he believes) Nick Emannual, the representative of Local 875. The meeting took place at New York Boulevard after Airport moved there. Margolies told them that he was the president of the Company. He drew a corporate diagram containing Holland Industries at the top (with the words "owns 15 companies" beside it); beneath Holland are six named companies, including Shortway Lines, Airport, and Dell Bus. Margolies gave the diagram to the Local 875 representative. Margolies then said that Goldman was in charge of the charter department at Airport; Petta asked what were the functions of Dell and Dern; and Margolies said that Dell was the chief or general manager in charge of the dispatchers and drivers, and Dern was the head dispatcher. They were also informed that Jay Strauss was the maintenance manager.

After Airport transferred its operations to the New York Boulevard location, the following employees of Dell Bus or other companies owned or operated by Dell and Dern, at the least, began working for Airport: Elton Nocks, William Pearson, Selvin Gibson Jr., John Eagle, Robert Bertart, Hubert Howie, Robert Bryant, Erastus Clifton, Peter Gumpel, Phil Tesco, Arthur Johnson, Willie Quick, and Stokes, the dispatcher.

Leroy Andrews, who was employed by Airport and Browns as a mechanic, testified that after Airport moved to New York Boulevard he worked on buses marked Airport, Dell Bus, and Shortway.[23] On numerous occasions during this period Dell instructed him to perform maintenance work on a Dell Bus vehicle. On all of those occasions Andrews told Puglese what Dell had told him to do and Puglese always told him to work on the Dell Bus vehicle as Dell had instructed him. On those occasions when Dell, Dern, and Strauss all asked him to perform some work, when he asked Puglese which work he [18] It should be noted that at one point Margolies testified that he did not believe that Airport employees ever performed any Parking Lot 7 work or that Lyons ever performed any work at Parking Lot 7. I would not credit this testimony. Firstly, I found Lyons to be a more credible witness than Margolies: he was not an evasive witness as Margolies was and, unlike Margolies, Lyons appeared to look upon the proceeding seriously. Additionally, the collective-bargaining agreement between Airport and Local 875, dated December 29, 1976, states: "If the company loses PONYA [presumably the Port Authority] contract on Employee Parking Lot #7, Louis Lyons will be retained as a diesel helper with no cut in pay." Finally, other employees, and Goldman, testified that Airport performed this work.

[19] Strauss was an extremely hostile and evasive witness.

[20] About 1975, Dell and Dern sold a major portion of their crew transportation business to Schenck. The agreement, according to Dern's testimony, contained a restriction on their operation within a 150-mile radius of New York City or with vehicles carrying over seven passengers, but they never produced this agreement.

[21] When asked what he did as president of the company, Strauss testified "nothing." When asked about Dell's involvement in Parking Lot No. 7, Inc., he testified: "He operated it, he ran it."

[22] The business account application of Citibank for Shortway Charter, under "remarks," has a handwritten notation stating: "Affiliated with Holland Industries, Inc., JFK Parking Lot #7." The manager of the bank testified that this was his handwritting. When asked what he meant by affiliated, he testified: "Could be the same principals." As to how he came to write this on the application, he testified: "Well, I wouldn't write it on my own, the question would be asked to whoever I opened the account for."

[23] This would be Shortway Lines, rather than Shortway Charter, which was solely a bus brokerage concern, subcontracting charters but owning no buses of its own.

should perform first, Puglese said: "Do what Norman [Dell] said to do." Other than those situations, Puglese never directly asked Andrews to work on a Dell Bus vehicle.

Lyons testified that during the summer of 1977 he worked on Parking Lot 7 buses (marked "Airport Shuttle"), Airport buses, Shortway[24] buses, and Browns buses, even though Browns was no longer in existence. After the move to New York Boulevard, he worked on those buses and on Dell Bus vehicles as well.

Earl Autry, who was employed by Airport as a driver, testified that, while Airport was located at New York Boulevard, Shortway Lines also operated out of that address; Dern was "to my knowledge, the chief dispatcher" for both companies; Dern had dispatched Autry on some jobs while Autry was employed by Airport when the other dispatchers were not present.

William Richards, who was employed as a driver first by Browns and then by Airport, testified that while Airport was located at the New York Boulevard location he drove buses with the names Airport, Dell Bus, and Shortway. Robert Seymour, who was employed by Airport until it was adjudicated a bankrupt and who mostly drove crew jobs, testified that while Airport was located at the New York Boulevard location he was dispatched by Dern in addition to the regular Airport dispatchers and "only a couple of times" drove a Dell Bus. Edward Segal, who was employed by Airport until about December 1977, testified that during the period October through December 1977 Airport had three dispatchers who each worked one shift—Frank Wurth, George Gaynor, and Stencil Stokes; in addition, Dern's role "was like a dispatcher."

William Moser, who was employed by Airport as a driver between October 1977 and January 1978 (and who is a Charging Party herein), testified that during this period he was dispatched by Wurth, Gaynor, Stokes, and Dern and, also during this period, he drove buses marked Airport and some were marked Shortway Lines.[25] Devon Wing, who was employed by Airport as a mechanic, testified that while Airport was located at New York Boulevard he worked on Airport, Dell Bus, and Shortway buses. Of all three, he spent the most time working on Dell Bus vehicles (limousines and buses). During this period, Wing observed Dell walking around the area where he worked, observing the vehicles, but he never instructed Wing on what work to perform. Strauss testified that when both Airport buses and Dell Bus buses were in the garage Airport buses, which were newer, were used.

After Airport moved to New York Boulevard, Dell and Dern operated a private limousine service with station wagons carrying up to seven passengers,[26] in addition to the Parking Lot 7 operation it ran through Parking Lot No. 7, Inc. Dern testified that during this period (October 1977 through January 1978) he was spending his time selling Dell Bus surplus station wagons,[27] while Strauss was operating the limousine service under Omnibus Corp. (Omnibus).

Dern[28] testified that about 6 months after their agreement with Schenck, he and Dell created Omnibus, which also operated out of New York Boulevard, employing drivers. He testified that until about December 1977 Omnibus had its own employees; at that time Maintenance and Manpower was created and began supplying employees to Omnibus.[29]

Strauss testified that he was the president of Omnibus and Dell was the "operator," but he was not sure who the owner of Omnibus was. The most straightforward answers the General Counsel was able to obtain from Strauss regarding Omnibus were: "Omnibus Limousine Service operated in lieu of Dell" and "Omnibus died September 30, 1977." Robert Bertart, who was employed by Dell Bus prior to October 1977, testified that just prior to Airport's moving into the New York Boulevard location he received paychecks under the company name Omnibus. Selvin Gibson Jr., who was employed by Dell Bus prior to October 1977, testified (as did Bertart) that sometime after Airport moved into the New York Boulevard location some of his paychecks were from Airport.

As of March 1978, the officers and directors of Dell Bus were Dell (president), Dern (secretary-treasurer), and Joseph Bonasia (executive vice president). The stockholders at that time were Daniel Dern (otherwise unidentified), who owned 50 percent of the shares, and Dern and Bonasia, who each owned 25 percent of the shares.[30]

Strauss became president of Maintenance and Manpower at its inception (although he testified that he did not know when that was). He became president at the request of Dell[31] and remained as president for only 1

[24] He testified that he observed that these buses were registered in the name of Shortway Lines, as well as having the Shortway name on them. As to whether any of the buses Airport operated were registered under the name Shortway Lines, Margolies testified: "I don't think so," "I don't recall it."

[25] He later testified that Shortway Lines buses may have read "Shortway, Operated by Airport Bus," but he testified, "Now, that I'm not positive of."

[26] Dern testified that this operation was allowed under its restrictive convenant with Schenck.

[27] Dern testified that, at the time of the agreement with Schenck, Dell Bus had 30 to 35 vehicles, but by January 1978 they had only 10 to 12 remaining. Strauss testified that in October 1977 Dell Bus had approximately 20 buses, 12 stretch cars (extra long limousines commonly seen on airport work), 3 station wagons, 6 limousines, and 2 sedans. At the end of January 1978 (according to Strauss' testimony) Dell Bus had only buses, about 30 in number.

[28] I did not find Dern to be a credible witness. Although he appeared to be a friendly witness (unlike Strauss), a close examination of his testimony establishes that he was extremely evasive on numerous occasions, and reveals numerous conflicts with other, more credible, witnesses. Additionally, he often testified that he could produce documents to support his testimony, but never did.

[29] He testified that when Maintenance and Manpower was created the Omnibus employees "joined" Maintenance and Manpower. He also testified that Omnibus had a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 522, and after Maintenance and Manpower came into existence it executed an agreement with Local 522. Dern could not produce any payroll records for either company.

[30] Dern testified that about 1972 the officers of Dell Bus were he (secretary and possibly vice president) and his brother Dell, who was the president and treasurer and the owner of all the stock of Dell Bus at that time.

[31] Strauss testified that Cross County was operated by Dell. It had an ICC certificate to perform charter work; Dell Bus did not have such a certificate. Cross County had no employees or buses. Strauss did not testify as to what position, if any, he held with Cross County.

week. He executed the collective-bargaining agreement with Local 522 dated January 16, 1978, on behalf of Maintenance and Manpower (as president), although, he testified, he did not participate in any negotiations; Dell asked him to sign it and he did so.

Louis Lyons was a mechanic first for Browns and then for Airport and the Local 875 shop steward for Airport; he testified about a grievance meeting he had with Margolies where Dell was present. Although he was generally a credible witness, his testimony on this subject was very confusing; at one point he testified that the subject of the grievance was the poor condition of the New York Boulevard building, while shortly thereafter he testified that "one of the workers didn't get his pay check." However, it is unnecessary to resolve this conflict as the General Counsel introduced into evidence two letters (one on Airport stationery, the other on blank untitled stationery) from Margolies to Lyons. The first is dated October 31, 1977, has the heading "Subject: Grievances," and begins "this is in partial answer to some of the written grievances we received from you two weeks ago"; the letter sets forth improvements that would be made in the lighting of the building and the toilets. The memo (as it is entitled) states that copies of it were sent to Dell and Emannual. The second letter from Margolies to Lyons is dated November 8, 1977, and states his regrets that two of Airport's mechanics had resigned. The letter asked "the union to do whatever they can to furnish us with replacements." This letter also states that copies were sent to Dell and Emannual.

Willy Goza, who is presently employed by Fugazy of Connecticut as a driver, testified that about September 1977 another driver introduced him to Dell at the International Arrivals Building at Kennedy Airport. He told Dell that he was getting ready to leave his job and he would like to fill out an application to work for Dell. Dell told him that when he was ready he should come by for the job. About late October or early November 1977, Goza went to Building 69 and told dispatcher Frank Wurth that he was there to speak to Dell. Wurth told him that Dell did not work at Building 69, that he worked at New York Boulevard. Sometime within the next few days Goza went to New York Boulevard and again saw Wurth and asked to see Dell. Wurth sent him to an office behind the dispatcher's office. Goza told Dell that he was there to fill out the application and he would be available to begin work at the beginning of 1978. Dell handed Goza a form entitled "Application for Employment." Dell wrote the words "Airport Bus Service Building 69" at the top of the application prior to giving it to Goza; Goza completed the rest of the application.[32]

About January 25, 1978 (approximately a month after leaving his prior employment), Goza returned to New York Boulevard; he again saw Wurth and asked to see Dell. Dell came out to see him and Goza told him, "I'm back, I'm ready to go to work." Dell went back into his office, and when he came out he handed Goza an application for employment. This one had the words "Maintenance and Manpower" on the top of the application. Goza asked Dell who that was and Dell said it was a new company. Goza filled out the application and Dell asked him when he could begin working; Goza said that he could begin that day, and he did begin his employment that day with Maintenance and Manpower.

Peter Petta, who was employed by Airport as a driver beginning about October 1977, and who became shop steward for Local 875 in December 1977, testified that about 3 to 4 weeks after Airport moved to New York Boulevard he attended a meeting with Emannual, Lyons, Dell, and Margolies in Dell's office at New York Boulevard. (Margolies did not stay for the entire meeting.) Emannual informed Dell that he was the representative for Local 875 and that employees who supposedly were employed by Dell Bus were being used by Airport. Dell denied that Dell Bus employees were working for Airport or using its equipment and said that he would not discuss it any further as he had nothing to do with Airport or Local 875. They then left Dell's office and went to speak to Margolies in his office. Petta told Margolies that certain nonunion employees were performing work for Airport when the work should have been performed by Airport's employees. Margolies said that the employees involved were performing Dell Bus work and were employed by Dell Bus, not Airport. Petta said that he had seen the men being dispatched by Airport's dispatchers—Gaynor and Wurth—and performing crew work similar to Airport's. Emannual told Margolies he had Local 875 authorization cards signed by individuals who were allegedly employed by Dell Bus, but were paid by checks from Airport and were working at the same address as Airport, and therefore they should be represented by Local 875. Margolies looked at the authorization cards, and said that as far as he knew the employees who signed the cards were working for Dell Bus, but that he would investigate the situation, and, if the employees involved were employed by Airport, they would be covered by the Local 875 contract. Petta showed Margolies an Airport pay stub for Bill Davis, a Dell Bus driver, and told him that it established that Dell Bus drivers were being paid by Airport. Margolies answered that Dell Bus employees were being paid by Airport for the sake of simplicity, and Dell Bus was reimbursing Airport for the amounts.

[32] Counsel for Fugazy of Connecticut spent a considerable amount of time examining and cross-examining Goza on the subject of his meetings with Dell and his applications for employment. In this cross-examination he established that the affidavit Goza gave to the Board stated that he first met Dell at Building 69; Goza testified that it was at the International Arrivals Building at Kennedy Airport, not at Building 69 that he first met Dell; when he gave that affidavit he had just left work and had not yet been asleep and was not thinking properly; regardless, this is an obviously minor discrepancy. During cross-examination, Goza also testified that he filled out six to eight applications for employment; in addition to the applications for Airport and Maintenance and Manpower he was asked to fill out a few applications for employment for Shortway Charter and Fugazy of Connecticut. On these occasions, Goza was told that this was the company he was now working for and he had to fill out a new application, or that he had to complete the new application because the prior applications had been misplaced. Finally, during some portions of this extensive examination by counsel for Fugazy of Connecticut, Goza's testimony became confused regarding the chronology of events. Regardless, I found Goza to be an extremely credible witness; he appeared to be testifying in a truthful manner as to events that occurred 3 or 4 years earlier. Although he was at times confused regarding dates, these errors appeared to be inadvertent mistakes and did not detract from what I conceived to be his obvious credibility.

As stated, supra, since prior to Margolies' appearance at Airport in 1976, its drivers and mechanics had been represented by Local 875 under separate collective-bargaining agreements. On December 29, 1976, Margolies executed a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement with Local 875 covering Airport's drivers. On the same day Goldman executed a 3-year collective-bargaining agreement with Local 875 covering Airport's mechanics. The record indicates that at least through the week ending January 12, 1978, Airport was still deducting Local 875 dues from the employees' salary.[33]

V. BANKRUPTCY ADJUDICATION

On November 29, 1976, Airport filed a petition under Chapter XI in the bankruptcy court. Airport operated in that manner until January 24, 1978.[34] Two events occurred on that day. First, the bankruptcy court adjudicated Airport bankrupt and appointed Albert Altesman as the Trustee-in-Bankruptcy. Later in the day, Margolies returned to New York Boulevard where he spoke with a number of employees about the situation. Only Margolies testified to the former, while Margolies and numerous employees testified to the latter.

Margolies testified that for months prior to the adjudication he had been attempting to work out a plan acceptable to Airport's creditors, but that about a week to 10 days prior to the adjudication he and Martin Brecker, the attorney for Airport, as Debtor-in-Possession, decided that no plan could be arranged with the creditors and they had no choice but to request that the judge adjudicate Airport bankrupt; the petition was made jointly by Margolies and Brecker. After the court proceedings that day, Margolies asked Altesman and Israel Halpert, Esq., the attorney for the Trustee-in-Bankruptcy, what he was to do:

> They said to me, you go back and close-up. I said what about all the people. There are no more people, everything is shut down, you just stop doing business, close everything up . . . . I was told to go back and tell everybody that the company was closed and was out of business and none of us had jobs.[35]

Margolies then went to the New York Boulevard location and called Goldman and Bonasia into his office; he told them what had occurred in court earlier that day and that Airport was out of business; he told Goldman to notify the employees in the charter department and the office of this and asked Bonasia to notify the people in the garage and the drivers that the Company was closed and that the employees would be paid through the end of the day. Only Margolies testified to the above occurrences; however, as to subsequent discussions between Margolies and employees later that day, there are major credibility issues. First, Margolies' version.

Margolies testified that he returned to New York Boulevard about 2:30 p.m. and went upstairs to his office where he had the above-mentioned conversation with Goldman and Bonasia. He had occasion to go downstairs to the dispatchers office about 4 or 5 p.m. While he was there, about four to six drivers and mechanics approached him and asked him what was going on. (He believes it was Lyons who asked.) Margolies asked, "Didn't Goldman and Bonasia tell you?" The employees said that they had, but "what does it mean?" Margolies said:

> I told them that the company was bankrupt, that it was closed, that it wasn't going to open, that all work was ceased, finished. I said you have to call the Union to find out what that means to you individually. . . . We are out of business, we are closed, there is nothing more we can do. . . . The Court closed us up and that's it . . . we are out of business. We all have to worry and fend for ourselves.

Margolies testified that in this conversation he made no reference to Dell Bus or Maintenance and Manpower, nor did he comment on the possibility of their future employment at New York Boulevard. He testified that he did not suggest that the employees speak to Dell nor make reference to work being available with Dell at a cut in pay. The testimony of the employees involved is substantially different.

Petta testified that between 6 and 8 p.m. on January 24, 1978, he attended a meeting in which Margolies spoke to about 12 employees; the meeting took place in Dell's office, which was entered from the right rear of the dispatcher's office. He testified that the employees who attended, whom he can remember, were Tony Rodnite, Bill Davis, Gibson, Charles Hay, and Earl Autry. When Petta entered the garage Rodnite told him that the Company was bankrupt. He went to see Dell and asked him what the story was. Dell said, "Airport Bus Service is bankrupt and you're out of a job." Petta asked for proof and Dell told him that Margolies would be down to speak to the employees in a few minutes. Within a few minutes Margolies arrived and said, "As of 3:00 this afternoon Airport Bus Service was put into bankruptcy

[33] The General Counsel argues in his brief that although Airport deducted these Local 875 dues, "as soon as Airport Bus moved into the Dell garage, Margolies' dues payments to Local 875 ceased entirely." I find insufficient evidence with which to make such a finding; to support this allegation, the General Counsel uses Local 875 dues and initiation reports for August and September 1977, and the stipulation "that they don't have records subsequent to that, September of 77." However, this stipulation does not establish that no dues were transmitted to Local 875 after this date; it could also establish that Local 875 misplaced its past September 1977 records.

[34] The testimony at the hearing generally establishes that it was on January 24, 1978, that Airport was adjudicated a bankrupt, and placed in Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act, and that following this adjudication, and the appointment of a Trustee in Bankruptcy by the Court, Margolies returned to the New York Boulevard location later that same day and discussed the situation with a number of Airport's executives and employees. However, the Order of Adjudication of the Court is dated and signed January 25, 1978. Although it is not particularly crucial to this matter whether these events occurred on January 24 or 25, 1978, I would find it more likely that the events occurred on January 24, 1978, while the Order of Adjudication was not signed until the next day.

[35] No evidence was adduced herein that the Trustee or the bankruptcy court ever disaffirmed the Local 875 contracts with Airport.

by the courts." He then said that he had something else to say to them, but first Dell wished to speak to them. Dell then told the employees that he would employ them if they wished to work; they should fill out applications for employment and they could begin work the following day transporting crews to and from Kennedy Airport; Dell said that he would be doing all the crew work, and that Margolies had nothing to do with it. Margolies said that it was true that he was no longer involved with crew work, and that he (or Shortway) would continue to operate a charter business. Petta asked Margolies where the buses for the operation would come from. Margolies answered that Shortway was going to lease buses to Dell and Dern for their operation. According to Petta's testimony, Dell said that there would be no union or no benefits, and the employees would have to accept the conditions he sets, for example, a set price of $15 per crew or passenger movement rather than a guaranteed weekly pay; that the employees would be paid by Maintenance and Manpower; and that he would bring disciplinary action against any employee who attempted to bring a union to the shop.

Airport mechanic Devon Wing testified that on the day in question he attended a meeting in an area close to the dispatcher's office about 6 or 7 p.m. It was attended by Margolies, Strauss, Goldman, Dell, Dern, Airport drivers, and himself. Margolies said that he was sorry to tell them that Airport was going out of business,[36] that it was finished. He would help any of them if they needed a recommendation for another job. Margolies then said that Dell and Dern would be operating the buses under a different name, that the employees could work for them and be employed by Maintenance and Manpower, but could not be represented by Local 875 and the salary would be less (although he did not specify a salary), and would be negotiated on an individual basis; and that employees who were interested should speak to Strauss, Dell, and Dern. Margolies then informed the employees that he would remain, but would do strictly charter work. Wing testified that he was "positive" that Charles Gillard (who did not testify) and his brother were present at this meeting, and that he believed that Robert Seymour, Ortiz, Creighton, Munoz (first names not stated), Victor Diaz, Charles Hay, Wurth, Ralph Cronenburg, Don Mortis, Major Darlington, and Eddie Segal were present. At the end, Dell spoke to the employees, but Wing does not remember what he said because "it wasn't to my interest."

William Richards, an Airport driver, testified that on the day in question he was home on his day off and he received a telephone call from Dern about 6 or 7 p.m.: "He says that Margolies wanted to tell us something, and would I come in." He went to New York Boulevard and went into the dispatcher's office; Bob Seymour, Ben Gallager, and Hay were other employees who were present. He testified that he does not specifically remember who else was present at the meeting in the dispatcher's office, but Wing was not there. In addition, Dern and Dell were present. A few minutes later Margolies came downstairs and said, "[A]s of 4:15 that 24th day of January, that the company is bankruptcy [sic], and that there was no more work for us. . . . He said that he was going to keep the Shortway Line, and that's all he was going to handle because he lost the rights to operate on the airport. . . . He said that Norman Dell was going to operate the airport work." Margolies finished by telling the employees that they could talk to Dell about a job with him.

Richards testified that he and a number of other Airport employees (Bob Seymour, Bill Moser, Charlie Hay, Ed Segal, and Charles Gillard were some of those present in Dell's office in addition to Richards, although people were walking in and out) went into Dell's office with Dell and Dern. Dell told them that he had jobs for them, but they would not be paid as much as they had been by Airport; they would be paid $6 a trip into New York City, they would receive 20 percent on charter work, and there would be no union.[37] Dell then told them that Margolies would handle the charter work and he would handle the airport work, and pay them under Maintenance and Manpower.[38] When Dell finished speaking Richards said that he would not accept his proposition. He was at New York Boulevard for 45 minutes, and does not know whether Margolies, Dell, or Dern had any other meeting with Airport's employees on that day.

Robert Seymour, who was employed by Browns and Airport as a driver, testified that on the day in question about 7 p.m. he received a call at home (it was his day off) from one of the dispatchers, who said the boss wanted to see him. He went to New York Boulevard and Margolies called him and about 10 other employees into the drivers' room, which is next to the dispatcher's office. The employees whom Seymour remembers being present at this discussion were Richards, Moser, Petta, Ben Gallagher, and Charles Hay.[39]

Seymour testified that Margolies told them:

> He just said he couldn't afford to operate. The banks had—he had signed bankruptcy that afternoon, or something had happened that afternoon, where he was bankrupt for some reasons.

[36] Wing testified that Margolies may have used the term "bankrupt" or referred to a chapter number, rather than the words "out of business."

[37] On direct examination, Richards testified that Dell said "and there'd be no union." When Richards was cross-examined about Dell's words, he testified:

> Q. . . . What else?
> A. And that there would be no union.
> Q. He said the words that there wouldn't be a union?
> A. That's right.
> Q. Well, did he say there wouldn't be an 875?
> A. He said there wouldn't be a union.
> Q. He said a union.
> A. Union.
> Q. Well, what about there wouldn't be your union?"
> A. Possibility.

When I asked Richards whether he remembered Dell saying there will be no union or there would be no Local 875, he testified that Dell said "there'll be no union."

[38] Richards testified that he was not aware whether the drivers whom Dell Bus employed were represented by a union.

[39] He testified that he does not remember whether Devon Wing was present at this meeting, although he does remember seeing Wing at a Local 875 meeting the following day.

Dell then called those present into his office; Seymour testified:

> He asked us did we want to work for him. He said there was no union, less money, charter trips would be much less than we were getting, and so, with no union, we told him no, we didn't.

Upon hearing that, Seymour left New York Boulevard.

Moser, who was employed by Airport as a driver, testified that on the day in question, late in the afternoon or early in the evening, he returned to New York Boulevard from a trip and Dern told him to go upstairs because Dell had something to say to him. Moser went up to the executive office; present were Dell, Bonasia, and Goldman; Moser was the only employee present. Dell said that Margolies had gone bankrupt. Either Dell, Bonasia, or Goldman asked him if he would consider staying on (which he did not answer) and then asked him how many people he thought would stay on. Moser answered, "Very few, less than 40%."[40] Dern then asked Moser to wait in the drivers' room because Margolies wished to see him. Moser waited for about an hour with Richards, Seymour, and Gallagher. About 5 or 6 p.m., Margolies arrived:

> [H]e says, well it's all over, we're bankrupt. The judge such and such signed an order at 4:00 and . . . he said we could stay on if we wanted to. He said he would handle the charter work and Norman Dell would handle the crew work and work out of the same building.

Moser testified further that about an hour later there was a further meeting in Dell's office. Dell was present with 15 to 20 drivers; Moser testified that he did not remember whether any mechanics were present, but that Dell told them that they could stay and perform the crew work for him and perform charter work for Margolies. Dell said he would pay a certain rate for crew work, and Margolies would pay 20 percent for the charter work.[41] Somebody then asked whom the employees would be paid by and Dell said they would be paid by Maintenance and Manpower. Moser also testified that during either the above-mentioned meeting with Margolies or the following meeting with Dell an employee asked either if there was going to be a union or "with our union?" and the answer (either from Margolies or Dell) was "definitely not."

Dern testified that he attended a meeting at about 7 or 8 p.m. in the back of the dispatch room on January 24, 1978, with a number of Airport's employees, Margolies, Dell, and Strauss, although he is not aware of how the employees were informed of the meeting. Present were Stokes, O'Reilly, Hubert Howie, Gallagher, Leroy Gillard, and maybe Gibson; Wing was not there; about six to eight drivers were present. According to Dern's testimony, Margolies said that Airport went bankrupt and was out of business, and there was another company that was looking for people and if anybody was interested they should speak to Dell or Strauss and he was sure they could get a job. Somebody asked Margolies if they would continue to be members of Local 875 and Margolies said that the Company already had a contract with Local 522. Dern was "on the sidelines" during conversations between Dell, Strauss, and the employees; Dell and Strauss told them:

> . . . that Maintenance and Manpower was a company that they formed, and it was to hire people to go to work, and there was immediate employment. That they could go to work immediately.

Somebody then asked what the working conditions would be at Maintenance and Manpower; Dern testified:

> And Jay [Strauss] said that these were the prices we were going to pay at least until we got off our feet and got ourselves started, and this is what we could afford. And he made it very clear, whoever wanted employment, he was ready to take them on.

Dern testified that Dell or Strauss "volunteered," saying that "we had a contract with 522 . . . I believe he said it was a two or three year contract,[42] I don't recall what, and this is the way we're going to start out."

Strauss testified that he attended one meeting that day in the drivers' room behind the dispatchers office; present at this meeting were Dell, Dern, Margolies, Stokes, and six or seven Airport drivers whose names he does not remember. He testified that Margolies said that Airport was bankrupt, but, if the employees wanted a job, they could work for Maintenance and Manpower;[43] if they wished such a job they should speak to Dell or Strauss. Strauss testified that he did not recall either Margolies or Dell mentioning Local 875, or any union, to any of the employees during this or the latter discussions.

Strauss further testified that Dell had probably asked him to speak to the maintenance employees; he did speak to some employees; although he could not testify as to what the rate of pay was that he offered them, it was less than that provided at the time in the Local 875 contract.

Leroy Andrews, who was employed by Browns and Airport as a mechanic, testified that on January 24 or 25, 1978, he reported to work at New York Boulevard at 6 a.m. and, as was his usual custom, went to Strauss' office

[40] Moser testified that prior to asking him if he would stay on, or how many employees he thought would stay on, he was never informed of the future terms of employment involved.

[41] Moser testified that Dell did state the amount he would pay for the crew work, but he did not recall what it was. Previously, the employees had been paid on an hourly basis for crew work, whereas they had previously received 25 percent on charter work.

[42] Dern testified that he did not remember whether he had seen this Local 522 contract by that time.

[43] Strauss testified that, although he was already the president of Maintenance and Manpower, he could not remember whether he was aware of Local 522 on that date and could not recall whether he (as president of Maintenance and Manpower) had already signed a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 522. This collective-bargaining agreement is dated January 16, 1978, although it is clear that under the "white out" where "16" has been typed the number "5" appears, although neither the month or the year appears to have been altered.

for his timecard. Strauss told him that he could not give him his card; when Andrews asked why, Strauss said that the night before "Airport Bus [had] gone bankrupt and they come out under a new name of Manpower something."[44] Strauss then told Andrews, "you'll still have a job if you take a cut in pay." Andrews asked, "How much?" and Strauss said, "Five dollars an hour."[45] Andrews then asked Strauss if the Union knew of the situation and Strauss said he did not know, he was only carrying out his instructions, but he could discuss it with Margolies. Andrews said that he would discuss it with Lyons, and Strauss told him that they would have a union with better benefits than Local 875 provided, and asked Andrews to see him after speaking to Lyons. Later in the day, after speaking with Lyons, Andrews saw Margolies; he testified he asked Margolies, "Mike, why should I take a cut in pay?" and Margolies said, "If you want the job that's it, take it or leave it," and walked away.

Lyons testified that he worked on January 24, 1978, and Strauss told him that Margolies would like to speak to him; Lyons told Strauss that his workday was over, and he was leaving for the day. The following morning he arrived about 7 a.m. and went to Strauss' office for his timecard. Strauss told him that it was a shame that he did not stay for Margolies' speech the night before. He then told Lyons that Airport was bankrupt, but he could work without a union for Maintenance and Manpower[46] at an hourly rate of $5 an hour. Lyons told Strauss that he could not work on that basis, with no union and no benefits.

Strauss[47] testified that he spoke to employees the day after Margolies spoke with the employees, although he could not name any employees he spoke with or the number he spoke with. He did speak to them about employment, but does not remember whether he said anything about a union, although he testified he did not tell them that they could not belong to a union.

VI. MAINTENANCE AND MANPOWER

Dern testified that Maintenance and Manpower was in the business of providing employees to individuals and companies; these employees ranged from drivers to mechanics to janitors; in the case of the drivers, it was the customer who supplied the vehicle. He testified that it began operating in December 1977 or January 1978; one company that Maintenance and Manpower supplied employees to (beginning about December 1977) was Omnibus. They previously had their own employees; when Maintenance and Manpower began operating, the former employees of Omnibus became employees of Maintenance and Manpower. Other than Omnibus, Dern could not name any customers of Maintenance and Manpower.[48] Dern further testified that neither he nor Dell owned any stock in Maintenance and Manpower, nor did he know who owned it; he was never employed by Maintenance and Manpower and never received a salary from it. The records establish, however, that he was, at one time, the secretary of the Company and received a check, dated March 17, 1978, from the Company in the amount of $92.03.

The certificate of incorporation of Maintenance and Manpower is dated October 18, 1977, and was filed by Wagner's law firm, Wagner, McNiff & DiMaio, who are also agents for service of process upon the corporation. In addition, received in evidence is the business account application of Maintenance and Manpower, dated January 16, 1978, with First National City Bank. It contains the New York Boulevard address and, where the application says "Name of Parent," the words "Holland Industries, etc" are written in. The signature card has two names: Strauss as president and David Alpert, controller. John Monfre, who was manager of the particular bank at the time, testified that the words "Holland Industries, etc." is his handwriting; although he cannot remember this situation particularly, he would have questioned the applicants in person and "whoever presented this application to me, I would've asked what the affiliation was."

Strauss testified that Maintenance and Manpower was set up by Dell, although he could provide little guidance on the Company's operation. Dell asked Strauss to be president of the Company and he agreed; Dell asked him to sign the collective-bargaining agreement dated January 16, 1978, on behalf of Maintenance and Manpower, and he did so, although he did not know whether any of the three employees who also signed the agreement ever worked for Maintenance and Manpower. He remained as president until about January 31, 1978. Strauss testified that, although he could not clearly state on what date Maintenance and Manpower began employing employees, it was not until January 24, 1978, that he saw payroll checks issued by Maintenance and Manpower.

Margolies testified that Dell "was the man behind Maintenance and Manpower," but that Holland did not own stock in Maintenance and Manpower. He further testified that Maintenance and Manpower was in the business of providing companies with personnel. As will be discussed more fully, infra, shortly after Airport was adjudicated a bankrupt, Margolies began operating a charter bus service at New York Boulevard as Shortway Charter (also wholly owned by Holland). From this time, at least, until the summer of 1978, Shortway Char-

[44] Andrews testified that this was the first mention he heard of Maintenance and Manpower; the next discussion of it was at the Local 875 meeting a few days later.

[45] It is not entirely clear whether this was a cut to $5 an hour or a cut by $5, although Andrews' testimony was very precise: "He did not say I'm going to take a five dollar cut, he said, I'm going to take a cut in pay. I asked him, 'How much?' and he said, 'Five dollars an hour.'"

[46] Lyons' affidavit refers to Strauss' offer of employment as being with "Dell."

[47] Although I have previously found Strauss to be an abrupt and unpleasant witness who constantly displayed his displeasure toward being subpoenaed to testify, I would not completely discredit his entire testimony; there were times when some brief ray of frankness and openness appeared in his testimony; I do not believe that this was one of those situations, however, as I found Lyons and especially Andrews clearly more credible than Strauss.

[48] The accountant's report to Airport's Trustee-in-Bankruptcy has a schedule for checks disbursed by Airport in excess of $1,100 between September 26, 1977, and January 25, 1978. It includes, inter alia, 13 checks to Maintenance and Manpower dated from October 20, 1977, through January 18, 1978. The checks aggregate approximately $27,000. During this period Holland received checks from Airport in the amount of approximately $200,000.

ter employed no drivers or mechanics; instead Maintenance and Manpower provided them with drivers and mechanics. Weekly, Maintenance and Manpower sent an invoice to Shortway Charter listing the number of employees provided, and the number of hours each work;[49] Margolies testified that he did not recall whether these invoices also set forth the names of the employees provided.

As stated, supra, Goza testified regarding his applications for employment at New York Boulevard. Prior to his commencing employment, the application had the name Airport on it; at the end of January, when he was ready to begin working, the employment application to be filled out contained the name Maintenance and Manpower; on the next few occasions when he was asked to fill out new employment applications (although his employment remained the same), the applications were captioned Maintenance and Manpower, Shortway, and Fugazy of Connecticut (about October 1978).

Earl Autry, who was employed by Airport as a driver, testified that he was not paid for the last week he was employed by Airport (the payroll period prior to January 24, 1978); about a month later he heard that the Company would be paying and he went to New York Boulevard and saw Dern, who told him to go to the offices upstairs, which he did. Autry introduced himself to a woman in the office, told her that he was there for his check, and she handed him a check which had the name "Maintenance and Manpower, Incorporated" on it, although Autry does not remember who signed the check. Moser likewise testified that on the Thursday after January 24, 1978, he was unable to receive his paycheck from Airport. The following week, however, Dern gave him a check with the Maintenance and Manpower name and told Moser that he was paid by a Maintenance and Manpower check because Airport was bankrupt and they could not pay from that account.

Robert Bertart, who was employed by Dell Bus or Omnibus (he is not sure which one was his employer) prior to October 1977, testified that both before and after January 24, 1978, he continued his employment at New York Boulevard. Prior to January 24, 1978, he was paid by checks from Omnibus, except for an occasional check from Airport; after January 24, 1978, the company name on the paychecks he received was Maintenance and Manpower; that was the first he had heard of it. Don Beckles, who was employed by Fugazy of Connecticut at the time of the hearing, was previously employed by, and received paychecks from, Shortway (presumably Shortway Charter) and Maintenance and Manpower, although he testified that he could not remember which he received first.

Selvin Gibson, who was employed by Dell Bus prior to October 1977, testified that sometime thereafter he received paychecks with the name Airport on them; shortly thereafter his paychecks contained the name Maintenance and Manpower, and that was the first he had heard of the Company.

VII. DELL BUS, MAINTENANCE AND MANPOWER, AND LOCAL 522

As stated, supra, the collective-bargaining agreement between Maintenance and Manpower and Local 522 is dated January 16, 1978, and signed by Strauss, as president, on behalf of Maintenance and Manpower, and a committee of employees (Samuel Riley, Selvin Gibson, and Hubert Howie) in addition to the union representative. The General Counsel alleges that the execution of this agreement, together with the maintenance and enforcement of the agreement, violates Section 8(a)(1), (2), (3), and (5) of the Act.[50] The defense to this allegation appears to be that the employees had previously been represented by Local 522 when the company name was Omnibus or Dell Bus, and therefore the execution of this agreement does not violate the Act.

Dern testified that the Dell Bus and Omnibus employees were previously covered by a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 522. When Maintenance and Manpower was created, these Omnibus employees "joined" Maintenance and Manpower and a new collective-bargaining agreement was executed with Local 522 on January 16, 1978. In evidence is a collective-bargaining agreement executed by Norman Dell as president of Dell Limousine Service, a Division of Dell Maintenance, Inc., Dell Bus, Dell Airport Service, Inc., and Fun City Private Car Service, Inc. and Local 522 covering drivers and maintenance employees. Also in evidence are letters dated March 1974 from Dell (of Dell Bus) to the Local 522 administrator and a return letter to Dell. The contract specifies that it shall be effective from July 1, 1971, through June 30, 1974. No subsequent contract was produced (other than the Janury 16, 1978 agreement) and Strauss testified that, although Dell Bus previously had collective-bargaining agreements with Local 522, they were not parties to such an agreement in 1977.

Gibson, who had been employed by Dell Bus prior to October 1977, testified that until January 1978 he never belonged to a union while at Dell Bus, and to his knowledge there was no union representing its employees. Sometime in January 1978,[51] Dell called him into his office and told him, "Gibson, I have a contract here that—we're going to have a union." Gibson answered, "How come we're going to have a union because no one approached us, we didn't have a discussion about the union." Dell said, "Well, I have this union, it's a very good union, you have nothing to worry about. I want you to read the contract and I want you to sign this union and sign this contract." Gibson asked Dell if he could read the contract before signing it and Dell said that he could. Gibson asked Dell a few questions "because I was concerned about the union, I never heard of the union before." Dell told him, "This is the union, this is the contract for the union and you're going to be the [49] Margolies could not provide the General Counsel with any records of the employees who drove Shortway Charter buses during this period or the invoices or records rendered by Maintenance and Manpower to Shortway Charter during this period.

[50] The complaint alleges no violations by either Local 522 or Local 819.

[51] He estimated that it was 2 weeks to a month after he first received a check from Maintenance and Manpower.

shop steward." Gibson told Dell that he did not know how the other drivers would feel about having a union that they had never been approached by. Dell gave him the contract and Local 522 authorization cards and told him to have the men read the contract and sign the authorization cards with the name Maintenance and Manpower. Gibson signed the contract and then gave the contract and Local 522 authorization cards to other employees.

Gibson testified that over a period of less than a month after this discussion he handed out authorization cards to the other employees; he informed them, "Here are some cards and we have a union and we want you to join." One employee whom he can remember, Johnny Boyd, complained about the fact that there was a contract although nobody had ever approached them about the Union. Gibson told him that he did not know about it, but it was given to him by Dell, who wanted everyone to sign and join the Union. Gibson then informed Dell that some of the employees informed him that they did not want to sign the Local 522 authorization cards because they did not approve of the method that was used and did not like the terms of the agreement. Dell told Gibson, "You go back and you tell the guys that if they don't sign it, these union cards, they can no longer work here."

Received in evidence were Local 522 authorization cards received by the General Counsel pursuant to subpoena. In addition to other information provided or requested, the front of the card contains a space for "Date Started" and "Birth Date," while the reverse side of the card contains a space for "Date" under the applicant's signature. This is somewhat confusing at times as, for example, Gibson's authorization card lists "1/16/78" for "Date Started" (although, he testified this is not in his handwriting) and "1/10/78" for "Date."[52] As stated, supra, Gibson began his employ at New York Boulevard prior to October 1977.

Gibson testified further that on the basis of the instructions from Dell he solicited, and received, signed Local 522 authorization cards from the following employees:[53] Neubra Smith, Phillip Brown, Johnny Eagle, Hubert Howie, Leroy Gillard, Charles Gillard, Robert Duggan, Johnny Boyd, Harvey Wolen, Robert Bryant, and Ralph Cronenberg. He could not remember soliciting the Local 522 authorization cards of Harry Graham and Frank Zito. After Gibson had obtained these Local 522 signed authorization cards he brought them to Dell, who informed him that Local 522 had a union meeting scheduled. He and Dell went to this meeting and while there they gave all of these cards to an official of Local 522.[54]

Goza, who is presently employed by Fugazy of Connecticut, testified that about March 1978 Stokes, the dispatcher, told him that in order to work in the garage the employees had to join Local 522, so he signed an authorization card for Local 522. Bertart testified[55] that while he was employed by Omnibus and Dell he does not recall being a member of any union. However, sometime in mid-January 1978, he was given a Local 522 authorization card to sign; Dell[56] told him that everyone would have to sign one; Stokes and Robert Bryant were also present at the time. Bertart held onto the card "for a while" and then signed it and returned the signed card to Dell; it is dated January 14, 1978.[57] Richards and Seymour, both of whom were employed by Airport through the bankruptcy adjudication, testified that at least through January 24, 1978, they were not aware of any union representing the Dell Bus employees.

Charles Turner, who is presently employed by Fugazy, testified that he was employed by Dell Bus from 1972 until 1974 or 1975; during that period he was a member of Local 522, which had a contract with Dell Bus which provided for, at least, their wages and health and dental benefits; Turner saw this contract and was paid pursuant to its terms. Erastus Clifton, who is presently employed by Fugazy of Connecticut, testified that he began working for Dell about 1970; he became a member of Local 522 about 1971 and was employed at Dell Bus until about 1978 or 1979.[58] During his employment at Dell Bus, he saw the contract between Dell Bus and Local 522 and he was paid the wages provided for in the contract. He testified, in addition, that he was provided with hospitalization coverage through this period and during this period he observed Local 522 representatives on the Dell Bus premises.[59]

[52] This "1/16/78" "Date Started" was written in for five other employees as well. Presumably, it was filled in by a representative of Local 522 to indicate the date on which the applicant's membership began, i.e., the date of the execution of the agreement, January 16, 1978.

[53] All of these cards list Maintenance and Manpower as the applicant's employer. The range in which they are dated (in the space below the signature space) is from January 10 to March 31, 1978. Four of these authorization cards are dated January 10, 1978.

[54] It should be noted that, although this testimony is uncontradicted, I found Gibson to be an extremely credible witness. He appeared to be solely interested in testifying to the facts as he best remembered them, without being evasive or slanting his memory one way or the other.

[55] Although Bertart was a fairly credible witness, his memory was obviously quite poor, and much of his testimony was "refreshed" by the General Counsel showing him his affidavit.

[56] At the same time, Dell told him that he was being paid by Maintenance and Manpower.

[57] In all probability, this date is in error. Bertart testified that he signed this card a day or two after a fellow employee informed him of Airport's bankruptcy. Additionally, his affidavit states that Dell gave him the Local 522 authorization card a few days after Airport "was declared bankrupt."

[58] Clifton testified that shortly thereafter he was employed by Dell Bus for 2 or 3 years after Airport moved into New York Boulevard, which would be 1979 or 1980. However, he later testified that he began working for Fugazy of Connecticut in July 1978 after Dern called him at that time and asked him if he wished to begin working for Fugazy of Connecticut; at this time, it was about a year since he had last been employed by Dell Bus. It is reasonable to conclude, therefore, that he was last employed by Dell Bus no later than 1977 since he testified he was never employed by Shortway or Maintenance and Manpower.

[59] Clifton appeared to be a fairly credible witness, although I am not convinced that he was employed by Dell Bus, and covered by a Local 522 contract, as late as 1977; other employee witnesses deny that there was any union representation at Dell Bus that late in time. Additionally, I am bothered by Clifton's unexplained failure to list his employment with Dell Bus on his employment application for Fugazy of Connecticut, while listing a summer job he was employed at for the prior 7 summers. It appears unusual that on his application for employment with Fugazy of Connecticut he would list his summer employment and not list his alleged permanent employment of 7 years, with another bus company, at the same location. Another problem attendant with Clifton's testimony is how could he have been employed full time by Dell Bus from 1970 through 1977 when his Fugazy of Connecticut employment application

Petta testified that about a week or two after January 24, 1978, Richard Stolfi, an agent of Local 875, told him that there was a dispute between Local 875 and Local 522 and, after investigating the matter, Stolfi found that Local 522 had a contract with the Dell brothers and because of that Local 875 could not demand recognition. Lyons, who appeared to be somewhat less open and frank than Petta on this issue, testified that Stolfi told him that Dell Bus had a contract with Local 522 and that he and counsel (Sanford Pollack) were working on it, but he never informed him of any final decision that Local 875 made. On August 29, 1980, Local 875 sent a telegram to the Board stating:

> Re Airport Bus et al 29–CA–6185 et al, confirming conversation of even date please be advised that Local 875 has no interest in representing any employees of the respondents in reference to the captioned matter.

VIII. SHORTWAY CHARTER

As stated, supra, in his speech to the assembled employees on January 24, 1978, Margolies informed them that he would remain at New York Boulevard with a charter operation. The General Counsel alleges, basically, that the total operations at New York Boulevard after January 24, 1978, were the same as before, and only the names had been changed; the companies there still performed the same charter and crew work and were owned or controlled by Holland.

Margolies testified that prior to January 1978 he had no affiliation with Shortway Charter,[60] but after Airport was adjudicated a bankrupt he became president of Shortway Charter which, as stated supra, was wholly owned by Holland. Shortly prior to the adjudication Holland purchased the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) rights owned by Airport.[61] According to Margolies' testimony, since Holland then owned these ICC rights, and Holland subsidiaries owned the buses which Airport had been leasing from it prior to the adjudication, it was decided that they had the ingredients for a New York charter operation.[62] Shortway Charter was previously in existence and licensed to do business in New York and it therefore was the appropriate company to engage in this operation. With Margolies as the chief operating officer and Goldman as his assistant, Shortway Charter commenced charter operations at the end of January or beginning of February 1978 at New York Boulevard. They began to wind down the Shortway Charter business beginning in June 1978 until the company ceased functioning entirely in October 1978. Since it only had a limited number of buses, all leased from Holland subsidiaries, Goldman's responsibility, in addition to obtaining customers for Shortway Charter, was to obtain buses from other companies when they did not have a sufficient quantity of buses.

Margolies was also questioned by the General Counsel as to whether Shortway Charter performed charters that had been placed with Airport prior to the adjudication. He testified that he "assumes" Shortway did obtain some of these charters, and it would conform with his technique of operating a bus company. Margolies testified further that during this approximately 6-month period Shortway Charter employed only office and sales employees; all drivers and maintenance employees were employed by, and obtained from, Maintenance and Manpower.

The bank's business account application of Shortway Charter is dated January 4, 1978, and lists Holland as "Name of Parent Company" and New York Boulevard as the address. The accompanying signature cards list Margolies as the president and Susan Margolies, his wife, as secretary. Richard Roth is listed as controller. (He is also listed as controller on the business account application for Maintenance and Manpower.)

Goldman testified that during Shortway Charter's operation from about January until October 1978, it did not perform the airport type of service such as Airport had performed; it performed some of its own charters and brokered (subcontracted) others. He called numerous companies to supply him with drivers, buses, or both; Maintenance and Manpower was only one of the companies that supplied Shortway Charter with drivers. Dern testified that, during the latter part of Shortway Charter's operation, they brokered charter work to Fugazy of Connecticut, as well as to numerous other bus companies.

The drivers employed by Airport and Shortway Charter fill out a daily log which lists the vehicle number, the carrier, and the point of origin and destination. Goza's log for the period February through December 1978 establishes that from February 1 through 4, 1978, Goza listed the carrier[63] in this log as Dell Bus; between February 5 and October 10, 1978, he listed either Shortway Lines, Shortway Charter, or simply "Shortway" as the carrier; and from October 11, 1978, he listed Fugazy Continental as the carrier. In addition, a vast majority of Goza's worktime from February through October 10, 1978, was spent driving the "49 series" buses numbered 4901 through 4912, which, prior to January 24, 1978, lists his former employer as Camp Bauman from "11/70 to 8/77" and his rate of pay as $160. Even if this were only summer employment as Clifton testified (although the application states that this employment began in November), the salary stated indicates that the work was full time.

[60] Margolies testified that from about June 1976 through January 1978 Shortway Charter was not operating.

[61] This purchase will be discussed fully infra. Suffice it to say, however, that these ICC rights grant to the holder of the rights the legal ability to operate from one point in the United States to another point so described in the rights. The New York State Department of Transportation permit is the State's equivalent to ICC rights.

[62] Margolies testified that, for monetary and other reasons, these rights were never formally transferred to Shortway Charter, so certain of its subsequent charter operations were illegal under ICC rules.

[63] The testimony of Goza regarding the factors he considered in what company name he listed as "carrier" is somewhat confusing. He testified that he stopped listing Dell Bus as the carrier on February 4, 1978, because he was told to do so. However, he did not clearly explain why, thereafter, he sometimes listed Shortway Charter, sometimes Shortway Lines, and at other times simply "Shortway." He testified that it depended upon what was contained on his work order or what was listed on his bus. Although Goza's testimony is not crystal clear on this issue, I found that he was an extremely credible witness; it should not be surprising that he could not clearly remember why he did something as compared to what he did.

were operated by Airport; after October 10, 1978, he continued to drive these buses, but with a slightly lower frequency.

IX. TRANSFER OF RIGHTS

During the period of Airport's operation, it owned ICC rights which gave it the authority to pick up passengers in certain portions of New York and Connecticut and take them outside New York State to virtually any place.[64] Margolies testified that about a week or two prior to January 24, 1978, Holland made the determination to purchase Airport's assets (including the ICC rights) if it became clear that Airport would be adjudicated a bankrupt. Margolies also testified that approximately 10 days before the adjudication it became clear to him and Brecker that there was no way that Airport could avoid the adjudication; at that point they informed Holland of the situation, and between that day and the court's approval the terms of the agreement were worked out between Holland and Margolies and Brecker.

On January 23, 1978, the bankruptcy judge issued an "Order Authorizing Sale of Assets," whereby he authorized Airport to sell its accounts receivables, trademarks, inventory, leases, and ICC rights "subject to all liens and security interests encumbering said property" to Holland for the sum of $50,000; $14,000 upon delivery of the bill of sale and other necessary documents by Airport and the remainder payable in 6 monthly installments of $6000 commencing 30 days after the closing.

The accountants report to the Trustee apparently indicates that as of the date of the adjudication, Airport was indebted to Wagner's law firm in the amount of $30,000 and was indebted to Holland in an amount in excess of $147,000. This report also states that a majority of Airport's assets (accounts receivable, inventory, property, and ICC rights) had been pledged as collateral (pursuant to ICC filings) to Wagner's law firm, Holland, and others.

Between that date and June 1978, Holland never exercised the ICC rights, although Shortway Charter was ostensibly (and illegally) operating pursuant to these rights. Margolies testified that there were a number of reasons for this; the high cost of transferring rights from one company to another as well as the fact that, since Holland itself does not operate buses, it would have had to transfer the rights to one of its operating companies and the legal fees, together with the ICC fees, would have been costly; in addition, by June 1978, the Trustee had not been fully paid for the rights and Holland was experiencing some financial difficulties generally, and specifically in completing the payments for these rights; enter Fugazy of Connecticut.

In early 1978, Fugazy of Connecticut was desirous of obtaining ICC rights which would allow it to expand its charter operation, operate regular service to Atlantic City, New Jersey, and operate a line service[65] from the airports to Connecticut. Wagner was at the time its ICC attorney, and it had asked him to ascertain if any appropriate ICC rights were available. Sometime in early to mid-1978, Wagner informed William Fugazy Jr., executive vice president of Fugazy of Connecticut, of the availability of the ICC rights involved herein. Between that time and June 13, 1978, the parties had numerous negotiating sessions; Fugazy Junior, together with the Company's attorney and controller, negotiated with Wagner, who represented the seller of the rights.[66]

On June 13, 1978, William Fugazy, as president of Fugazy of Connecticut, and Margolies, as chairman of both Holland and Dell Bus, executed an agreement providing for the sale of the ICC rights to Fugazy of Connecticut. The purchase price was $250,000[67] payable as follows: $32,000 to be paid to Holland in repayment for its payments to the Trustee-in-Bankruptcy, and $18,000 to the Trustee-in-Bankruptcy (the remainder of the $50,000 due to it) upon the ICC's granting temporary authority to Fugazy of Connecticut; and $102,000 to the Central State Bank (which Airport was heavily indebted to) and the remaining $98,000 payable to Halajen Diversified Funding, Ltd.,[68] (Halajen) (which Airport was heavily indebted to and which maintained security interests in its assets), Wagner's law firm, and Holland, payable in 30 equal, noninterest bearing installments.

In addition to the above, Fugazy of Connecticut agreed to pay annually to Holland 10 percent of its pretax profits up to $50,000, but not to exceed an aggregate of $250,000. The agreement further recites that it includes:

> . . . all of Holland's present airline crew business and its small car, limousine and stretch car business, as well as the business presently being operated by Holland's wholly owned subsidiary Dell Bus Co., Inc., and Dell's customer lists and contracts, if any.

Fugazy of Connecticut was also given an option (or, failing the exercise of the option, a right of first refusal) to purchase Holland's intra and interstate charter bus business in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut for $100,000 payable over 3 years without interest. Fugazy of Connecticut was also granted a 3-month option to lease a portion of New York Boulevard for an annual rent of $3000.

In the agreement, Holland represented that, with the exception of the security interests of Central State Bank, Halajen, Holland, and Wagner's law firm, the ICC rights are held free and clear, and that:

[64] Margolies testified that the work performed by Airport under these rights comprised approximately 35 or 40 percent of Airport's total business.

[65] With "line service" each passenger pays a fare (in this case at the airport) and can disembark at any one of a number of destinations (in this case, Connecticut). At times the fares are uniform, at other times they are dependent on the length of the trip.

[66] Fugazy Junior testified that at the time he was not aware either that Holland had only paid $50,000 for these rights or that Wagner's law firm had a security interest in the rights.

[67] The agreement recites the security interest of Holland and Wagner's law firm in the ICC rights.

[68] There is no indication in the record whether Halajen is connected, in any way, with Holland.

> Holland and Michael Margolies will execute a restrictive covenant covering all of the routes, authorities and transportation services which are the subject of this agreement, said restrictions to extend throughout the States of New York, New Jersey and Connecticut and extend for a period of five years.

On June 13, 1978, Margolies (for Holland), William Denis Fugazy (for Fugazy of Connecticut), and Altesman, the Trustee-in-Bankruptcy, entered into a stipulation reciting the facts of the agreement, and on June 19, 1978, Joel Lewittes, the bankruptcy judge, issued an "Order Rescinding and Authorizing Transfers."

Margolies testified as to the reasons Holland relinquished these rights (in addition to the healthy profit they made on it) and why, he felt, Fugazy of Connecticut was willing to pay so much for these rights. Although I have found Margolies generally to be a less than credible witness, these answers appear to be very reasonable. First, as regards Holland:

> The indebtedness to the Trustee, the potential cost of transferring the right, the working capital necessary, the advertising promotion competitive nature of the business here in New York.
> When put all together with the pressures that were on this instant company that started from nothing, with nothing, they quickly realized you just couldn't open your doors and say there's buses.
> People weren't knocking on our doors looking for us. After a reasonable short period of time we realized you need a certain amount of wherewithal to keep the thing alive while you build it up.
> Shortway Bus Charter Corp just didn't have it; Holland was aware of it and started looking around for a way to get out of it.

And as regards Fugazy of Connecticut:

> As an example, Greyhound Corporation has no rights to Atlantic City which today is a big thing. They spent literally millions of dollars attempting to obtain rights by application to the Interstate Commerce Commission.
> They weren't successful for years and years; just couldn't get it. They probably could have gone out and bought it for a fraction of what the legal bill was. They wanted to do something; they anticipated what was coming.
> Fugazy, when they bought that right from Holland had an idea that they were going to run a line run, which that right entitles you to, between various places in the State of Connecticut and the airports, LaGuardia and Kennedy.
>
> That route for another company, Connecticut Limousine, is the most profitable transportation route in the United States of America.
> Fugazy said, "We're going to go head to head with this outfit, we want those rights." They were willing to pay for it.
> They ran the route for six months and it died on them. The whole thing turned out to be a joke but at the time they desperately wanted to get into that business.

Fugazy Junior testified that Fugazy of Connecticut was granted temporary authority to operate under these ICC rights in February 1979, and commenced these operations at that time.

X. FUGAZY OF CONNECTICUT OPERATION

As the General Counsel is attempting to establish that Fugazy of Connecticut is the successor to and/or alter ego of the other Respondents, counsel for Fugazy of Connecticut elicited testimony to establish that Fugazy of Connecticut was in existence and operating at the same time as its alleged predecessors, and, in fact, was competing with them.

Fugazy Junior testified that prior to the summer of 1978 Fugazy Continental Corp. (Fugazy Continental) had an office and place of business at 212–50 Jamaica Avenue, Queens Village, New York (Jamaica Avenue). During this period Fugazy Continental performed airline crew work and luxury limousine transportation. When they obtained charter work, they subcontracted the work to other charter operators unless they could perform the charter in one of their stretch cars. Until about the summer of 1978, its operation was solely at Jamaica Avenue, where it had been located since about late 1977. It was not until Fugazy of Connecticut leased buses and purchased buses that it needed additional space and leased approximately one half of New York Boulevard.

Fugazy Junior testified that from July to October 1978 Fugazy Continental employed a number of busdrivers.[69] Although Fugazy of Connecticut did not transfer its entire operations to New York Boulevard until February 1979, beginning about September 1978, it leased space at New York Boulevard for the storage and parking of the Pittsburg and Weirton (P&W) used buses it had just purchased and for the storage of spare parts.[70] Fugazy Continental received a study, dated May 18, 1978, which it had commissioned, entitled "Feasibility Study of Fugazy Continental's Expansion Into Bus Market." The study found that its entry into the bus market (as compared to airline crew work and luxury limousine work which they were then performing) would "complement your existing transportation services" and be "feasible and essential for Fugazy to maintain its continuous expansion."[71]

[69] On June 14, 1978, prior to hiring any employees, Fugazy of Connecticut executed a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 819. Except for the date of this agreement, and the effective date of a few of its provisions, this agreement is identical to the Maintenance and Manpower and Local 522 agreement dated January 16, 1978.

[70] Fugazy Junior testified that for the period prior to February 1979 Fugazy Continental and then Fugazy of Connecticut paid $3000 a month rent for their portion of the New York Boulevard premises. However, when he examined the Fugazy cash disbursement journal and check stubs, produced pursuant to subpoena, he could not locate any record of rent payments for the period prior to February 1, 1979. He also testified that on a number of occasions he was sued for nonpayment of rent for the New York Boulevard premises.

[71] As regards Jamaica Avenue, the study states "that with minor modifications this facility can accommodate the storage, repair and maintenance of approximately five to ten buses."

Dern, like Margolies, was present on the scene during a large portion of the timeframe involved herein; he was involved with Dell Bus, and remained at New York Boulevard after January 24, 1978; beginning in May 1978, he began employment with Fugazy. Dern testified then during the period between October 1977 and the time he was hired by Fugazy he did "nothing" for Maintenance and Manpower; he did no dispatching: "My job? Using the term broadly, I was self employed. I was trying to pick up dollars selling Dell equipment."

The employees who testified on the subject saw things differently; Lyons testified that, during the period while Airport was at New York Boulevard, speaking of Dern: "He runs the show." Autry testified that during that period Dern was the chief dispatcher and Goza testified that Dern did not leave New York Boulevard until about 1980, and in September and October 1978 "he was still the chief as far as I knew."

Dern testified that about May 1978 he went to Fugazy Continental and saw Fugazy Junior. He told him that he was with Dell Bus for a number of years, and he knew limousine operations and people at their airport and he felt he could be an asset to Fugazy Continental. He was hired as "operations manager of the Fugazy Limousine Company." He testified that at that time Fugazy was only in the limousine and travel business. Approximately 2 months later after Fugazy acquired the P&W buses, he generally dispatched the Fugazy drivers, either in person or over the telephone. He remained at the Jamaica Avenue location until September 1978 when he moved to Fugazy's limousine location in Manhattan. In November or December 1978, he returned to New York Boulevard. Fugazy Junior testified that Dern contacted his office about May 1978, and asked if a job was available. He was hired as assistant director of operations for Fugazy Continental, with jurisdiction over limousine operations, crew work, and dispatching—"He was a managing dispatcher."

Dern testified that beginning about June 1978 Fugazy Continental began hiring busdrivers and it was during June, July, or August 1978 that he hired 15 to 18 busdrivers.[72] They had some ads in the newspapers which attracted some drivers and others applied after hearing of the availability from others; he interviewed and hired all these individuals at Jamaica Avenue.

Dern also testified that between June and September 1978, while he was located at Jamaica Avenue, certain of the buses (in fact, probably all of them) were located at New York Boulevard. The procedure for dispatching the drivers during this period was for the drivers to go to the Jamaica Avenue location, receive the dispatch order from Dern (or someone else) for that day or the following day, and go to New York Boulevard, pick up their buses, and leave. In addition, according to Dern's testimony, Fugazy Continental then had a "hotline" telephone at New York Boulevard, which when picked up would ring at Jamaica Avenue. Dern would instruct a driver to call him in the morning on the "hotline"[73] and Dern would give him his orders over the phone in that manner.

Carlos Gonzales testified that he was employed by Airport and Maintenance and Manpower,[74] and began working for "Fugazy" about June 1978. He testified that because "we lose a job" at Maintenance and Manpower he went to "the Fugazy Limousines" for a job "because always I do the jobs in the Airport, I know Fugazy." Gonzales went to Jamaica Avenue where he asked Dern for a job as a limousine driver, but Dern told him that they were purchasing buses and they needed busdrivers. Shortly thereafter he began driving a bus for Fugazy. During the period while Dern was at Jamaica Avenue and the buses were at New York Boulevard, he drove to New York Boulevard, picked up his bus, drove it to Jamaica Avenue, received his dispatch orders, and was on his way.[75]

Earl Autry, who was employed by Airport as a driver through January 1978, testified that in June 1978 he went to Jamaica Avenue ("Fugazy's limousine operation, as far as I know, was up there") and asked Dern if he could get a job with Fugazy as a busdriver.[76] Dern told Autry that he had a job for him, but Autry explained that he would not be ready to work immediately because of a recent death in his family. He asked Dern if Fugazy would have a busdriver's job available for him shortly when he was ready to work, and Dern assured him that they would. In August 1978, he informed Dern that he was ready to work and he began working for Fugazy[77] on that same day doing charter work and crew work. On that first day he went from Jamaica Avenue to New York Boulevard where he introduced himself to someone and got his bus. On that first day of employment with Fugazy Continental he drove in his street clothes. For the next months he wore his Airport uniform, which he owned. A few months later, Fugazy of Connecticut distributed uniforms to its drivers.

Goza testified that about July or August 1978 Sylvester Green, a driver employed by Fugazy Continental, told him that Fugazy had an operation located at Jamaica Avenue, and that Clifton, Gonzales, Arthur Davis, and Prince Glover were working there as drivers.

There was a substantial quantity of testimony, principally from Goza, regarding driver seniority at Fugazy of Connecticut. Although there is no allegation herein of unlawful discrimination in regard to Goza's position on [72] Fugazy Continental's check stubs beginning August 9, 1978, are in evidence. From that date until mid-October 1978, the payroll check stubs generally indicate the job the individual was employed in; the most common description is "mech." None of these check stubs have a notation that the employee was a busdriver.

[73] Dern testified that only the two Fugazy Continental maintenance employees—his son, Alan Dern, and Willie Green—had access to the room at New York Boulevard where the "hotline" was.

[74] Gonzales' application for employment with Fugazy Continental lists Browns, Airport, and Shortway as his former employers; he did not list Maintenance and Manpower there.

[75] Gonzales is presently second on the Fugazy of Connecticut seniority list; first on the list is Clarence Fisher, who is the shop steward, but it is not clear from the record whether Fisher is first simply because he is shop steward.

[76] He testified that a former fellow driver at Airport, Arthur Davis, informed him that there might be a job available at Fugazy Continental. Davis at that time was driving a bus for Fugazy Continental.

[77] He testified that in August and September 1978 the corporate name on his paycheck was Fugazy Continental Corp.

this seniority list, there is some relevance (albeit minor) of these facts to the ultimate issue herein.

Goza testified that his starting date on the Fugazy of Connecticut seniority list is October 11, 1978, although, he testified, "there is a little discrepancy." Ahead of him on this list were Leroy and Charles Gillard, Johnny Eagle, Stokes, Fisher,[78] Gonzales, Otis Creighton,[79] Erastus Clifton,[80] Raymond O'Kelly, Johnny Boyd, Neubra Smith, and Robert Duggan. The reason for the "discrepancy" appears to be that, since Goza was working out of New York Boulevard since January 1978, he felt that he should have had greater seniority with Fugazy of Connecticut than drivers who began working for Fugazy Continental between July and October 1978.[81] Goza testified that sometime "after Fugazy took over" in October 1978 the "old timers from Shortway,"[82] including himself, spoke to Fisher about all the names that were ahead of their names on the Fugazy of Connecticut seniority list; Fisher told them that these were the drivers who had previously been employed by Fugazy Continental at Jamaica Avenue and "they go to the top of the seniority list."

Received in evidence were the "Fugazy" payroll registers for the pay period ending June 28 through the pay period ending October 4, 1978. The first date on which these registers list names of busdrivers who had previously been employed by Airport, Dell Bus, Maintenance and Manpower, or Shortway Charter (or all or some of them) is the week ending August 2, 1978.[83] Prince Glover, Elton Nock, Stencil Stokes, and Otis Creighton appear on this payroll. Carlos Gonzales, as well as Robert Bryant, appears on the payroll the following week for the first time. Beginning the week ending July 26, 1978, and, at least, continuing through the week ending October 4, 1978,[84] Dell was on this Fugazy payroll register at $200 per week.[85]

The first buses that Fugazy Continental purchased were the used P&W buses; Fugazy Junior testified that about June he and Dell went to West Virginia to inspect these buses and that Dell was employed by Fugazy Continental for about 6 to 8 weeks and was paid as a consultant to examine the buses and make recommendations as to whether he should purchase them. They purchased 12 of these buses together with spare bus parts; the buses were delivered to New York Boulevard about July 1978, where the Fugazy name was painted on them and they were prepared for operation. Fugazy Junior testified further that in September 1978 Fugazy purchased 12 new buses from Motorcoach Industries; they expected delivery of these buses in February 1979; however, they did not arrive until June 1979; during this period between February and June 1979, Fugazy of Connecticut leased some buses from "Shortway" to cover its deficiency.[86] Margolies testified that in October 1978 Holland leased 12 buses to Fugazy of Connecticut on a month-to-month basis; these buses were leased to assist Fugazy of Connecticut which had previously purchased 12 new buses which had not yet been delivered.

XI. FUGAZY AND SHORTWAY TOGETHER AT NEW YORK BOULEVARD

Admittedly, between June or July and early October 1978, both Shortway Charter and Fugazy had buses located at New York Boulevard. Shortway Charter's entire operation was located there whereas, during that period, only Fugazy's bus operation was there. There is some conflicting testimony regarding the interaction between these two companies during this period.

In addition to its busdrivers, Fugazy had, at least, two regular employees at New York Boulevard, Dern's son, Alan Dern, a cleaner, and Willie Green, a mechanic. The pay stubs of the checkbook of Fugazy of Connecticut establish that on the first day that any checks were written from that checkbook, August 9, 1978, the employees were paid for a week's work.[87] Fugazy Junior, who testified that in the period from July 1978 through February 1979 he visited New York Boulevard "frequently,"[88]

[78] Fisher's application for employment with "Fugazy Continental Corp." is dated on the front page November 3, 1980, and on the back page July 7, 1978. The front page lists employment with Yellow Freight Company from 1970 to 1980. This conflict is unexplained.

[79] Creighton's application, which contains no company name, is dated March 9, 1978.

[80] Clifton, like Goza, for some unexplained reason also filled out more than one employment application, one on August 7, 1978, and one on September 19, 1980, where he lists "Fugazy" as his employer from July 8, 1977, to the time of the application.

[81] Illustrative of the problem is the following testimony of Goza:

Q. Isn't it a fact that these people were working for Fugazy before you started?

A. Fugazy wasn't even in existence when I started working for Maintenance and Manpower. How could they be working for Fugazy?

Q. Isn't it a fact that when you started to work for Fugazy on October 11, 1978, that there were 13 people who had already begun to work for Fugazy before you?

A. I don't know.

[82] Goza testified that he never saw any seniority list for Shortway or Maintenance and Manpower. The first time he saw the Fugazy list was about October or November 1978. It was on October 10, 1978, that he was first informed that from that date he was employed by Fugazy of Connecticut.

[83] This is not surprising as this corresponds to about the time that the P&W buses were delivered to Fugazy.

[84] Dell is not listed on the later payroll registers (Fugazy Continental) in evidence. However, I would not conclude from this that October 4, 1978, was his last day as a paid consultant for Fugazy as Dern, admittedly an employee of Fugazy after October 4, 1978, is not listed on these payroll registers as well.

[85] Fugazy Junior testified that he did not believe that Dell was ever on a Fugazy payroll.

[86] During other portions of his testimony, Fugazy Junior testified that about the latter part of 1978, or October 1978, he leased buses from Holland. During this period the number of buses leased varied from four to a greater number, and depended on the number of Fugazy buses that were nonoperational. He testified further that during this period Margolies' buses were being transported, or being made ready for transport, back to Ohio (the principal location of Shortway Lines and Holland).

[87] Other maintenance employees, J. Nicholas, Hubert Howie, H. Graham, and others, are named in these pay stubs, but the full record establishes that Green and Alan Dern were the Fugazy of Connecticut maintenance employees who were regularly at New York Boulevard.

[88] When pressed on cross-examination to be more precise, he testified that he visited New York Boulevard once a week, then "once a week," testified that Fugazy employees were not authorized or permitted to work on Shortway Charter vehicles; there was strict adherence to separation and allocation of space at New York Boulevard, according to Fugazy Junior's testimony.

Dern testified that after Fugazy moved to New York Boulevard, the area in which Fugazy employees performed maintenance work on the Fugazy buses was called the body shop. There was a door from the parking lot into the body shop and there was a door between the body shop and the Shortway Charter Maintenance area with a chain lock on it. During that period (July through October 1978) Fugazy had two regular employees at New York Boulevard—Dern and Green. At times other mechanics, such as Donald Beckles, helped out on their own time maintaining the Fugazy buses. Dern further testified that these Fugazy employees were only authorized to work on Fugazy vehicles, although he could not personally testify as to whether this rule was followed, since during this 3- to 4-month period he was present at New York Boulevard for "minutes." Margolies testified that during this period from June through October neither Shortway employees nor employees leased from Maintenance and Manpower drove Fugazy buses or performed any work on Fugazy buses.

Goza (who was employed at New York Boulevard and on October 10, 1978, became employed by Fugazy of Connecticut, infra) testified that, while he was employed by Shortway between June and October 1978, he was never told to have nothing to do with the Fugazy buses. Autry testified that he was not aware that there were separate parking spaces and separate maintenance employees for Fugazy buses, as compared to Shortway Charter buses, between August 1978 (when he obtained employment at Fugazy Continental) and October 1978. He did testify, however, as did Dern and Gonzales, that during this period there were some disagreements between the Fugazy employees and the Shortway Charter employees and dispatchers. The result of this was the Fugazy drivers had to use the "hotline" telephone in a separate room off the dispatcher's office to get their instructions directly from Jamaica Avenue.

Gonzales (who appeared to be a highly credible witness) testified that during the period of June through October 1978 (while he was employed by Fugazy) he had a specific area in which to park his bus and the Shortway Charter drivers had a specific area in which to park their buses. In addition, Green worked on Fugazy buses only and Alan Dern cleaned and fueled his bus, but not Shortway Charter buses, during that period. As regards repairs and spare bus parts, Gonzales (who had difficulty with the English language) testified, "I know, we park it and repair in different parts, Fugazy and Shortway, that's all I know," although he never watched Green perform mechanical work on the Fugazy buses. When he needed work to be performed on the bus he was driving, Gonzales filled out a defect card and gave it to the dispatcher at New York Boulevard, who, at that time, was Stokes. He testified that on a number of occasions this was the procedure he followed between August and October 1978; he did not bring the defect card to Jamaica Avenue or give it to Alan Dern. He was dispatched to jobs generally by Dern at Jamaica Avenue, where he turned in his receipts to be reimbursed for tolls.

Donald Beckles was employed by Shortway (although he testified that his paychecks sometimes had the name Maintenance and Manpower) and then by Fugazy as a mechanic. He testified that after the P&W buses were delivered to New York Boulevard (but prior to the time he received his first paycheck from Fugazy[89]) he performed mechanic's work for about a week on these P&W buses at the request of Dell, who paid him in cash for the work. He performed this work on his own time, after he had punched out on his Shortway timecard. Beckles also testified that during the period while he was employed at New York Boulevard, after the arrival of the P&W buses but before he received his first paycheck from Fugazy, the Fugazy buses were worked on in the body shop separate from the Shortway buses, but were washed and fueled in the same area as the Shortway buses. During this period Fugazy employed its own mechanics—Green, Dave Foster, and "Jean,"[90] who had previously been employed by Shortway Charter, "but after the Fugazy buses came in, they worked for Fugazy" and no longer worked on Shortway buses during their regular working time. During this period Alan Dern and "Michael"[91] cleaned and fueled the Fugazy buses only and during this period the spare parts for the Fugazy buses were kept in the rear of the body shop separate from the spare parts for the Shortway buses. Beckles also testified that "the drivers working for Fugazy and the ones working for Shortway were different. They were getting different checks." He testified that at one time (during this same period prior to Beckles receiving his first regular paycheck from Fugazy) the Fugazy and Shortway drivers were dispatched out of the same office, but "a little friction" developed between the two groups of drivers over the fact that the Fugazy buses were of a better quality. Beckles testified that he knew that there was a separate telephone for the Fugazy drivers located in the office beyond the dispatcher's office.

Autry testified that during the early period of his employment with Fugazy, and prior to October 1978, he was being dispatched by messages through the Shortway dispatcher. At a certain point that system terminated and he had to call Jamaica Avenue in order to be dispatched. During that same period, he observed Alan Dern fueling his bus.

maybe twice a week. It varied." In a prior deposition to the Board, he testified that between October 1978 and February 1979 he visited New York Boulevard "on a few occasions."

[89] Beckles first appears on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll for the week ending October 15, 1978. His name does not appear on Fugazy's check stubs for the period prior to that. Willie Green and Alan Dern, whose names appear on numerous occasions on these check stubs, are not listed on any of the Fugazy payroll registers for the periods prior to October 22, 1978.

[90] The Fugazy check stubs for the period commencing August 9, 1978, show weekly pay to Foster, Jean Nicholas (as well as Alan Dern and Willie Green) and others through October 4, 1978.

[91] The check stubs referred to, supra, give no hint as to the identity of "Michael."

Gibson, who worked part time for Fugazy ("sometime I would call them, sometime they would call me"), testified that the Fugazy dispatchers whom he spoke to while employed there were Stokes, Gaynor, Wurth, and Canaday.

Goza testified that between June and October 10, 1978, he observed the newly painted P&W buses coming from Kennedy Airport; they were driven on these occasions by Green and Clifton. Between those occasions and October 10, 1978, he only saw Green at New York Boulevard on one occasion when he brought his bus to New York Boulevard for repairs and never saw Clifton at New York Boulevard. He also testified that about the end of September 1978 (about 2 weeks prior to the date that he was informed that he was then employed by Fugazy of Connecticut) while he was still employed by Shortway Charter, he drove one of the P&W buses, as did Smith, Gonzales, Clifton, Davis, and Green, who were then Fugazy employees. Gonzales testified that during the period that P&W buses were operational in October he drove only the P&W buses, and he did not observe any Shortway drivers driving these P&W buses.

Moser testified that about March 1979 he went to New York Boulevard and observed buses that were marked Shortway Lines,[92] Airport, and Fugazy; all of these buses had the same ICC number written on them.

As stated supra, the June 13, 1978 agreement providing for the sale of the ICC rights to Fugazy of Connecticut provided, inter alia, a 3-month option to lease a portion of Holland's premises at New York Boulevard for 10 years at an annual rental of $3000, plus 50 percent of the cost of utilities and maintenance, and an option to purchase Holland's charter business for $100,000. On October 6, 1978, William Denis Fugazy (as president of Fugazy of Connecticut) and Margolies (as secretary and chairman of the board of Holland) entered into an agreement which modified the June 13, 1979 agreement in a number of ways; it provided that "[c]ash payments pursuant to Paragraph 1(a)[93] shall be limited to the $18,000 heretofore paid the Trustee in Bankruptcy." Additionally, the agreement provides, inter alia:[94]

> Included in this sale is . . . Holland's intra and interstate charter bus business originating in New York State . . . . Connecticut hereby leases a portion of Holland's premises at [New York Boulevard] at a monthly rental of $3,000, plus 50% of the cost of utilities and maintenance, commencing July 1, 1978, through October 31, 1978. Commencing November 1, 1978, Connecticut leases the entire premises at a monthly rental of $6,000 plus all costs of utilities and maintenance.

Fugazy Junior testified that about the time he (together with Dell) purchased the 12 P&W buses, Wagner informed him that he might want to lease a certain part of New York Boulevard to maintain and store these buses and the accompanying parts. Fugazy Junior agreed that there was not enough space at Jamaica Avenue for all the buses and spare parts, so beginning in July 1978, with the delivery of the buses, Fugazy of Connecticut began occupying New York Boulevard. As to the nature of the lease, Fugazy Junior testified:

> It was oral, based on how much space we really occupied—you know, two or three buses didn't really make any—we could have kept those at the Jamaica Avenue property.

He also testified that he was "sure we paid some rent" between June and October 1978, although, as stated supra, there is no convincing proof that Fugazy of Connecticut paid any rent even through January 1979. Finally, he testified that the rent was "ultimately" $3000 a month "in February of 1979, when we had all our buses."[95] Margolies testified that Fugazy of Connecticut began to occupy "some" of New York Boulevard after the June 13, 1978 agreement was signed.

On October 5, 1978, Holland (by Margolies, secretary) and Fugazy Travel & Incentive Corp., herein called Fugazy Travel (by William Denis Fugazy, president), entered into an agreement whereby Holland agreed to act as a consultant to Fugazy Travel, and not to compete with it in the travel business, and Fugazy Travel agreed to pay Holland (referred to in the agreement as "consultant") an advance of $4000 a month with the actual amount dependent on a formula based on the net profits

[92] Margolies, who is secretary and a director of Shortway Lines, testified that its ICC rights provide that it can originate trips from certain areas of the midwest (Ohio, Indiana, etc.) east to Pennsylvania, but it has no ICC or local authority to pick up passengers in New York, nor is it licensed to do business in New York. He testified "there is no possible way that a Shortway bus would ever be in a garage while Fugazy was there" or even while Airport was there. According to his testimony, the only occasion a Shortway Line bus would be at New York Boulevard, or any other garage, was if they had a bus with mechanical difficulty; if that occurred, however, Shortway Lines would use the services of a garage of Greyhound with which it has contractual relations regarding the repair of each companies' buses. I would discredit Margolies' testimony as numerous employees (who were substantially more credible than Margolies) testified to the presence of Shortway Lines buses at New York Boulevard; additionally, it is admitted that Holland leased buses to Fugazy; it is reasonable that, for this purpose, Holland used the buses of Shortway Lines—which owned 50 to 75 buses.

[93] Paragraph 1(a) of the June 13, 1978 agreement states that the $250,000 purchase price shall be payable: "$18,000 to the Trustee in Bankruptcy and $32,000 to Holland Industries, Inc.," as well as to others.

[94] In addition, this agreement provides: "In addition to the aforesaid modifications, Connecticut agrees to hire Michael Margolies as a Consultant for three months commencing October 9, 1978, at a salary of $4,000 per month."

[95] I did not find Fugazy Junior to be a credible witness. While being questioned by the General Counsel he displayed a surprising ignorance of the facts that could demonstrate either his evasiveness as a witness or his lack of knowledge of many of the facts affecting Fugazy of Connecticut. In addition, his testimony contradicts itself at certain points; for example, when asked when he paid $3000 a month rent for New York Boulevard, he testified, "I believe it was in February of 1979 when we had all our buses." However, according to his testimony, Fugazy of Connecticut did not have "all" its buses until it received its Motorcoach Industry buses in June 1979. Additional conflicts appear in Fugazy Junior's testimony regarding the occasions that Fugazy of Connecticut leased buses from Holland and his testimony regarding the frequency of his visits to New York Boulevard, supra. Finally, at the hearing Fugazy Junior testified that, with minor exceptions, Margolies did not do any consulting for Fugazy of Connecticut regarding the bus business; yet, Fugazy Junior had previously testified, during an investigative hearing, that Margolies was a consultant on the direction the bus company should take and he consulted with Fugazy Junior on the matter of purchase of equipment, and recommended the purchase of the Motorcoach Industry buses as compared to a different bus.

of Fugazy Travel. The agreement is for a term of 10 years beginning October 16, 1978, and states:

> Consultant is the sole shareholder of Executives International Travel Agency, Ltd. ("Executives"); Consultant has also been engaged in the travel business and has acquired knowledge experience and expertise concerning this business.
> Executives has this date sold substantially all of its assets to the Company [Fugazy Travel] and incident to such sale Consultant has agreed to consult with and assist the Company and not to compete with the Company in the future. . . .
> The Company desires to enter into this Agreement with Consultant in order to insure the performance by Consultant of consulting services for the Company, and to insure that Consultant will not compete with the Company. . . .
> Consultant shall render services on such matters relating to all aspects of the travel business, including matters relating to management, sales, sales management, personnel and administration and business operations, as may reasonably be requested from time to time by the Company. The Consultant shall not be under any obligation to spend particular amounts of time in connection with its duties hereunder. The Company shall not exercise supervision over Consultant in the performance of its duties hereunder, nor shall the Company require compliance with detailed orders and instructions, it being the intention of the parties that the Consultant shall have sole discretion over the number of hours, schedule of hours, and nature of services which it shall render.

Margolies testified that, during his negotiations with Fugazy Junior regarding these agreements, Fugazy Junior told him that they needed someone who knew the industry and equipment and could assist them in those areas. During the 3-month period, beginning October 1978, that Margolies was employed as a consultant for Fugazy Travel, he had an office at 1345 Avenue of Americas (Executives' office) and at 126 East 35th Street (Holland's office), and "I had the use of desk and facilities at Fugazy office, 645 Madison Avenue," all in New York City. When he was asked if he was at the Fugazy office on a daily basis during this 3-month period, he testified, "Regularly would be a better word. Not daily but certainly regularly." He also testified that during this 3-month period he spent almost his full time consulting for Fugazy of Connecticut regarding the bus business, and, in that regard, assisted it in the purchase of the 12 buses in early 1979.

Fugazy Junior testified that the primary purpose of retaining Margolies was in the travel area; as stated supra, he also testified that Margolies did not do any consulting with respect to Fugazy of Connecticut's bus business. When asked if Margolies rendered any services to any Fugazy corporation concerning bus operations, he testified:

> Not really, I mean, his function in the travel operation did necessitate occasionally discussions about bus tours and ground transportation services for group transfers related to the sale of travel; but other than that, very little.

Not too long thereafter, Margolies sued Fugazy of Connecticut under these agreements; what is relevant herein is that in a demand for a bill of particulars dated October 29, 1979, the Respondents requested: "[S]pecifically set forth nature of the services plaintiff was to perform for defendant." The bill of particulars answered "Michael Margolies was to assist in the orderly transition of the bus business from Shortway to Fugazy. This involved all aspects of the business (administration, sales, management and maintenance)."

XII. SHORTWAY DISAPPEARS

As stated supra, Goza is an employee who began working for Maintenance and Manpower just at the time of the demise of Airport, and has been employed at New York Boulevard until the present time, having later been employed by Shortway Charter and Fugazy of Connecticut. He testified that about midsummer 1978 the name on his paycheck changed from Maintenance and Manpower to Shortway Charter; at that time, as well, Stokes, the dispatcher, asked him to complete a new employment application for Shortway. His paychecks contained the Shortway Charter name until October 1978.

Goza testified that on October 10, 1978, he left New York Boulevard about 7 a.m. for a trip to Washington and returned the same day about 7:45 p.m. (On his log that day he listed Shortway Charter as the carrier.) He and Neubra Smith were walking together when Larry Canaday, the dispatcher said, "Well, you no longer work for Shortway, fellows, you work for Fugazy now." That was the extent of that conversation and beginning October 12, 1978 (he was off the next day, October 11, 1978), he listed "Fugazy Continental" as the carrier in his log. Goza also testified about the dispatchers during the pre- and post-Fugazy period in October 1978; however, this testimony is so indefinite that it will not be recited or considered.

Margolies testified that the main period of Shortway Charter's operation after January 24, 1978, was until about July 1978; prior to that time, Margolies was at New York Boulevard "regularly"; over the following 4-month period beginning in July 1978, Shortway Charter phased out its operation at New York Boulevard (Margolies was there about twice a week during that period) and by October its operation had ceased entirely.

Goldman and Roth[98] appear on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll in October 1978. (Goldman testified that he was employed by Fugazy of Connecticut in its sales department, but his employment with that company lasted only for 3 weeks.) In January 1978, shortly before the adjudication, Goldman was paid $461 a week and [98] As stated supra, at various times Roth was listed as controller of Shortway Charter and Maintenance and Manpower; Goldman was an officer of both Airport and Shortway Charter, and, for a brief time, was an officer of Holland.

Roth was paid $366 a week by Airport.[97] For the short period of his employment with Fugazy of Connecticut, Goldman was paid $460 a week; Roth was paid $366 a week by Fugazy of Connecticut.

The General Counsel, in his attempt to establish that the numerous different employers at New York Boulevard were really one employer (or, stated more succintly, that Holland, Maintenance and Manpower, Dell Bus, Shortway Charter, and Shortway Lines were the alter ego and/or successors to Airport and Fugazy was the alter ego and/or the successor of Airport, Holland, and the others) presented evidence establishing a progression of telephone numbers going from one employer to another.

523–1010: The first billing was to Cross County in October 1977 at New York Boulevard, with a final bill to Cross County at that address in May 1978. In August 1978, there was a billing to Cross County, but this time at Jamaica Avenue; in September 1978, the customer's name was changed to Fugazy Continental at Jamaica Avenue. Beginning in October 1978 through April 1979, the billing was to Fugazy Continental at West 49th Street in New York City.

657–7600: The first bill, dated October 1977, through the final bill, dated January 1978, were to Airport Bus at New York Boulevard. Beginning January 1978, the billing is to Shortway Charter, also at New York Boulevard. In November and December 1978, the billing is still to Shortway Charter, but the address is changed to 645 Madison Avenue in New York City, the address of Fugazy's office. Beginning in December 1978 through, at least, April 1979, the billing for this number is to Fugazy Continental at 645 Madison Avenue.

526–2800: Beginning in July 1978, this number was billed to Dell Bus & Limousine Service at New York Boulevard. This billing continued unchanged until January 1979 when the billing was to Fugazy Continental at New York Boulevard at least through April 1979.

526–5700: Beginning in October 1977, this number was billed to Omnibus Limousine Service at New York Boulevard. The next bill that the telephone company could locate (pursuant to a subpoena from the General Counsel) was a December 1978 final bill to the same party at the same address. There is another bill for this number for December 1978 to Fugazy Continental at New York Boulevard.

565–4175: From the first listing in November 1977 to the final billing in September 1978, this number is billed to Dell Limousine Service at New York Boulevard. In September and October 1978, the billing for this number went to Fugazy Continental at its 645 Madison Avenue location in New York City.

291–3000: The first bill in evidence for this number is to Airport at New York Boulevard, and is dated November 1977. The February 1978 bill to Airport is a final bill, and there is another bill dated later in February 1978 to Shortway Charter at New York Boulevard for this number. The final bill to Shortway Charter is January 1979; on the same date there is the first billing to Fugazy of Connecticut at 645 Madison Avenue for this number.

656–5858: The earliest bill located for this number is dated October 1977, and is to Airport Bus Service, Incorporated, Debtor-in-Possession, at Building 69. The next billing located is for January 1978 to the same customer, but the billing address is New York Boulevard. In February 1978, the customer appears as Shortway Charter at New York Boulevard; the final bill to Shortway Charter for this number is December 1978; beginning January 1979, the number is billed to Fugazy of Connecticut at New York Boulevard.

XIII. BUS OPERATIONS COMPARED

One ingredient in establishing a successorship or alter ego relationship is the similarity or identity in the operation of the companies. It is therefore necessary to examine the operation of Airport, Shortway Charter, Maintenance and Manpower (between January and October 1978), and Fugazy.

Airport was principally engaged in two forms of transportation: charter work and crew work for the airlines. Additionally, Airport, on occasion and pursuant to agreements with the airlines, transported passengers between the airports or between the airport and New York City; this transportation was paid for by the airlines.

The testimony of the employees is that at the January 24, 1978 meeting Margolies told them that he would be operating charters only, but that Dell would perform crew work, and Margolies' testimony at the hearing herein is that Shortway Charter, during the period January through October 1978, did only charter work. However, Dern testified that Shortway Charter performed crew work during this period (he estimated that they did about 30 crew jobs each day) and Goza testified that most of the work of the Company prior to October 1978 was crew work which he drove;[98] for the reasons stated supra, I would credit Goza (and, in this case, Dern) over Margolies. Dern also testified that Shortway had an operation with Yeshiva University involving six coaches daily transporting children from Brooklyn and Queens to Yeshiva University. The record also establishes that Dell continued to perform the Parking Lot No. 7 operation previously performed by Airport.

From the very beginning, Fugazy also performed charter work and crew work;[99] in addition, when Dern began his employment at Fugazy it was already operating a limousine operation[100] composed of in excess of 100 limousines. Dern also testified that at the time of his employment with Fugazy the Company was performing little, if any, passenger service work from the air-

[97] As there are no Shortway Charter nor Maintenance and Manpower payroll records available (they were subpoenaed by the General Counsel, but never produced) I am unable to determine what salary Goldman and Roth received at these companies.

[98] In this comparison of company operations, I have combined Shortway Charter and Maintenance and Manpower. The employees whom they employed who testified could not differentiate between the two, and the degree to which they have been intermingled makes it impossible to separate the two.

[99] Margolies testified that for the period July through October 1978 Shortway Charter and Fugazy were competing with each other in a limited way.

[100] Under a different Fugazy corporation.

ports.[101] He "chased" this work for Fugazy and got the Fugazy name put on the airlines' list of bus companies to call in these situations.[102] In addition, about January or February 1979, Fugazy began transporting professional baseball and football teams, both within the New York area, and from the New York area to other cities.

Dern also testified that on December 30, 1979, Fugazy commenced a bus operation to Atlantic City. This was a line run[103] which involved making stops in the five boroughs of New York, taking people to the Park Place Hotel and Casino in Atlantic City, waiting 6 hours and then returning the passengers to the New York area. Dern testified that initially this operation accounted for almost half of Fugazy's buses, 13 out of 29.

Between January and November 1979, Fugazy operated a Connecticut run, which was a line operation from the New York area airports to New Haven, making stops along the way and returning by the same route.[104] The buses made a number of trips daily to Connecticut on this line run while it was still in operation. Of all the companies involved herein, only Fugazy had an operation such as the Connecticut line run, the Atlantic City line run, and charter work for professional athletic teams.

XIV. EMPLOYEES COMPARED

The difficulty herein in comparing the employees who were employed by Airport, Dell Bus, Shortway Charter, Maintenance and Manpower, and Fugazy (of Connecticut or Continental) in determining successorship or alter ego status among these companies is the lack of documentation of the employees employed by these companies. Payroll records of Airport for the period October 1977 through January 12, 1978 are in evidence, as well as payroll records for Fugazy Continental or Fugazy of Connecticut for the period June 28 through December 29, 1978. No other Respondent supplied any payroll records pursuant to subpoenas issued. As secondary evidence on this issue, a number of employees testified regarding the employees who were employed at certain times.

There are a number of Fugazy payrolls in evidence both for Fugazy Continental and for Fugazy of Connecticut and for different periods of time. Listed on the payroll registers for "Fugazy" from August through October 4, 1978, are a total of 28 drivers;[105] of these, nine appear on the Airport payroll registers for October 1977 through January 12, 1978.[106] Of the 44 drivers listed on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll for the week ending October 15, 1978, 17 appeared on the Airport payroll registers for October 1977 through January 12, 1978. Of the 12 maintenance employees listed on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll for the week ending October 15, 1978,[107] none were listed on the payroll of Airport between October 1977 and January 12, 1978. Of the 34 drivers listed on the Fugazy Continental payroll for the week ending October 29, 1978, 17 had been employed by Airport between October 1977 and January 12, 1978. Also on the Fugazy Continental payroll for the period ending October 29, 1978, is a listing of 14 individuals who appear to be mechanics and maintenance employees. Of these, 3 had been employed by Airport between October 1977 and January 12, 1978. Finally, of the 23 drivers listed on the Fugazy Continental payroll for the period ending December 31, 1978, 11 had been employed by Airport in the period October 1977 through January 12, 1978. On that same Fugazy Continental payroll, 10 mechanics and maintenance employees are listed; 1 had been employed by Airport between October 1977 and January 12, 1978.

The lack of payroll data from Shortway Charter, Maintenance and Manpower, or Holland clearly makes more difficult the General Counsel's attempt to establish a linkage between these companies, Airport, and Fugazy. In order to fill in this gap, the General Counsel used secondary evidence of testimony of employees regarding which employees were employed by these Respondents, together with Local 522 authorization cards, to establish that Fugazy employees had previously been employed by one of these Respondents at New York Boulevard.

As previously stated, the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll for the week ending October 15, 1978,[108] lists 44 drivers, 17 of whom were on the previously mentioned Airport payrolls; none of the 12 maintenance employees listed on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll for that week were on these Airport payrolls. Apparently, the General Counsel is attempting to establish that at least another 12 of these employees had been employed by either Shortway Charter, Maintenance and Manpower, or Holland and that these companies are alter egos or successors of Airport.

In addition to the testimony of these 17 drivers,[109] the Local 522 authorization cards subpoenaed by the General Counsel establish that 2 additional drivers on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll of October 15, 1978, Phillip Brown and Leroy Gillard, were employed by Maintenance and Manpower at New York Boulevard; Brown signed a Local 522 authorization card on January 26, 1978, stating that he commenced his employment with [101] This involved unscheduled delays or cancellations for the airlines caused by mechanical difficulties or poor weather. The result is often that a large number of passengers have to be transported to another airline, another city, or to a hotel, requiring the use of a bus which is paid for by the airline.

[102] Dern testified that this work is substantially more profitable than regularly scheduled crew work.

[103] The schedule listing the stops of each of the buses appears in Fugazy advertisements in the newspapers.

[104] This was the line run referred to supra in Margolies' testimony as extremely unsuccessful.

[105] These payroll registers do not appear to list many, or all, of its maintenance employees.

[106] The last payroll supplied by Airport.

[107] Neither Alan Dern nor Willie Green is listed on this payroll; Alan Dern had previously been employed by Airport.

[108] I chose this payroll week as it is the first Fugazy of Connecticut payroll, and Shortway Charter was no longer located at New York Boulevard. On the payroll for the following week, the percentage of employees who previously appeared on the Airport payrolls is approximately the same.

[109] Johnnie Boyd, Otis Creighton, Erastus Clifton, Earl Autry, Arthur Davis, Ralph Cronenberg, Robert Duggan, Johnny Eagle, Selvin Gibson Jr., Charles Gillard, Prince Glover, Carlos Gonzales, Elton Nock, William Pearson, William Reed, Neubra Smith, and Stencil Stokes.

Maintenance and Manpower on January 24, 1978, while Leroy Gillard signed a Local 522 authorization card on March 19, 1978, stating that he commenced his employment with Maintenance and Manpower on March 19, 1978.

The remaining proof of the "bridge" between Airport and Fugazy of Connecticut, and the employees on its payroll of October 15, 1978, is based on the testimony of employees who were employed at New York Boulevard between February and October 1978. The clearest cases are Willie Goza and Donald Beckles. Willie Goza credibly testified that on separate occasions between January and October 1978 he was informed by his supervisors that he was employed by Maintenance and Manpower, Shortway, and Gugazy (on October 10, 1978). In addition, Beckles testified that he worked for Maintenance and Manpower and Shortway Charter prior to the time his name appears on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll of October 15, 1978. Goza and Gonzales also testified that Beckles was employed by Shortway or Maintenance and Manpower prior to his employment with Fugazy.

The "inclusion" or "exclusion" of the other employees on the October 15, 1978 Fugazy of Connecticut payroll is based on the testimony of Goza, Gonzales, Beckles, and Gibson.

Larry Canady—All four testified that Larry Canady was employed by Shortway Charter prior to the date that it ceased operating and Fugazy began operating. Goza testified that Canady was the night dispatcher who informed him on October 10, 1978, that, beginning that day, he was employed by Fugazy; I would therefore find that Canady was employed by Shortway during this period.

Adam Merchant—Goza, Beckles, and Gibson also testified that Merchant was employed by Shortway before Fugazy began its operation at New York Boulevard, and I so find.

Devere Foster—Goza first testified that Foster was a Maintenance and Manpower mechanic during the summer of 1978, but he later changed his testimony to the effect that Foster was not employed by Maintenance and Manpower during this period. Only Beckles also testified regarding Foster and he testified that Foster was employed by Shortway prior to his employment with Fugazy. However, the Fugazy check stubs establish that from August 9 through October 4, 1978, Foster received a Fugazy check as "mechanic" for 40 hours of work at $6 an hour. Because I found Goza somewhat more credible than Beckles, and, more importantly, because Fugazy's check stubs establish that Foster worked full time for Fugazy from August through October 4, 1978, I find insufficient evidence that Foster was employed by Shortway Charter or Maintenance and Manpower during this period.

Schlomo Benjamin—At first Goza testified that Benjamin was employed by Shortway before Fugazy; when he was questioned again about Benjamin's status, he testified, "I pass" on the issue. Gonzales testified only that he had seen Benjamin at New York Boulevard; Beckles testified that Benjamin was employed only by Fugazy, and Gibson did not remember him. I therefore find insufficient evidence to establish that Benjamin was employed by Shortway or Maintenance and Manpower during this period.

Earl Gaston—As with Benjamin, Goza first testified that Gaston was employed by Shortway before Fugazy moved to New York Boulevard, but later testified that he did not know if Gaston was employed there before or after Fugazy moved to New York Boulevard. Beckles testified that Gaston was first employed on the premises by Fugazy. I therefore find insufficient evidence to establish that Gatson was employed by Shortway or Maintenance and Manpower prior to October 1978.

Sylvester Green—Goza first testified that Green was employed by Shortway before Fugazy appeared at New York Boulevard; he then changed his testimony to the effect that Green was not employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy; his final testimony was: "I don't think so." Beckles testified that Green came in with Fugazy, and Gibson testified that he did not remember if Green was there during the Maintenance and Manpower period, "but he was there for Shortway." On the basis of the above, I find that the evidence does not support a finding that Green was employed by Shortway or Maintenance and Manpower prior to his employment with Fugazy.

Clarence Drafts—Goza testified that Drafts was employed by Shortway before Fugazy, and Beckles testified that Drafts was employed by Shortway before and after the Fugazy buses appeared in the summer of 1978. I therefore find that Drafts was employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy.

Raymond O'Kelly—Both Goza and Beckles testified that O'Kelly was not employed at New York Boulevard prior to Fugazy; Gibson testified that he did not recall the name. I therefore find that he was not employed at New York Boulevard prior to Fugazy.

Fred Waring—Goza first testified that he thought Waring was employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy; he later testified: "I don't know" whether Waring was employed by Shortway before Fugazy. Gibson and Gonzales testified that they could not remember Waring. I therefore find that he was not employed at New York Boulevard prior to his employment with Fugazy.

Laval Alexander and Calvin Morris—Beckles testified that both Alexander and Morris were employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy; this testimony is uncontradicted, and I so find.

There was also testimony regarding the maintenance employees, which includes mechanics:

Everad Vassel—Goza testified that Vassel was not employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy, but Beckles testified that Vassel was employed for a short while before the Fugazy buses arrived at New York Boulevard in the summer of 1978. Although I have generally credited Goza's testimony and memory over that of Beckles, since Vassel and the other individuals discussed below are maintenance employees whom Beckles worked more closely with, I will credit him where there is a conflict herein, and I therefore find that Vassel was employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy.

Michael Wilson—Only Goza testified regarding Wilson and he testified that Wilson was employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy, and I so find.

Jimmie Huff—Both Goza and Beckles testified that Huff was employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy, and I so find.

Horance Briggs and E. J. Vann—Beckles testified that both Briggs and Vann were employed by Shortway prior to their employment with Fugazy, and I so find.

Jean Nicholas—Beckles testified that Nicholas worked for Shortway before and after the Fugazy buses arrived at New York Boulevard. The Fugazy check stubs for August 1978 through October 1978 show weekly stubs for Nicholas for August 9 through October 4, 1978, stating "P/R Mechanic." The hourly pay rate was $4.50 an hour and the number of hours worked ranged from 9-1/2 to 27, averaging about 18 hours per week. Counsel for Fugazy might argue that this establishes that Nicholas was actually employed by Fugazy during this period and that Beckles incorrectly assumed that he was employed by Shortway simply because he saw him at New York Boulevard. However, Beckles testified that Nicholas was employed by Shortway prior to as well as after the arrival of the buses at New York Boulevard. Therefore, even if the check stubs indicate that he was employed by Fugazy beginning in August 1978, he could well have been employed by Shortway prior to that time when Fugazy did not own any of its own buses. Additionally, the check stubs indicate that Nicholas was only a part-time mechanic; he may have continued to work full time for Shortway during this period and this would correspond with Dern's testimony that during this period Green and Alan Dern were the only ones working on the Fugazy buses at New York Boulevard. I therefore find that Nicholas was employed by Shortway prior to his employment with Fugazy.

Curtis Jordan—Beckles testified that Jordan was not employed by Shortway prior to Fugazy, and I so find.

In summary, there are 56 drivers, mechanics, and maintenance employees on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll for the week ending October 15, 1978; of this number, 17 were listed on the Airport payrolls from October 1977 through January 12, 1978; 2 (Goza and Beckles) testified that they were employed by Maintenance and Manpower, Shortway, or both; 2 (Phillip Brown and Leroy Gillard) signed authorization cards for Local 522 stating that they were employed by Maintenance and Manpower during the period in question; and, finally, the testimony of Goza, Gonzales, Beckles, and Gibson establishes that 11 additional employees (Candy, Merchant, Drafts, Alexander, Morris, Vassel, Wilson, Huff, Briggs, Vann, and Nicholas) were employed by Maintenance and Manpower or Shortway Charter prior to their employment with Fugazy of Connecticut. Therefore, a total of 32 of the 56 employees on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll for the period ending October 15, 1978, were previously employed by Airport, Maintenance and Manpower, or Shortway Charter.

Finally, if Fugazy of Connecticut is found to be a successor (rather than an alter ego) herein, it must be determined whether it had knowledge of the unfair labor practices committed by its pedecessor employer. Perma Vinyl Corp., 164 NLRB 958 (1967); Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168 (1973). Admittedly, Region 29 of the Board did not file a proof of claim in the bankruptcy court with regard to Airport's unfair labor practices until June 1979. Additionally, counsel for Fugazy of Connecticut, in its brief, set forth that Fugazy Junior, in his testimony, denied acquiring any knowledge of these unfair labor practices during negotiations for the ICC rights or otherwise. Although, as stated supra, I did not find Fugazy to be a credible or convincing witness, his testimony that he would have demanded of Holland a specific indemnification agreement in the purchase agreement of the ICC rights if he were aware of the prior unfair labor practices does ring true.

The General Counsel, for his part, sets forth a number of factors that he alleges establishes knowledge (either actual or constructive) by Fugazy in June 1978 of the unfair labor practices committed by Airport. The bankruptcy court's docket for Airport contains the following relevant transactions prior to June 13, 1978; "5/9/78 Field S/C by attorney for National Labor Relations Board re: for an order vacating the automatic stay. Ret: 6/20/78 at 10:30. Filing fee paid"; "5/16/78 Filed affidavit of service by attorney for Nat'l labor relations Board re: S/C filed 5/9/78 Ret: 6/20 at 10:30"; "6/8/78 Filed Memorandum in support of complaint by attys for National Labor Relations Board re: S/C filed 5/9/78. Ret: 6/20 at 10:30." Fugazy Junior testified that he caused a search to be made of the bankruptcy court's documents to determine whether or not there were claims against any of the other Respondents involved herein and that the attorneys, who "I'm sure used due diligence [reported to Fugazy Junior that] . . . there were no claims against Holland [or Airport] at that time."

Additionally, the General Counsel points to Fugazy's employment in May 1978 of Dern in a managerial position, its early retention of Wagner to locate ICC rights that it could purchase, and its later and brief retention of Margolies, Dell, Roth, and Goldman as proof that it knew, or should have known, of the unfair labor practices committed by Airport.

One further matter that was never fully clarified is that Fugazy's cash disbursement book establishes two consecutive checks having been issued by Fugazy on February 28, 1979, each in the amount of $15,000. The name in this book next to each of these checks is "Shortway" followed by a question mark.[110] In addition, the same cash disbursement book contains an entry dated March 19, 1979, of another check payable to "Shortway" in the amount of $19,800. These three checks are carried forward to Fugazy's general ledger. Fugazy Junior testified that he did not know what these checks were for, but he knew that Fugazy did not purchase any buses from Shortway. He testified: "I have no definite confirmation of what the checks are. My suspicion is that they might have been the lease of some buses that we used." He testified further that after they purchased the 12 P&W buses in July or August 1978 they ordered 12 new buses from Motorcoach Industries in September 1978; they anticipated that these buses would be delivered in February 1979, but they were not delivered until June 1979: "So, I would say that we leased buses during that interim period from Shortway." The price Fugazy paid for these buses was about $300 a day.

[110] Another check listed in the cash disbursement book, $300 to a driver for Fugazy Continental, also has a question mark following the driver's name.

XV. ANALYSIS

A. Airport and Holland, Shortway Charter, Shortway Lines, Dell Bus, and Maintenance and Manpower as Alter Egos

Are Maintenance and Manpower, Shortway Charter, Shortway Lines, Dell Bus, and Holland separate corporate entities from Airport or "merely a disguised continuance of the old employer?" Southport Petroleum Co. v. NLRB, 315 U.S. 100, 106 (1942). In Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees, 417 U.S. 249, 259 fn. 5 (1974), the Supreme Court referred to alter ego cases as involving "a mere technical change in the structure or identity of the employing entity, frequently to avoid the effect of the labor laws, without any substantial change in its ownership or management."

The General Counsel, while alleging that Holland and the others are alter egos of Airport, admits that Holland never actually purchased the stock of Airport. This makes an alter ego finding more elusive[111] as the Board generally requires some identical ownership interests. These common ownership interests are usually present, as the "typical" alter ego situation involves a unionized employer closing his operation and reopening as a nonunion employer elsewhere or a unionized employer selling his operation in a spurious transaction simply to relieve itself of its obligations under a union contract. Big Bear Supermarkets #3, 239 NLRB 179 (1978); NLRB v. Scott Printing Corp., 612 F.2d 783 (3d Cir. 1979); Denzil S. Alkire, 259 NLRB 1323 (1982). In the situation herein there is neither common ownership nor evidence that Airport operated under Chapter XI, and was adjudicated a bankrupt, simply to avoid its obligation to Local 875, although both Maintenance and Manpower and Fugazy of Connecticut happily took advantage of the situation in order to discard the Local 875 contract.

The two principal Board cases on the issue of common ownership are Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976), and Morton's I.G.A. Foodliner, 240 NLRB 1246 (1979). In Crawford Door, supra, the Board reversed the administrative law judge, who found no alter ego status:

> . . . because in his view identical corporate ownership is the sine qua non of alter ego status. We disagree. Clearly each case must turn on its own facts, but generally we have found alter ego status where the two enterprises have "substantially identical" management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision, as well as ownership.

Although the common ownership interest in Crawford Door, supra, was not a major one (one-half of a 33-percent interest) the Board made an alter ego finding because the family involved controlled major interests in the company.

In Morton's, supra, the Board affirmed the administrative law judge's finding of no alter ego status, stating (at fn. 1):

> A finding of alter ego status requires, among other factors, the presence of "substantially identical" ownership between two enterprises. Here, neither Blackburn Foods, Inc., which owned 82 percent of the outstanding stock in Respondent Clinton, nor any of the five individual owners of Blackburn is an investor in Respondent Sam & Ed's or is in any way involved in its operation. The only stockholder present in both enterprises is Sam Morton, who owned 18 percent of the outstanding stock in Respondent Clinton and who has a 30 percent interest in Respondent Sam & Ed's. His interests in both enterprises, standing alone, are insufficient to establish "substantially identical" ownership.

The Board then distinguishes Crawford Door, supra, and stated (id.):

> Our dissenting colleague, however, would apparently require only that there be some ownership link between the two enterprises. But this would constitute an unjustifiable broadening of the alter ego doctrine and lead to a holding that enterprises with only limited similarities in ownership would be treated as alter egos, without other evidence that the new entity is but a disguised continuation of the former company. . . . Such an extension would have the unwarranted effect of precluding the bona fide sale of a business to any new enterprise whose stockholders included one who formerly held a minor interest in the closed enterprise (here, Respondent Clinton), since in all those situations there would be some continuity of direction and control.

Although Holland never purchased the Airport stock, it had no need to do so, as it appears that from June 1976 through January 24, 1978, Airport was run by, and for the benefit of, Holland. Admittedly, Holland asked Margolies to investigate Airport on its behalf, which he did. Although I do not credit Margolies' testimony that he simply walked into Building 69 and annointed himself with the title of president, it is clear that during the following 19 months he ran Airport. During this same period, Margolies was, at times, secretary and president of Holland, the chairman of Holland's board of directors, and a shareholder of Holland. In addition, Margolies agreed to assume the post at Airport at the urging of Capozzi and Wegerbauer, who fixed his salary as president of Airport at $900 a week. To further encourage Margo-lies to take the job, Holland gave him a large advance of money which was repaid directly to Holland by Airport at the rate of $500 a week out of Margolies' $900-a-week salary. Neither Holland nor Margolies made a secret of its control of Airport; Margolies testified before the bankruptcy court that Holland approached a bus company it had previously given charter business to, and said, "[H]ey, we are now in business in New York." Additionally, Margolies, in the summer of 1976, told a large number of Airport's drivers that he was the sole owner of Airport and Shortway, mentioning Holland as well. Furthermore, in a meeting in the fall of 1977, Margolies gave the representatives and shop steward of Local 875 a diagram showing Airport, Dell Bus, Shortway Lines, and others as subsidiaries of Holland and told the Local 875 representatives that Dell was the general manager in charge of Airport's dispatchers and drivers and Dern was the head dispatcher.

[111] A very recent case, American Pacific Concrete Pipe Co., 262 NLRB 1223 (1982), found alter ego status absent common ownership and common management or supervision, stating (at 1226): "In point of fact, however, Ampac exercised a degree of control over Dean so as to obliterate any separation between them." In J. M. Tanaka Construction v. NLRB, 675 F.2d 1029 (9th Cir. 1982), affg. 249 NLRB 238 (1980), an alter ego finding was made where the common ownership was only 8 percent, although the remaining stock was owned by close relatives.

In addition, there was substantial amount of business dealings between Holland and its subsidiaries and Airport during this period. Holland purchased 15 of the buses Airport was operating and leased them back to Airport; by March 1977, Airport was paying Holland $33,500 monthly for the rental of buses. From October 20, 1977, through January 18, 1978, Airport made payments to Holland for bus rentals and other items in excess of $200,000, and, beginning in March 1977, Airport paid Wagner, then Holland's secretary, $250 a week as "transportation consultant." In 1976, Holland obtained charter work for Airport and in late 1977 Holland lent $28,000 to Airport and, a week later, lent Airport money in a "revolving fund."

When Airport was experiencing difficulty with its landlord and was in need of a new garage, Holland (and Paulding) purchased Dell Bus and New York Boulevard; the agreement was signed on Holland's behalf by Margolies as president; Airport occupied New York Boulevard from October 1977 through January 24, 1978, although it was never established at the hearing that Airport paid any rent for the use of the premises. Once Airport moved to New York Boulevard all operations merged into one; this is not surprising since at that point Holland owned Dell Bus and Dell and Dern were salaried employees of Holland who were entitled to a percentage of the profits of Holland's New York operation. Vehicles marked "Airport," "Shortway,"[112] "Dell Bus," and "Browns" were all being operated by Airport's drivers, and many of the Dell Bus drivers found that they were employed by Airport after October 1977. When Dell Bus was awarded the Parking Lot 7 work by the Port Authority, they continued to use the buses that Airport had previously used on that work, and Lyons, an Airport employee, continued to service these vehicles. Lyons, Wing, and Andrews, Airport mechanics, worked on Airport, Dell Bus, and Shortway buses during this period.

An example of the commingling of the different operations at New York Boulevard is illustrated by Goza, who filled out employment applications for Airport, Maintenance and Manpower, Shortway Charter, and Fugazy of Connecticut. Further, after Airport was adjudicated a bankrupt, a number of Airport employees were initially unable to obtain their paychecks for their time worked. Shortly thereafter, a number of these Airport employees were paid with Maintenance and Manpower checks.

Between October 1977 and January 24, 1978, all the drivers at New York Boulevard were dispatched by Wurth and Gaynor, Airport's supervisors from Building 69, Stokes, from Dell Bus, and Dern. The extent of the mixture of the operations and labor relations of these companies is illustrated by the two letters sent by Margolies to Lyons late in October and early in November 1977. These letters are in answer to grievances filed by Local 875, and, on both, copies were sent to Dell.

The period prior to the adjudication is illustrative of the control Holland exerted over Airport and the fact that Airport was really being operated for the benefit of Holland. Shortly before the adjudication, Holland informed Margolies that it wished to purchase Airport's assets (actually the ICC rights were, in all probability, the only assets of any value that Airport owned) if Airport was about to be adjudicated a bankrupt. When it became clear that Airport had no choice and would be adjudicated a bankrupt, Margolies informed Holland of this approximately 10 days prior to the adjudication. Holland then purchased, with the court's approval (the day before the adjudication), Airport's assets for $50,000; 5 months later Holland sold the ICC rights to Fugazy for $250,000, clearly illustrating how valuable an "inside track" can be. In addition, Shortway Charter opened a bank account on January 4, 1978, 3 weeks prior to the adjudication, apparently in preparation for the death of Airport.

After the adjudication, Margolies, together with his management people from Airport, operated a bus charter service and crew operations at New York Boulevard under the name Shortway Charter, using Shortway Lines buses. Both companies are wholly owned subsidiaries of Holland. Margolies alleges that Shortway Charter employed no employees of its own during this period, but rather was provided with drivers and mechanics by Maintenance and Manpower; it is difficult to ascertain the truth of this allegation as neither Shortway Charter or Maintenance and Manpower was able to produce any records to substantiate this claim. At the same time, Dell was running a crew operation and operating Maintenance and Manpower out of New York Boulevard. Dern testified that neither he nor Dell owned any stock in Maintenance and Manpower, although he did not know who did own its stock. Margolies testified that Holland owned no stock in Maintenance and Manpower, and Strauss (who became its president at the request of Dell) also provided little assistance in determining the ownership of Maintenance and Manpower. However, Margolies and Strauss did testify that Dell set up Maintenance and Manpower and was the man behind it, and the business account application for the bank refers to Holland as its parent; also it paid the last paychecks to some of [112] I find that these were buses owned by Shortway Lines; Petta testified that the registration on these buses was in the name of Shortway Lines. This is reasonable, as the other company with a similar name Shortway Charter, was a broker and owned no buses of its own. Apparently, these were the buses Holland leased to Airport.

Airport's employees. In addition, it had the same controller as Shortway Charter (Roth), and was registered by Wagner's law firm, its agent for the service of process. Finally, Dell was in charge of Maintenance and Manpower while being employed by Holland pursuant to the August 24, 1977 agreement. On the basis of the above, I find that Maintenance and Manpower was in all probability owned by Holland, but was certainly operated by, and on behalf of, Holland.

From January 24 through at least June 1978, the combined operations at New York Boulevard were the same as the period prior to January 24, 1978, except that some of the company names had been changed. The employees who remained, and the new employees who were hired, performed charter work and crew work using vehicles marked "Airport," "Shortway," and "Dell Bus," as they had been doing since October 1977, and were dispatched by the same individuals who had dispatched for Airport and Dell Bus both before and after October 1977. The interchange of employees that began in October 1977 continued. The degree of interchange is illustrated by Goza's log; during his first 4 days he listed Dell Bus as the carrier; between February 5 and October 10, 1978 (the day he was informed that Fugazy was his employer) he listed "Shortway," "Shortway Lines," and "Shortway Charter" as the carriers.

On the basis of all of the above, I find that Holland, Shortway Charter, Shortway Lines, Maintenance and Manpower, and Dell Bus were alter egos of Airport; although there was never ownership of Airport by Holland, the degree of control Holland exercised over Airport by having its chairman of the board secretary, and/or president as the president of Airport made the actual ownership of Airport unnecessary. Since Airport was being operated for Holland's benefit there was no need for Holland to expend a large sum of money in order to purchase its stock. Shortway Charter and Dell Bus are alter egos because, in addition to being subsidiaries of Holland, together they assumed Airport's operation after January 24, 1978, with some of Airport's employees and the buses that Airport used. Shortway Lines is an alter ego because, in addition to being a subsidiary of Holland, its buses were constantly intermingled with Airport's buses in Airport's operation from the summer of 1976 through January 24, 1978, and the period thereafter through about June 1978.

The General Counsel also alleges in the alternative that these companies constitute a single integrated business enterprise. The Supreme Court in Radio Union v. Broadcast Service, 380 U.S. 255 (1965), set forth the criteria for determining whether several nominally separate business entities constitute a single integrated business enterprise: interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations, and common ownership. In Operating Engineers Local 627 v. NLRB, 518 F.2d 1040 (D.C. Cir. 1975), the court stated:

> [W]e conclude that "single employer" status, for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act, depends upon all the circumstances of the case, that not all of the "controlling criteria" specified by the Supreme Court need be present.

In NLRB v. Triumph Curing Center, 571 F.2d 462, 468 (9th Cir. 1978), the court stated: "The Board has determined that no single criterion is controlling, although it considers the first three, which evidence operational integration, more critical than the fourth, common ownership." See Bryar Construction Co., 240 NLRB 102, 104 (1979). In Gerace Construction, 193 NLRB 645 (1971), the Board stated that the degree of common control of labor relations is a critical factor in this determination, and "such common control must be actual or active, as distinguished from potential control."

There was a large degree of common control of labor relations among all these companies, except Holland, which has no employees. There was a large amount of interchange of employees among these companies (excluding Shortway Lines, which itself appeared to have only buses, not employees, regularly in the New York area) and Margolies and Dell were in charge of the labor relations policies of these companies; further evidence of this was that Margolies sent Dell copies of his letters to Local 875 regarding certain grievances in October and November 1977 even through Dell held no formal position with Airport. Interrelation of operations and common management are clearly present herein, as discussed supra. All that is missing is common ownership, but all the other factors being present, I find Airport, Holland, Shortway Lines, Shortway Charter, Maintenance and Manpower, and Dell Bus to be single integrated business enterprises.

Having found these companies to be alter egos and, in the alternative, single integrated business enterprises, I find it unnecessary to determine whether Holland, Maintenance and Manpower, Dell Bus, Shortway Charter, and Shortway Lines are also successors to Airport.

On the basis of all the testimony on the subject, I find that the following was said to the employees in the early evening on January 24, 1978: Margolies told them that the court had that afternoon declared Airport bankrupt, so that it was out of business; and either Dell or Margolies then said that any employees who wished to work could drive crews for him under Maintenance and Manpower, while Margolies would only operate charter work under the name Shortway. Dell (rather than Margolies) then informed the employees of the rates they would be paid (less than they had been paid under the Local 875 agreement) and that there would be no union representing them. Some of the employees accepted this proposition and began working for Maintenance and Manpower; others refused to accept, and left.

In making the above finding, I have generally credited the testimony of the employees over that of Margolies, Dern, and Strauss. The most difficult point in that regard was the finding that Dell told the employees that there would be no union in their future employment at Maintenance and Manpower. Maintenance and Manpower might argue that Dell could not have said that because of the existence of the collective-bargaining agreement dated January 16, 1978, between Maintenance and Manpower and Local 522, which was a continuation of the longstanding collective-bargaining relationship between Dell Bus and Local 522 going back to, at least, 1971, as testified to by Dern. However, I do not credit Dern and, based on the testimony of the employees (but not Clifton), I would find that Dell Bus did not have any collective-bargaining relationship with Local 522 between the expiration of the 1971 through 1974 agreement and the agreement dated January 16, 1978. I would discredit Clifton's testimony as it relates to Local 522 being his collective-bargaining representative after 1974; there were conflicts in this testimony and it was unsupported by the testimony of any other employee.

A more difficult problem inherent in this finding is that a number of the Local 522 authorization cards are dated prior to January 24, 1978; therefore, it might be argued, if the General Counsel is alleging that Dell directed Gibson to solicit these cards,[113] and some of the cards (as well as the Local 522 agreement) are dated prior to January 24, 1978, how can the General Counsel also allege that Dell said at the January 24, 1978 meeting that there would be no union to represent the Maintenance and Manpower employees? Timing is the important factor here, and Gibson testified that it was sometime in January 1978, about 2 weeks to a month after he received his first check from Maintenance and Manpower, that Dell asked him to solicit the cards on behalf of Local 522. He also testified that over the next month he gave the Local 522 cards to his fellow employees. Based on Gibson's testimony, it is still not clear whether Dell approached Gibson before or after January 24, 1978, as it is not clear when Maintenance and Manpower issued its first paycheck, although Bertart testified that he did not receive his first Maintenance and Manpower check until January 24, 1978. However, six of the Local 522 authorization cards contain dates prior to January 24, 1978; these are the cards signed by Gibson, Neubra Smith, Hubert Howie, Johnny Eagle, Johnny Boyd, and Samuel Reilly. The dates on the cards of Gibson and Smith are clearly in the same handwriting, and that handwriting is different from the handwriting throughout Gibson's and Smith's authorization cards. The handwriting on the other cards, as well, does not appear to match the writing where the card is dated, although the difference is not as clear as on the cards of Gibson and Smith. Despite these cards, I would maintain my prior credibility determination that Dell told the employees on January 24, 1978, that there would be no union representation for them at Maintenance and Manpower. By thus conditioning the employees' continued employment on their acceptance of wages lower than those provided in the Local 875 agreement, and working without union representation, these Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Finger Lakes Plumbing Co., 253 NLRB 406 (1980).

On January 24, 1978, and thereafter, Airport, Shortway Charter, Shortway Lines, Maintenance and Manpower, and Dell Bus withdrew recognition from Local 875, refused to enforce the collective-bargaining agreement between Airport and Local 875,[114] unilaterally changed its terms and conditions, and refused to recognize or bargain with Local 875. At the hearing herein, these Respondents did not allege any good-faith doubt of Local 875's majority status among its drivers and mechanics; they therefore have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.[115]

B. Fugazy of Connecticut as Alter Ego

I have made the findings, supra, that Holland, Maintenance and Manpower, Dell Bus, Shortway Lines, and Shortway Charter are alter egos of Airport despite the fact that there was no common ownership interest between Airport and the others. As stated, I make this finding because, in my view, the degree of the control that these companies exercised over Airport made the actual purchase of Airport's stock unnecessary. The situation with Fugazy of Connecticut is somewhat similar in that there was no common ownership between Fugazy of Connecticut and of these other companies; however, because the degree of control present with Airport and the other Respondents is not present with Fugazy of Connecticut and Airport, I do not make such a finding herein. To be sure, there are many factors herein that satisfy the requirements set forth in Crawford Door and Morton's, supra; Fugazy paid no rent for its occupancy of New York Boulevard from about June 1978 through January 1979, and made some unexplained payments to Shortway in the amount of almost $50,000; it employed Dern from May 1978 to the present time and Margolies and Dell for a shorter period as consultants on their entry into the bus business. During the period from about June until about October 1978, there was some mixture of buses between Fugazy and Shortway Charter, and, during this period and continuing through part of 1979, Fugazy was leasing buses from Holland (Shortway Lines). In the June 13 and October 6, 1978 agreements, Fugazy of Connecticut purchased Holland's ICC rights and appears to have purchased all of Holland's New York operations, but there is no evidence that these agreements were anything other than arm's-length transactions; Holland, after all, made $200,000 profit on the ICC rights after holding them for less than 5 months. Finally, there is the progression of telephone numbers often beginning with Airport, being changed to Shortway Charter, and then later being changed to Fugazy of Connecticut. However, this is not necessarily proof of alter ego status; rather, it appears more as a business decision [113] Clearly, Dell's direction to Gibson to obtain signed Local 522 authorization cards from the employees, and his execution of the collective-bargaining agreement with Local 522 (whether it took place before or after the cards were signed), constitutes assistance to Local 522 in violation of Sec. 8(a)(2) of the Act. Sav-on Drugs, 227 NLRB 1638 (1977). As this agreement contains a union-security clause it likewise violates Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act.

[114] As this agreement was never disaffirmed by the bankruptcy court, the bankruptcy cannot be used as a defense herein. In re Handy Andy, Inc., 109 LRRM 3298, 97 LC ¶ 10,265 (Bankr. W.D. Tex. Mar. 15, 1982).

[115] Although I find that these Respondents violated Sec. 8(5) of the Act by refusing to recognize and bargain with Local 875, I will not issue an order requiring them to do so. Shortly after January 24, 1978, Stolfi informed Petta that because another Teamsters Local was involved Local 875 would not demand recognition of Maintenance and Manpower-Dell Bus-Shortway Charter-Shortway Lines, and in August 1980 Local 875 informed the Board that it had no interest in representing these employees. I will therefore not engage in the futile act of ordering these employers to recognize and bargain with Local 875 due to its unwillingness to participate in such actions, and the General Counsel is in agreement with this.

to continue the telephone number being used by another bus company in the hope of acquiring some business from customers calling that company, unaware that they were no longer is existence.

On the other hand, there is substantial evidence that Fugazy was a company separate and distinct from the others; prior to June or July 1978, Fugazy had its operation at Jamaica Avenue, rather than New York Boulevard, and between that time and October 1978, they were each engaged in bus charter operations, competing on a minor scale (as Shortway Charter was then winding down its operation). In addition, while Fugazy and Shortway Charter were both located at New York Boulevard there was a substantial separation of their operations, both maintenance and driving, and one interesting result of that separation was the friction that developed between the Shortway Charter drivers and the Fugazy drivers over the superior condition of the Fugazy buses. Finally, Fugazy of Connecticut operated the line run to Connecticut, the Atlantic City run (which accounts for a substantial amount of its total business), and charter work for professional athletic teams—work that neither Airport nor the others ever performed. I therefore find that Fugazy of Connecticut is not an alter ego of Airport, Holland, Maintenance and Manpower, Dell Bus, Shortway Charter, or Short-way Lines.

C. Fugazy of Connecticut as Successor

In NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272, 281 (1972), the Supreme Court stated:

> But where the bargaining unit remains unchanged and a majority of the employees hired by the new employer are represented by a recently certified agent there is little basis for faulting the Board's implementation of the express mandates of § 8(a)(5) and § 9(a) by ordering the employer to bargain with the incumbent union.

Since Burns, the Board and courts have attempted to determine whether the "employing industry" remained substantially the same. Border Steel Rolling Mills, 204 NLRB 814 (1973). Clearly, the most important factor in this regard is whether a majority of the alleged successor's work force had previously been employed by the predcessor. Stewart Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 362 (1982).

In Pacific Hide & Fur Depot v. NLRB, 553 F.2d 609 (9th Cir. 1977), the court, although refusing to enforce a Board Order, stated:

> The decisions require that, in such a case [allegation of successorship], and absent a refusal to hire because of union animus, a majority of the work force of the purchasing employer in the unit be former employees of the seller in that unit. If that is the case, there is a duty to bargain, it being assumed that the holdover majority continues to desire representation by the union.

Additional factors to be considered are whether the business itself has remained substantially the same and at the same location, basically, with the same supervisors, machinery, and product. Blazer Industries, 236 NLRB 103 (1978); Stewart Chevrolet, supra.

The General Counsel has initially sustained his burden by establishing that a majority of the employees of Fugazy of Connecticut on its October 15, 1978 payroll (which is reasonably representative of its payrolls in that period) had previously been employed by Airport or its alter ego Maintenance and Manpower and Shortway Charter. The remaining additional issue, therefore, is whether the employing industry remained substantially the same between Airport and Fugazy of Connecticut.

In Woodrich Industries, 246 NLRB 43 (1979), the alleged successor reopened the plant after a 3-week hiatus with 59 employees, 40 of whom had been employed by the predecessor when it ceased operations. At the time the alleged successor reached its full complement of employees, 3 weeks later, 95 employees were employed; either 43 or 53 of them had been employed by the predecessor when it ceased operating. Neither the administrative law judge nor the Board reached the issue of whether a majority of the successor's employees had previously been employed by the predecessor; rather, they found that there was no successor obligation, reasoning: "Based on the foregoing factors, we conclude that, on balance, the nature and character of the employing industry has been sufficiently altered so that Respondent is not a successor to Murcel." The "foregoing factors" the Board considered were whether there was substantial continuity in operations, location, work force, working conditions, supervision, machinery, equipment, methods of production, product, and services.

On Airport's last payroll, the dispatchers are listed as Wurth and Gaynor; in addition, there was testimony that Stokes (who is listed on this payroll with the drivers) and Dern also dispatched for Airport. Neither Wurth nor Gaynor is listed on the Fugazy of Connecticut payroll for the week ending October 15, 1978; Stokes and Dern were dispatching for Fugazy of Connecticut at that time, as was Canady.

Fugazy of Connecticut is operating out of New York Boulevard, the same location as Airport; when Fugazy of Connecticut commenced operations, it operated with some of its own buses (the P&W buses) and some of the buses previously used by Shortway Charter and Airport, which it leased from Holland. It was not until the delivery of the Motorcoach Industry buses in mid-1979 that Fugazy of Connecticut operated entirely with buses that had never been used by Airport. The testimony of a number of employees regarding the friction between the Shortway Charter and Fugazy drivers due to the better quality buses the Fugazy drivers were operating indicates that the working conditions at Fugazy of Connecticut may have been somewhat better than the conditions at Airport. Finally, a comparison of the operations of the two reveals that Airport performed charter work, crew work, and work for the airlines transporting passengers to hotels or other locations at the Airport. Fugazy of Connecticut also performs this type of work, but, unlike Airport, this does not constitute its entire operation. Most importantly, it operates the Atlantic City line run, which Airport never operated; for 10 months in 1979 it operated a Connecticut line run from the airports, which Airport never operated; and it performs charter work for professional athletic teams, which Airport never performed.

On the basis of all of the above factors, most especially the fact that a majority of the Fugazy of Connecticut employees on October 15, 1978, had previously been employed by Airport or its alter egos I find that the nature and character of the employing industry has not been sufficiently altered for Fugazy of Connecticut to evade its successorship obligation. Woodrich Industries, supra. Although there are differences between the operation of Fugazy of Connecticut and Airport, these differences are not substantial enough. Although Fugazy of Connecticut at one time operated the line run to Connecticut, now operates the line run to Atlantic City, and since mid-1979 has operated a fleet of buses completely different from Airport, the employment responsibilities of its drivers and mechanics is substantially similar to what it was when they were last employed by Airport on January 24, 1978. I therefore find that Fugazy of Connecticut is a successor to Airport.[116]

Having found that Fugazy of Connecticut is a successor to Airport, it was bound to recognize and bargain in good faith with Local 875. Burns, supra. It did not do so and therefore violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, although no remedy will be ordered to remedy this as Local 875 has disclaimed any interest in these employees, supra. Being a successor, rather than an alter ego, of Airport, Fugazy did not violate the Act by its refusal to comply with the terms of the Airport-Local 875 collective-bargaining agreement. Burns, supra.

D. Fugazy of Connecticut's Responsibility for Unfair Labor Practices Committed by Airport

Having found that Fugazy of Connecticut is a successor to Airport, it must next be determined if it is obligated to remedy the unfair labor practices found herein.[117] In Perma Vinyl Corp, 164 NLRB 968 (1967), enfd. sub nom. United States Pipe & Foundry Co. v. NLRB, 398 F.2d 544 (5th Cir. 1968), the Board stated (164 NLRB 968):

> [W]e are persuaded that one who acquires and operates a business of an employer found guilty of unfair labor practices in basically unchanged form under circumstances which charge him with notice of unfair labor practice charges against his predecessor should be held responsible for remedying his predecessor's unlawful conduct.

This was followed by Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, supra, where the Supreme Court affirmed the court of appeals decision which affirmed the Board Order (at 187 NLRB 1017 (1971)) which held that a successor employer, which purchased the predecessor's operations with knowledge of its unfair labor practices, was bound to remedy those unfair labor practices.

In Am-Del-Co., Inc., 234 NLRB 1040, 1041 (1978), the Board stated: "It is well settled that the responsibility of establishing that a new employer was without knowledge of its predecessor's unfair labor practices at the time it took over the latter's operation rests with the alleged successor."

On the basis of the above, the burden is on Fugazy of Connecticut to establish lack of knowledge; as Perma Vinyl, supra, refers to "under circumstances which charge him with notice," this need not be actual knowledge; it is enough if the successor knew or should have known.

The strongest evidence of knowledge by Fugazy of Connecticut are the three notations in the bankruptcy docket, dated May 9 and 16 and June 8, 1978, referring to actions by the Board in the proceeding. Fugazy Jr. testified that he had his attorneys search the bankruptcy court's documents prior to June 13, 1978, for any claims against Airport, and he was sure they used due diligence, but did not advise him of any such claim. As stated, supra, I did not find Fugazy Junior to be a credible witness and would find that, even if his attorneys did not catch them, these pre-June 13, 1978 notations were adequate to put Fugazy of Connecticut on notice of the unfair labor practices committed by Airport. In addition, a month prior to its purchase of the ICC rights, Fugazy hired Dern, who was present at New York Boulevard during the period when the unfair labor practices occurred, and, in fact, was present at a number of the meetings conducted on January 24, 1978. Although I do not impute knowledge to Fugazy simply by its employment of Dern in a managerial position, it is not unreasonable to assume that, in the month Dern was employed by Fugazy prior to the June 13 agreement, he discussed the earlier events that occurred at New York Boulevard with representatives of Fugazy. I do not consider herein Fugazy's subsequent employment of Dell, Margolies, or others previously associated with Airport as imputing knowledge to Fugazy as these events occurred subsequent to the purchase of Airport's ICC rights.

I therefore find that Fugazy of Connecticut has not met its burden herein, and is therefore liable for remedying the unfair labor practices committed by its predecessor, Airport.

XVI. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondents set forth above in sections IV through XV, occurring in connection with the Respondents' operations described above in section I, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to [116] The collective-bargaining agreement between Fugazy of Connecticut and Local 819 was executed on June 14, 1978, at a time when it had no employees. Although this would ordinarily be a clear violation of Sec. 8(a)(2) of the Act, no unfair labor practice charge was filed against Fugazy of Connecticut until May 7, 1979, almost 11 months later. In addition, no evidence was adduced by the General Counsel that the existence of this collective-bargaining agreement was concealed by the parties. Hot Bagels & Donuts, 227 NLRB 1597 (1977). Nor is there a continuing violation herein, such as an allegation of a members-only contract. Schurr Stern Food Corp., 227 NLRB 1650 (1977). This allegation is therefore barred by Sec. 10(b) of the Act and is dismissed. Machinists Local 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411 (1960).

[117] Having found that Holland, Maintenance and Manpower, Dell Bus, Shortway Lines, and Shortway Charter are alter egos of Airport, they are liable to remedy its unfair labor practices.

trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondents are each employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 875, Local 522, and Local 819 are each labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Holland, Shortway Charter, Shortway Lines, Dell Bus, and Maintenance and Manpower are alter egos of Airport.

4. Airport, Holland, Shortway Charter, Shortway Lines, Dell Bus, and Maintenance and Manpower constitute a single integrated business enterprise.

5. Fugazy of Connecticut is a successor to the business operation of Airport.

6. Respondents Airport, Holland, Shortway Lines, Shortway Charter, Dell Bus, Maintenance and Manpower, and Cross County violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act by:

(a) Assisting Local 522 in obtaining signed authorization cards from its employees.

(b) The execution of the collective-bargaining agreement dated January 16, 1978, with Local 522, at a time when Local 522 did not represent an uncoerced majority of the employees.

7. Respondents Airport, Holland, Shortway Lines, Shortway Charter, Dell Bus, Maintenance and Manpower, and Cross County violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by:

(a) The execution of the collective-bargaining agreement dated January 16, 1978, with Local 522, said agreement containing a union-security clause requiring membership in Local 522 as a condition of employment.

(b) Conditioning employment of Airport's employees upon the employees' accepting wages, and other terms and conditions of employment, lower than those provided by the Airport-Local 875 collective-bargaining agreements dated December 29, 1976, and by the employees' relinquishing their right to union representation.

8. Respondents Airport, Holland, Shortway Lines, Shortway Charter, Dell Bus, Maintenance and Manpower, and Cross County have violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing to recognize and bargain with Local 875 on January 24, 1978, and thereafter, by refusing to enforce the terms and conditions of employment as specified in the collective-bargaining agreements dated December 29, 1976, between Airport and Local 875, and by unilaterally changing the terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the bargaining unit covered by these agreements.

9. Respondent Fugazy of Connecticut violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing and refusing to recognize and bargain with Local 875.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I have found that Respondents Airport, Holland, Shortway Lines, Shortway Charter, Dell Bus, Maintenance and Manpower, and Cross County have, inter alia, violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by failing to employ certain of Airport's employees on or after January 24, 1978, because they refused to accept terms and conditions of employment less than those provided in the Airport-Local 875 collective-bargaining agreements dated December 29, 1976. I have also found that these Respondents conditioned continued employment on the employees' relinquishing the right to union representation; employees who refused to accept employment on this basis are also 8(a)(3) discriminatees. As regards these two classifications of employees, I shall recommend that the Respondents each be ordered to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings suffered as a result of the discrimination by payment of a sum equal to that which they would have earned, absent the discrimination, with backpay and interest computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[118]

As to those employees who accepted the employment offer of January 24, 1978,[119] I shall recommend that all of the Respondents reimburse them for the difference between what they received in their employment with Maintenance and Manpower or Shortway Charter and what they lawfully should have been paid pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreements dated December 29, 1976, between Airport and Local 875, also with interest computed as stated supra. As discussed supra, although I have found that these Respondents unlawfully refused to recognize or bargain with Local 875, no order will be entered in that regard as Local 875 disclaimed any interest in these employees.

I have found that the execution, maintenance, and enforcement of the collective-bargaining agreement dated January 16, 1978, between Maintenance and Manpower and Local 522 violated Section 8(a)(2) and (3) of the Act. As the employees paid dues to Local 522 pursuant to the union-security clause of this agreement (the 8(a)(3) violation), I will recommend that all the Respondents be ordered to reimburse the employees for the dues paid to Local 522.

[Recommended Order and fns. 120 through 123 omitted from publication.]

[118] The names of these individuals are attached hereto as "Appendix A." The list was compiled from the General Counsel's further response to the Respondents' demand for a bill of particulars, as "the names of employees discharged by Respondents on January 24, 1978."

[119] Due to the absence of Maintenance and Manpower and Shortway Charter at the hearing, the parties were unable to determine the names of these individuals; this will be left for a supplemental proceeding.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION IN BACKPAY SPECIFICATION

Consolidated with the above matter was the backpay specification to determine the amount of backpay due to Holrick White which would make him whole for his losses resulting from his discharge on August 13, 1976. This discharge was found to be unlawful in a decision of Administrative Law Judge Karl H. Buschmann dated September 20, 1977,[124] which decision was affirmed by the Board (no statement of exceptions having been filed) by Order dated November 1, 1977. The Board's Order was enforced by the court on September 19, 1978.[125]

I. BACKGROUND

White had been employed as a bus mechanic for Airport from 1969 through July 2, 1972, when he was laid off by Airport. During that period Airport subcontracted a number of its smaller crew jobs to Clayton Wynn, d/b/a Wynn V.I.P., herein called Wynn, among others; during this period Wynn also performed repair work, exclusively for Airport, utilizing Airport's facilities at Building 69. On August 1, 1976, Wynn employed White as a mechanic.

On August 9, 1976, White filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board alleging his discharge by Airport as unlawful. The administrative law judge found that Wynn discharged White on August 13, 1976, at the demand of Margolies, in retaliation for White's filing the charge with the Board in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act.

II. FACTS AND ANALYSIS

White was the only witness testifying in this portion of the proceedings, and he testified credibly, often supported by forms, pay stubs, or letters provided by his employer or former employers. While employed by Wynn he performed mechanical work for 40 to 50 hours weekly and was paid approximately $180 for this work. During the same period he performed crew work for Wynn as well; the hours worked varied depending upon the flight schedules, but White averaged about $125 a week in earnings for this work.

From the date of discharge (August 13, 1976) through early 1977 White was unemployed. White testified that except for a 1-month period in about September 1976, when he was unavailable for work due to his mother's illness, he made a diligent search to obtain employment during this period. He testified regarding visits (once or more than once) to approximately 17 employers in an effort to obtain employment. He obtained employment at Chad Operating Corp. (Chad) during the first quarter of 1977 and he continued his employ at Chad until early in the fourth quarter of 1977, at which time he was discharged. Approximately a week or two later[126] White obtained employment at Mala Industries, Inc. (Mala). Sometime about the end of December 1977, Mala ceased its business operations and within a few days White obtained full-time employment with Salem Transportation Co. (Salem). About January 1978 White obtained additional employment at Servair Maintenance, Inc. (Servair) where he was employed for approximately 32 hours a week.[127] At that time, and throughout the period that White was employed by both Salem and Servair, his hourly rate of pay at Salem was approximately 20 percent higher than that of Servair. When White began this period of employment at both Servair and Salem his hours at Servair were 7 a.m. to 3:30 p.m., while his hours at Salem were from 4 p.m. to midnight. Thereafter, about June 1979 Salem changed White's working hours to midnight through 8 a.m. When this conflict arose White chose to remain at Servair because they "had more to offer to me. It had better benefits . . . coverage and everything."[128] About a week later (the week ending June 17, 1979) White obtained additional employment at Schenck/Universal Bus Corp. (Schenck); he was employed there through the week ending September 16, 1979, working from 10 to 22 hours a week. From the fourth quarter of 1979 through the fourth quarter 1980, White was employed only by Servair.

Respondent Fugazy of Connecticut in its brief here did not cite any specific defenses to this backpay specification; however, from its cross-examination of White during the hearing it appears that its defenses are that White did not make a reasonable effort to obtain work between the time of his discharge and his employment at Chad, and that he was not sufficiently diligent in attempting to locate a high-paying job.

The applicable legal principles, as stated in Aircraft & Helicopter Leasing, 227 NLRB 644, 646 (1976), are as follows:

> An employer may mitigate his backpay liability by showing that a discriminatee "wilfully incurred" loss by a "clearly unjustifiable refusal to take desirable new employment." (Phelps-Dodge Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 177, 199–200 (1941)), but this is an affirmative defense and the burden is upon the employer to prove the necessary facts. N.L.R.B. v. Mooney Aircraft, Inc., 366 F.2d 809, 813 (C.A. 5, 1966). The employer does not meet that burden by presenting evidence of lack of employee success in obtaining interim employment or of low interim earnings; rather, the employer must affirmatively demonstrate that the employee "neglected to make reasonable efforts to find interim work." N.L.R.B. v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Company, 360 F.2d 569, 575–576 (C.A. 5, 1966). Moreover, although a dis-

[124] Wagner was counsel for Airport in the matter.

[125] The court's Order is addressed to "Respondents, Airport Bus Service, Inc., and Clayton Wynn d/b/a Wynn V.I.P. Limousine Service, their officers agents, successors, and assigns."

[126] Since his employ with Chad, this is the only period during which White has been unemployed.

[127] The compliance officer for the Region testified that because White worked 20 to 25 hours overtime for Wynn they established a 5/8 ratio and determined that Wynn and the other Respondents were entitled to a credit of 5/8 of White's earnings at Servair while he was also employed at Salem. Therefore, during the period of the first quarter of 1978 through the second quarter of 1979, 5/8 of White's earnings at Servair are credited to the Respondents as interim income.

[128] At the time of the hearing White's salary at Servair was $6.06 an hour, and he was paid time and a half for overtime and holidays.

> criminatee must make " reasonable efforts to mitigate [his] loss of income . . . [he] is held . . . only to reasonable exertions in this regard, not the highest standards of diligence." N.L.R.B. v. Arduini Manufacturing Co., 394 F.2d 420, 422–423 (C.A. 1, 1968). Success is not the measure of the sufficiency of the discriminatee's search for interim employment; the law "only requires an honest good faith effort." N.L.R.B. v. Cashman Auto Company, 223 F.2d 832, 836 (C.A. 1, 1955). And in determining the reasonableness of this effort, the employee's skill and qualifications, his age, and the labor conditions in the area are factors to be considered. Mastro Plastics Corp., 136 NLRB 1342, 1359 (1962).

Fugazy of Connecticut has not met this burden; White credibly testified to visiting numerous employers in his attempts to obtain employment from the date of his discharge to his employment at Chad. These attempts clearly represent, at the least, a reasonable effort to obtain employment.

Fugazy of Connecticut also appears to defend on the ground that White is working fewer total hours than he did at Wynn and that since he commenced full-time employment at Servair he has not looked for higher paid employment elsewhere, nor has he looked for additional employment to supplement his earnings at Servair. Fugazy might defend that since White, while employed by Wynn, had worked approximately 70 hours a week, and that is the amount of hours worked that his gross backpay is computed on, he is obligated to obtain employment working a comparable number of hours in order to mitigate backpay; i.e., that since he was credited with this amount of hours he should be required to obtain employment involving the same number of hours worked. I find it unnecessary to decide this question; for a period of almost a year and a half White did work at two jobs simultaneously—Salem and Servair—one full time and one almost full time, and the Respondents were given credit for a portion of these overtime hours. It was only after Salem changed his working hours, so that they conflicted with his hours at Servair, that he terminated his employment at Salem. In what I find is an illustration of White's good faith, at that time, June 1979, he obtained part-time employment for the next 3 months with Schenck. Since that time he has been employed solely by Servair full time, working overtime when available.

An employee is held only to "reasonable exertions" in his duty to mitigate backpay and is not held to the "highest standards of diligence." NLRB v. Arduini Mfg. Corp., supra; McCann Steel Co., 224 NLRB 607 (1976). Clearly, White satisfied that standard and should not be penalized because he was not able to locate an additional regular job.

I find that Respondents have not shown that White incurred a willful loss of interim earnings.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The backpay formula as propounded by the General Counsel is appropriate in determining the moneys due White[129] to make him whole for losses incurred by him as a result of the discrimination practiced against him on August 13, 1976, until the final period covered by the amended backpay specification, the fourth quarter of 1980.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[130]

ORDER

The Respondents, Clayton Wynn d/b/a Wynn V.I.P. Limousine Service, and Airport Bus Service, Inc., New York, New York, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns,[131] shall make whole Holrick White by paying him the sum of $16,238[132] for the period August 13, 1976, through the fourth quarter of 1980, plus interest thereon in the manner heretofore prescribed in this case.

[129] Because White testified that he was unavailable for work for a month about September 1976, I would alter the gross backpay figure for the third quarter of 1976 from $1,224 for 4 weeks to $612 for 2 weeks.

[130] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[131] Or alter egos, as discussed and decided above.

R & K Caterers, Inc. and Local Union 274, a/w Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union, AFL–CIO. Case 4–CA–13726

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 27 April 1984 Administrative Law Judge John H. West issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a cross-exception, supporting brief, and response to the Charging Party's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Charging Party has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent has excepted to the judge's failure to reach its contention that the recognition clause in the proposed contract was unlawful under Sec. 8(e) of the Act. In light of our decision to dismiss the complaint, we find it unnecessary to pass on the Respondent's cross-exception.

DECISION

JOHN H. WEST, Administrative Law Judge. Upon a charge filed May 19, 1983, against R & K Caterers, Inc. (R & K or Respondent) by Local Union 274, a/w Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union, AFL–CIO (the Union) a complaint was issued July 15,[1] alleging that R & K violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by refusing since late April the Union's request to execute a written contract embodying a full and complete agreement, with respect to terms and conditions of employment of a described unit, reached about March 15. Respondent denies the allegation.

A hearing was held in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on December 1. On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the demeanor of witnesses and consideration of the briefs filed in March 1984 by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Pennsylvania corporation, is engaged in the business of kosher catering with its principal place of business in Merion, Pennsylvania. The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that at all times material herein, Respondent has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. It is also found that the Union has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. The Facts

R & K began operating in January 1981 after Rosenthal & Kaufman ceased doing business. The latter was in business for 20 years as a kosher catering partnership. In 1980 it was managed by Kenneth Kaufman who is now president of R & K.[2] Since 1955 Rosenthal & Kaufman belonged to an association, along with five other kosher caterers. Originally the Union negotiated contracts with the association. However, in 1980 the involved caterers contracted separately with the Union even though their contracts were the same. The last agreement between Rosenthal & Kaufman and the Union was effective January 15, 1980–January 14, 1983. (G.C. Exh. 2.) As indicated above, in midterm of the contract Rosenthal & Kaufman ceased doing business. R & K advised the Union of this along with its, R & K's, desire to discuss a contract. Subsequently, a dispute arose between R & K and the Union as to whether the former was an alter ego or successor to Rosenthal & Kaufman and whether R & K was, therefore, responsible for health and welfare and pension payments. Eventually the matter was settled.

In January 1981 Kenneth Kaufman was also president of Warken Caterers, Inc. which was the banquet caterer at the Warwick Hotel (Warwick) in Philadelphia. This nonunion caterer was sold by Kenneth Kaufman in January 1982 to Hospitality Investments Inc. (Hospitality). Subsequently, when dealing with catered banquets at the Warwick, R & K would send the food, the necessary equipment (i.e., dishes and silverware), and a chef, who would oversee the heating up of the food, to the hotel and all else, including personnel to serve, etc., would be provided by the Warwick or Hospitality. Before Warken was sold, R & K would send the food and equipment to the Warwick and Warken supplied (1) chefs, (2) waiters

[1] Unless indicated otherwise, all dates are in 1983. On brief, the General Counsel points out that par. 6 of the complaint through inadvertence refers to Respondent rather than the Union as being the exclusive representative of the unit and moves for an amendment of the complaint to correct this mistake. The unopposed motion is granted.

[2] Rosenthal of Rosenthal & Kaufman was Kenneth Kaufman's grandfather. The other partner was Kenneth Kaufman's father, Henry Kaufman. Unless indicated otherwise, all references, infra, to Kaufman will be to Kenneth Kaufman.

from its normal complement (referred to as its "chain gang"), and (3) dishwashers. If additional waiters were required by Warken, they were obtained from the Union. Warken paid the equivalent of union wages to its bartenders, waiters, and waitresses but did not have a dues checkoff.

After Warken was sold the Union challenged the method utilized at the Warwick for handling catered banquets. Among other things, i.e., filing charges with the National Labor Relations Board, the Union on June 15, 1982, made a demand for arbitration to R & K alleging that there was "[u]nlawful subcontracting of bargaining unit work and breach of recognition and successorship clauses of the contract through arrangements at the Warwick Hotel."[3] Such demand was resisted by Einhorn, who in his June 21, 1982 response to the American Arbitration Association stated that R & K was not "a party to any agreement or contract that required it to arbitrate alleged claims such as made by [the Union]." (R. Exh. 3(t).) Subsequently, without waiving R & K's objections to the submission of the claim to arbitration, Einhorn participated in a choice of arbitrators. (R. Exh. 3(bb), dated July 28, 1982, et al.)

In early December 1982, while the above-described arbitration matter was still not resolved. Harvey Young of the Philadelphia office of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service contacted Kaufman about a meeting the Union requested with the involved caterers to negotiate a contract since the involved catering contracts were expiring on January 14. Kaufman told Young that he had some "personal problems regarding . . . [his] catering at the Warwick" and he did not think that he was going to attend. Kaufman then spoke with Einhorn who in turn also advised Young that Kaufman would not attend the joint meeting between the involved caterers (one other caterer did not attend) and the Union.

Einhorn testified that after speaking to Young he went away on vacation "and for reasons unknown to me, Mr. Kaufman chose to go down to the meeting, as I later found out because he felt it was industry wide bargaining on the wages"; and that prior to negotiations with the Union in December 1982 he advised Kaufman as follows:

> I told Mr. Kaufman that when they get into negotiations on the new contract, that this subcontracting issue had to be resolved in that new contract, and I also told him, if he wanted, I would involve myself in that portion of the contract to try to negotiate it, and I told him that it was an absolute must, that that issue had to be settled in this new contract.
> . . . .
>
> Because if that issue wasn't resolved I knew what percentage of Mr. Kaufman's income came from the kosher work at the Warwick, and I knew that if it was not resolved, favorably to him, so that he could continue to operate there, as he did in the past, he probably was going to go out of business.[4]
> . . . .
> What I said to him was, that we had to have language inserted into that contract, that specifically allowed us to do what we had been doing in the past. And that is why I felt ultimately, that I was going to be involved in drafting the language.

Although he had almost no negotiating experience, Kaufman decided to attend the joint negotiating sessions at the office of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Services. With respect to the first session, which was held late in December 1982, Kaufman testified as follows:

> [Young] said to me, I'm surprised to see you here, your attorney said that you were not going to partake of these joint discussions. I told him that my disputes with the union had to do with a working condition at the Warwick Hotel, and it is something that I felt that I could iron out or negotiate with them as an individual, but since the wage package, whatever was to be arrived at in wages, at these meetings I would be forced to take, because they are not going to give one caterer a lesser price than someone else, and I thought it was to my advantage to be here to be part of this wage discussion since I was going to pay it.[5]

[3] The demand was made of Edgar Einhorn as attorney for R & K. As pertinent, the above-described agreement between Rosenthal & Kaufman, G.C. Exh. 2, reads as follows:

ARTICLE I

RECOGNITION

Section 1.1 EMPLOYER recognizes the UNION, Local 274, as the sole and exclusive collective bargaining representative of the Employer's Cooks, Kitchen Employees, Bartenders, Waiters, Waitresses, Busboys, Captains, Head Waiters, working in the establishment or on a job hereafter operated or being serviced by the Employer or in any other establishment where the Employer may cater in all matters relating to collective bargaining such as employing employees, wages, hours of work, working conditions and adjustment of grievances. The designated representatives of the UNION shall constitute the UNION representatives in all negotiations as to matters of bargaining which shall be conducted. All clauses of this agreement shall apply to the EMPLOYER and their successors and assigns, partners, supervising employers and associates. The word "successors" as above applies only to a successor for the kosher catering business of a caterer to this agreement. In the event that a caterer sells his business to a non-kosher caterer then this clause will not apply to the new non-kosher caterer.

[4] Kaufman testified that in December 1982 between 20 and 25 percent of R & K's business involved situations where other employers provided service personnel for functions; that different hotels have different arrangements and R & K abides by the wishes of the owner of the hotel; that other kosher caterers used the employees of the hotels to serve; that in many specified cases in the Philadelphia area the situation was the same as at the Warwick, namely, the caterer provided the food and the hotel provided the personnel; and that this situation existed for years and was not challenged by the Union until 1982.

[5] James Washington, a business agent for the Union who attended this session, testified that Kaufman said:

> . . . that we are not here to negotiate anything with the Warwick Hotel or some words to that effect, but we weren't there for that purpose, and we of course, didn't discuss anything with reference to the Warwick Hotel.

James Small, president of the involved local, also attended this session. He testified:

> Before we sat down at the negotiating table, Ken Kaufman said to me, in front of everybody, that he wanted to make it perfectly clear,

Continued

At another point, Kaufman testified that he advised Young at the first session that "my Warwick issue was a private issue, and I would get involved in that after we discussed wages." Further, Kaufman testified that while everybody else was there to try to reach a contract, he believed his opening remarks to Young "eliminated the possibility of [R & K and the Union] reaching a contract, at anytime during those negotiations."

There were four negotiation sessions with the last one held on March 3, 1982. Washington, Small, and Kaufman attended all of them. Regarding the sessions, Washington testified that the first was merely a presentation and a review of what the proposals were; that the second session dealt with a review of health and welfare, pension, and other economic issues, and the employers offered a counterproposal regarding wages; that at the next session wages and a most favored nations clause was discussed; that at the second or third session it was agreed that the "language remain the same throughout the contract, with the only change being there was wages as far as the numbers was concerned"; that at the fourth session wages were discussed with the employers making a proposal; that at that point there were no other outstanding issues; and that at this last session Small advised the employers that he would not recommend the final offer but he would take it back to the membership for ratification.[6] Kaufman's testimony regarding what was discussed at the negotiation sessions did not differ materially from Washington's.[7] The former testified that as he left the last session

> [i]t was . . . [his] understanding, number one, we would find out if the wage package was accepted, and number two, the union and I would sit down and get the language straight on my operating in the Warwick and other places.

With respect to the above-described recognition clause, Washington testified that it was never discussed during the above-described negotiating sessions; that the issue of what it covered was never raised during the negotiating sessions; and that there was no change proposed in the recognition clause.[8] Kaufman testified that he did not advise the Union before or during negotiations that he wanted the above-described recognition clause modified because he did not even know that the above-described difference of opinion was based on this clause; that since he did not know what, if any, clause the Union was relying on in challenging the operation at the Warwick, he did not indicate to the Union that the terms of the proposed agreement should be modified to remedy the Warwick situation; and that he "wanted something added to the contract that said I could continue doing what I have been doing for thirty years."

During the course of the above-described negotiations Kaufman did not request private or side-bar meetings with the Union. Small testified that after the last negotiation session and up to the ratification described below (1) neither the Union nor any of the involved caterers made additional proposals, and (2) R & K did not notify the Union that it had a problem with the contract.

On March 10, the members ratified the agreement. Kaufman was notified of this by Young and Washington.

In the beginning of April Washington contacted Kaufman and brought a typed contract to Kaufman at his office for him to sign. Kaufman told Washington that Kaufman wanted to review it. Washington testified that Kaufman then indicated that the name typed on the front cover of the agreement, Rosenthal & Kaufman, was incorrect and it should be R & K Caterers, Inc. Washington left the agreement and Kaufman, according to the testimony of Washington, stated that he would "get back to . . . [Washington as to] when . . . . [he] could come back to pick it up." Washington also testified that Kaufman indicated that he wanted to have his attorney look at the agreement, which—according to Washington—was a common practice.[9] Kaufman testified that when

> Washington called and said that he wanted to bring the contract out to me to be signed . . . I told him he could bring it out. I could not sign it at that point, as I wanted to show it to my attorney, as we had some non-wage issues, and I want to go over them with the attorney.[10]

Einhorn testified, regarding the agreement, that Kaufmann

> . . . either . . . told me that they settled the wage issue, or he called me when the contract was delivered to him, and I said you now must settle the problem at the Warwick, and that that contract is not to be signed until the Warwick problem is settled.

Later in April Washington returned to Kaufman's office with corrected contracts which read "R & K Caterers, Inc." (G.C. Exh. 3.)[11] Washington testified that before we started any negotiations, wages was the only thing to be discussed, the only purpose there was to negotiate a kosher caterers contract. That nothing else would be discussed, no Warwick, no Warwick situation, and whatever.

[6] Washington's testimony regarding the last negotiating session was corroborated by Small.

[7] As indicated by the testimony and Kaufman's notes on the negotiations, G.C. Exh. 4, a number of the items included in the proposed agreement were discussed.

[8] Assuming that R & K was the successor to or the alter ego of Rosenthal & Kaufman, it was Washington's understanding in 1981 and 1982 that under the above-described recognition clause, "if R & K serviced a kosher luncheon at the Warwick, and the Warwick and some other employees served the food, that this contract required that those employees that served the food be covered by this contract." Washington was aware of the above-described arbitration matter before negotiations commenced in December 1982 and he was aware that R & K did not agree with the Union's position regarding the Warwick.

[9] Small testified that he would not say that as a general rule in negotiations in the involved industry both sides traditionally submit drafts of contracts to their attorneys and "[i]n this instance, with the caterers it is surprising because it is the same contract, after contract, after contract."

[10] While Kaufman recalled pointing out to Washington that the name of the Company on the cover of the agreement was not correct, Kaufman believed that he made this observation at the second meeting with Washington later in April but he was not sure. At one point Kaufman testified that at this meeting "[a]ll I did was accept the contract, and I told him I would get back to him."

[11] The agreement was already signed by union representatives. Washington testified that Kaufman had left a message at Washington's office that Kaufman would like to meet with Washington.

to the best of his recollection Kaufman said "that he would only sign this contract if we would remove actions taken against him with reference to the Warwick Hotel"; and that then Washington

> . . . [told Kaufman] I couldn't understand what one thing had to do with the other . . . and then I picked up the contracts that I had brought at that time, and I never left them with him.

While Washington laid the contracts on Kaufman's desk Washington did not show Kaufman the contract nor, as indicated above, did he leave a copy with Kaufman. Regarding the second meeting with Washington, Kaufman testified:

> I think he [Washington] called up a short time, a week or later whatever. I don't remember the exact time, and asked me if I was ready to sign the contract, and I said I hadn't gotten together with my attorney yet. He called me again, and I at that time told him he could come out, but I did have some problems with the contract and I would like to discuss them with him.

With respect to what was said during his second meeting with Washington, Kaufman testified as follows:

> I mentioned to him that the word association was used in the contract, and we are no longer associated. I also mentioned that the contract should be made out to R & K Caterers, not Rosenthal and Kaufman. He said he had no objection to that, he would make that change . . . . To my knowledge it happened in the second. To be honest, I don't recall if I objected in the first or second meeting. I also said to him that we have an outstanding issue, in regards to the Warwick Hotel, and for the way I am operating there, and I said, I voiced that in the beginning of the negotiation. I didn't pursue it further at that time, because I didn't think it was anybody's business, but between the union and I, and I said that I wanted to sit down with the union and our attorney and see if we could iron out the language to finish the contract. He said that he would take the—You know,—He didn't say no, he said that he would take the information back, speak with Jimmy Small, and speak with Ira Silverstein, and he would get back to me. No one ever got back to me. About a week later, my attorney got a letter from Ira Silverstein that if I didn't sign the contract immediately, they were going to start a proceeding with the NLRB.

Later Kaufman testified as follows regarding his second meeting with Washington:

> When I . . . [returned Washington's call], I told him I wanted to see him because I had to go over some things with this contract that—You know, I couldn't sign it, but I would like to meet him, you know, in my office to go over with him why.
> To my recollection, at that time we talked about the names, but I could have mentioned the name the first time. Then I told him, that we still had the open issue regarding operations at the Warwick Hotel, and I told him that this issue should be negotiated before we signed this contract, so that we can go on and live with this contract and we should sit down and have a meeting with the lawyers and settle this point.

Finally, Kaufman testified that he would have signed the contract at the second meeting with Washington if they were able to resolve the Warwick Hotel problem at that time.

All of the other kosher caterers who participated in the group negotiations signed individual contracts which were the same as that offered to R & K.[12] Kaufman testified that he thought the recognition clause has been in contracts agreed to by other Philadelphia area kosher catering companies for years, and that other caterers in that area handle kosher functions at hotels where employees of someone other than the caterer serve the food.

Einhorn testified as follows about a conversation he had with Silverstein about Kaufman not signing the contract:

> I said to him, let's get the whole problem at the Warwick resolved, both in the past and for the future with the new contract, and will you talk to the union to see if we can't resolve it, because I said I want to get rid of the arbitration; and I want to settle the problem for the future with a new contract, and he said I will get back to you after I talk to the union.

By letter dated May 13, 1983, Silverstein advised Einhorn:

> I have reviewed the 274–R & K situation with my client and I have been advised that the negotiations between Local 274 and R & K were finalized and an agreement reached and that your client is simply refusing to sign the agreement because of a pending arbitration. My client is unwilling to withdraw the arbitration and it is our position that your client's refusal to sign the contract in this situation is an Unfair Labor Practice. We would appreciate your returning to us a signed contract within one (1) week or we shall be forced to proceed with whatever remedies are available to us before the National Labor Relations Board.

Regarding the last sentence of the above-described letter, Einhorn testified that he did not at that time have in his possession an unsigned copy of the contract; and that he "never had the contract until we got involved in all these proceedings." Subsequently, Einhorn testified (1) that he remembered Kaufman telling him "that there was a problem that they had the names all mixed up, that they had the wrong—that they had the association in, and that they had the wrong name for his corporation"; and (2) that he requested a copy of the contract, which was delivered to Kaufman, and that his "best recollection . . . [was] that . . . [he] got it before Ira Silverstein's letter to . . . [him], so Ira wrote . . . [him] in May of this year, and . . . [he] would assume that . . . [he] got it sometime towards the end of April, beginning of May."

[12] They were as follows: Barclay Caterers, Cohen Caterers, and Norm the Caterer. While another kosher caterer, Pressman the Caterer, did not attend any of the sessions, he signed the contract. And while Betty the Caterer negotiated individually with the Union, it was concerned with a pension question.

R & K has honored all of the economic terms of the contract.

B. Contentions

On brief, the General Counsel argues that it has long been settled that where an employer and union have reached agreement as to the terms and conditions of employment either party is required by law, on the request of the other, to sign a written collective-bargaining agreement embodying such understanding; that the question in these types of cases often turns on whether the objective facts indicate that there has been an agreement on the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement; and that either party's good-faith belief that a contract has or has not come into existence is irrelevant. It is the General Counsel's contention that Respondent, by refusing to sign unless the Union withdrew the arbitration demand it had filed against Respondent with respect to Respondent's operation at the Warwick, has conditioned its execution of the contract on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. Assertedly Kaufman had earlier agreed to the contract and specifically stated just before the first negotiating session that he was not there to discuss the Warwick situation. It is pointed out by the General Counsel that at no point either before or during the negotiations did Kaufman indicate to the Union that he wanted the recognition clause of the contract changed to accommodate his situation. Also the General Counsel contends that the fact that Respondent has honored all of the economic terms of the contract strongly suggests that Respondent believed and still believes that it has an agreement with the Union.

Anticipating that Respondent would argue that the instant case is analogous to Checker Taxi Co., 228 NLRB 639 (1977), the General Counsel asserts that that case is distinguishable since in Checker a union representative knowingly misled respondents there regarding the content of the proposed contract and the Board refused to bind respondents to the agreement finding instead that there is a statutory obligation of mutual good faith. The General Counsel submits that in Checker from the very beginning of the negotiations there was a sharp disagreement on respondents' demand that it be allowed to lease taxicabs to nonemployees, a position which the union members opposed. Here, the General Counsel contends, there was no such sharp disagreement on the recognition clause of the contract during the involved negotiations, there was an agreement among the parties at the session held in the latter part of January and at the final session that the contract's language would remain the same, at no point either before or during the negotiations did Kaufman indicate to the Union that he wanted the recognition clause of the contract changed to accommodate his situation, Kaufman did not request during the course of the negotiations a separate meeting with the Union to negotiate Respondent's problems at the Warwick, and the Union, unlike in Checker, did not at any time mislead Respondent.

Respondent's argument, made at the hearing herein, that it was relieved from executing the contract because it was illegal under Section 8(e) of the Act in that the recognition clause of the contract as it was applied was designed to force Respondent to cease doing business with another employer because that employer was not union, is, according to the General Counsel, without merit and should be rejected for even assuming, arguendo, that the clause was an issue in the instant proceeding or that Respondent could properly raise its legality as a defense to its refusal to sign, it is clear that the clause does not violate Section 8(e) of the Act because (1) the clause is ambiguous and as such the Board will not presume unlawfulness, (2) Respondent must come forward, which it failed to do, with extrinsic evidence that the clause was intended to be administered in an unlawful manner, and (3) the clause does not violate Section 8(e) because Respondent is resisting the Union's alleged unlawful interpretation of the clause.

Respondent, on brief, contends that at the first negotiating session Kaufman advised the Union that while he would participate in negotiations concerning economic issues that would apply to all caterers, there would remain issues between the Union and his company that would have to be resolved "before any final agreement could be reached." (R. Br. 16.) Assertedly Kaufman's version of what was said is consistent with the history of parties' positions taken prior to the negotiations and is certainly more probable than the testimony as related by the union negotiators. Furthermore, Respondent argues that it is unlikely that Kaufman would have failed to indicate his intent to separately negotiate an unresolved issue that affected a substantial portion of his business particularly after having been instructed to do so by his attorney.

It is pointed out by Respondent that it is well settled law that where there is no "meeting of the minds" as to essential terms of an agreement and where parties differ as to their understanding of such terms, there is no contract which the parties can be directed to sign; and that this principle applies even when the failure to achieve a meeting of the minds or the misunderstanding can be traced to an ambiguity for which both parties are equally to blame. Respondent contends that

> . . . [t]he ambiguity present in the instant case is not only a misunderstanding as to the meaning of the agreement but also the Union's alleged failure to understand that Kaufman intended to continue separate negotiations with the Union to resolve this misunderstanding after conditional approval of the wage portion of the agreement was reached in group negotiations. [R. Br. 18.]

Assertedly approval of the agreement even if expressed in an unconditional form does not create an agreement when the approval was conditioned in fact or where the party accepting the agreement did so with an understanding that differed from the understanding of the party seeking to require execution.

Respondent contends that there was no meeting of the minds here since allegedly the Union was aware that Respondent objected to the Union's interpretation of the agreement as it had attempted to apply the agreement at the Warwick, the Union was told that Kaufman entered the group negotiation for the purpose of discussing economics only and that he intended to discuss the Warwick problem in separate discussions, the terms of the new agreement as they might relate to outstanding legal issues had been the subject of discussions between the parties' attorneys before negotiations started and the practice of the parties had been to submit drafts of final agreements for approval by attorneys, and there could have been no meeting of the minds even if a final agreement had been reached at the group negotiations as it is undisputed that the Union attempted to force Respondent to execute a contract that was significantly different from the contract it submitted to other caterers for signature and this fact is undisputed as the Union does not deny that it allows other caterers to use customers' employees to serve food but, based on the same language allegedly agreed to at the same negotiations, asserts that the contract does not permit Respondent to do so.

Industrial Engineering Co., 173 NLRB 77 (1968), is cited by Respondent for the proposition that a union would not be allowed to indirectly force an employer to agree to language for which it knew it had not bargained. Checker, supra, is cited by Respondent for the proposition that the Board will not allow a union to bind an employer to an agreement despite the employer's misconception as to how the union would construe a clause of the agreement, and for the proposition that the argument that the language could be clarified in arbitration is without merit since the function of arbitration is to interpret an agreement reached rather than alter, avoid, rescind, or create an agreement.

With respect to the General Counsel's contention at the hearing herein that Respondent had no right to refuse to sign the agreement by insisting on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining—the withdrawal of an arbitration case—Respondent asserts that the issue is not this simple since

> . . . the primary reason for the refusal to sign the agreement was not the arbitration matter itself but rather whether the Union would agree for the future under the new agreement to permit Kaufman to operate as he had in the past and as it permitted all other employers to operate under the same contract language. [R. Br. 24–25.]

Assertedly, it was not a nonmandatory bargaining demand to request (1) to discuss whether the Union would permit Respondent to sell food without the added requirement that the purchaser's employees be union and be covered under the terms of the agreement, and (2) to ask for an explanation and for relief from an arbitrary position taken by the Union that singled out Respondent as the only employer having a specific burden under the contract when the same language applied to all caterers. Respondent contends that even assuming the Union had no obligation to drop an arbitration case which assertedly was initiated in bad faith to exert pressure on a third-party employer, the Union nevertheless was obligated to attempt to address for the future contract the difficulty caused Respondent by the Union's subjecting it to a special set of rules that admittedly had never applied in the past. But, allegedly it was obvious that the Union had no intent to negotiate in good faith on this issue and its failure to do so was the primary reason for the failure to obtain a signed agreement. It is submitted by Respondent that the fact remains that Kaufman wanted an agreement under which he could operate as he had in the past and the Union was unprepared to give him such an agreement. Assertedly it follows that no agreement was reached with Respondent.

Finally, Respondent contends that Union Representative Washington admitted that the Union's interpretation of the recognition clause of the agreement required the customer to honor the agreement with respect to the customer's employees; that the language of the clause itself supports such an interpretation; that the law does not permit the parties to enter into an agreement that creates any such obligations; and that, therefore, Respondent cannot be found guilty of an unfair labor practice by its failure to commit an unfair labor practice by entering into an illegal agreement. Respondent contends that since the recognition clause in the agreement Respondent was asked to sign and the Union's interpretation of that clause was clearly directed to achieve its objectives at the Warwick with respect to employees of another employer and were not designed to preserve work for Respondent's employees, the agreement was illegal and Respondent should not be ordered to sign an illegal agreement. Respondent also contends that the Union's efforts to force Respondent to sign the agreement and its refusal to modify its arbitrary interpretation of that agreement was a continuation of the Union's illegal activity found unlawful by the administrative law judge in Cases 4–CP–355, 4–CB–4477, and 4–CB–4478.[13]

[13] In Hotel & Restaurant Employees, 269 NLRB 482 (1984), the Board remanded those cases to the administrative law judge for the purpose of considering the effect, if any, of a specified defense of the union. As here pertinent, portions of the Board's decision read as follows:

> As found by the judge, Warwick Caterers is a banquet and catering operation owned and operated by Hospitality Catering, Inc. . . . . Warwick Caterers is not a party to any collective-bargaining agreement with the Respondent [Union]. . . .
> On 22 February [1982], the Union filed 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) unfair labor practice charges against Warwick Caterers, Elan, and Hospitality Investments, Inc., alleging, in essence, that these employers were successors to, or an alter ego of, R & K Caterers (Kosher Catering) and Warken Banquets, Inc. (non-Kosher catering), employers which, prior to the sale of assets to Warwick Caterers, had verbally agreed to pay union wage rates to their employees. The Union claimed that Warwick Caterers had a successorship or alter ego duty to recognize it. The charge also alleged discriminatory terminations of Warwick employees because of their union affiliation.
> These charges were dismissed by the Regional Director, and the dismissal was later upheld by the General Counsel on appeal. In upholding the dismissal of the complaint, the General Counsel observed that there was no evidence that Warwick Caterers "was an alter ego

C. Analysis

For the reasons stated below, it is my opinion that Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act as alleged.

For years, notwithstanding the above-described recognition clause, the Union did not challenge the way service was provided at the Warwick by Rosenthal & Kaufman in conjunction with Warken, which, as indicated above, was a nonunion operation. (As noted above, certain of Warken's employees received the equivalent of union wages.) But when Kaufman sold Warken the Union asserted rights it believed it had in its agreement with Rosenthal and Kaufman and the alleged successor or alter ego, R & K. Long before negotiations began on the involved contract the Union notified R & K's attorney in the above-described June 15, 1982 demand for arbitration that the Union believed that R & K was breaching the "recognition and successorship clauses of the contract through arrangements at the Warwick Hotel."

Initially Kaufman refused to participate in the group negotiations between the Union and the other kosher caterers because of the pending arbitration matter over Respondent's service at the Warwick. When he did appear at the first negotiating session he qualified his participation indicating that he was there to discuss wages only, and that the situation involving R & K at the Warwick would not be a matter which would be dealt with at those group negotiations. Small's testimony that Kaufman, after stating that he was only there to discuss wages, said "the only purpose there was to negotiate a kosher caterers' contract" is not credited. This might have been Small's purpose but in my opinion Kaufman did not utter these words for they would have contradicted his declaration that he was there to discuss wages only. While Kaufman did not explicitly indicate that the resolution of the problem at the Warwick was an issue on which resolution of a collective-bargaining agreement was contingent, and while Kaufman never specifically requested negotiations over the recognition clause inasmuch as he did not appreciate the basis of the Union's assertions, Washington testified that when the involved negotiations began he fully understood what was being asserted in the arbitration proceeding. The dispute centered on language in the Rosenthal & Kaufman bargaining agreement, which language was also included in the contract being negotiated. Kaufman lacked the sophistication to fully appreciate his situation. And it is my opinion that while at some point Einhorn may have told Kaufman what the mechanics were for remedying the problem with respect to the contract which was being negotiated, either the message was not conveyed before Kaufman attended the first negotiating session or when the message was conveyed Einhorn failed to impress on Kaufman the advisability of explicitly making this known to the Union at the outset. It would appear that even though Einhorn had notice of the basis of the Union's claim, inasmuch as he refused to acknowledge any bargaining relationship between R & K and the Union based on the Rosenthal & Kaufman agreement, and since he did not expect Kaufman to attend the group negotiation (as noted above he learned of Kaufman's participation upon returning from vacation) most likely he did not specifically advise Kaufman about the mechanics before the first negotiating session. In any event, Kaufman did not explicitly state at the first negotiating session that he would seek a modification of what had become a standard contract between the involved entities before he would sign it. Nonetheless, the assertion that a great deal of R & K's business involves functions at the Warwick was not contradicted. In my opinion the Union fully appreciating the situation realized that Kaufman would not wittingly perpetuate the Warwick problem. Consequently, when Kaufman declared that he was there only to discuss wages the Union could not reasonably believe that Kaufman was there to negotiate a complete contract. Notwithstanding assertions to the contrary, it was not demonstrated that Kaufman knowingly exceeded his limitation to discuss only wages during the group negotiations. And, in my opinion although Kaufman did not explicitly state at the outset that the contract was contingent on the resolution of the Warwick situations, the Union, under the circumstances, could not have reasonably understood otherwise.

As pointed out in Industrial Engineering Co., supra, the alleged violation contemplates a consciously arrived at understanding and a refusal, as here pertinent, to execute the written agreement. When Kaufman limited his participating and indicated that while he had problems with the Union regarding operations at the Warwick he would not deal with that matter in group sessions, the Union, which fully appreciated the situation, could not reasonably conclude that there would be a meeting of the minds during the involved negotiation sessions on that language in the contract being negotiated, which was the basis of the Union's contentions that R & K was acting unlawfully at the Warwick. The General Counsel contends more than once on brief that here, unlike Checker, supra, the Union did not mislead Respondent. As pointed out by Respondent, on brief, however, it was concluded in Checker, supra at 44 that "[t]he result would be the same even if . . . [the Union] had not been guilty of misrepresentation."

Two other portions of Checker, supra at 643 and 645, respectively, cited by Respondent, on brief, bear repeating:

> This contention, placing a "pound-of-flesh" technicality above justice and equity, has been soundly reof any of the parties who might arguably have had a bargaining relationship with the Union."

Contemporaneous with the filing of the charge, the Union invoked the arbitration provisions of its collective-bargaining agreement with Elan, "seeking to enforce the contractual obligation of recognition [on Warwick Caterers] as set forth in the collective-bargaining agreement [between the Union and Elan]."

On 24 February [1982] the Union began picketing which continued until it was enjoined on 14 June [1982].

On 13 May [1982] Warwick Caterers filed a charge against the Union alleging violation of 8(b)(7)(C). A complaint issued, forming the basis for the instant case.

Although the Union took the position that it is an incumbent collective-bargaining representative by virtue of the alter ego or single-employer status between Elan and Warwick Caterers, such defense was not considered. After overruling the authority the administrative law judge relied on, the Board, by Order dated March 28, 1984, directed the judge to consider the defense.

jected by the Board, which recognizes the statutory obligation of mutual good faith as a cornerstone of labor-management relations.

Brief notice may be taken of the Union's apparent argument that Respondent must execute the contract and rely on arbitration thereunder to seek relief. Such contention is manifestly untenable. Arbitration is not available to avoid, rescind, or alter an agreement, which is what Respondents would need if they were to sign the agreement in its present form.

In view of the above, it is not necessary to deal with the above-described contentions regarding the legality of the contract.

The complaint should be dismissed in its entirety.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[14]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[14] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

14 December 1984

DECISION ON REVIEW, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 25 January 1984 the Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Direction of Election in the above-entitled proceeding in which he found appropriate a unit consisting of all full-time and regular part-time maintenance employees, truck drivers, helpers, dispatcher, customer service representative (CSR), and warehouse employees, including pickers, shippers, and receivers, employed by the Employer at its facilities located at 7545 Telegraph Road, Montebello, California, and at 19840 Hamilton, Torrance, California; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees,[1] salespersons, cashiers, guards, professional employees, and supervisors as defined in the Act.[2] In so finding, the Regional Director rejected the Petitioner's contention that the unit as petitioned for, limited to warehouse employees at Montebello, excluding the CSR and dispatcher, was an appropriate unit for bargaining. The Regional Director also rejected the Employer's contention that the appropriate unit must encompass all employees at all 9 of the Employer's facilities, approximately 67 to 70 employees.[3] Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Employer filed a timely request for review in which it contended, inter alia, that in not finding an overall unit appropriate the Regional Director made erroneous findings of fact and departed from official Board precedent.

By mailgram dated 23 February 1984 the request for review was granted. Pursuant to the Board's Rules and Regulations, the election was held on 23 February 1984 in the unit found appropriate by the Regional Director and the ballots were impounded pending the Board's decision on review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case with respect to the issue under review and for the reasons stated below finds that only an overall multifacility unit is appropriate.

The Employer is engaged in the warehousing and retail sale of furniture. Its operation consists of two warehouse/showrooms (Montebello and Torrance) and seven retail outlets (Thousand Oaks, Lakewood, Sherman Oaks, Buena Park, West Covina, Culver City, and Arcadia) situated in shopping malls, all within southern California. Each of the retail outlets maintains a stockroom which holds merchandise not yet displayed and extra stock. These stockrooms vary in size between 200 and 1500 square feet. Except for the facility in Thousand Oaks, all of the locations are within a radius of approximately 20 miles. Corporate headquarters are located adjacent to the warehouse/showroom facility at Montebello. A. Mizrahi is the corporate president of the Employer. Below Mizrahi in the corporate structure are D. Leyner, the corporate comptroller; B. Sparks, the warehouse operations manager; and P. Linder, the vice president and general manager. Mizrahi, Leyner, and Linder are located at Montebello corporate headquarters. Company policies, personnel decisions, advertising, purchasing, and payroll are handled centrally at Montebello corporate headquarters. In addition, all merchandise from vendors is received at the Montebello facility and thereafter distributed to the Employer's other locations.

There are approximately 34 warehouse employees in the petitioned-for unit at the Montebello facility. The 8–10 warehouse employees who work the day shift receive and store merchandise from vendors, deliver the merchandise to customers at the Employer's "will-call" dock, maintain the warehouse, and assist the salespeople in rearranging and setting up new displays of furniture in the showroom. The eight employees on the night shift are responsible for picking the orders, organizing them according to destination, and loading the goods on trucks for delivery the following day.

Deliveries to customers, the Torrance facility, and the Employer's stores are handled by the Employer's seven truckdrivers, each of whom is paired with one of seven helpers. All delivery teams work out of the Montebello facility. At the beginning of each workday, each team picks up its delivery schedule and invoices from the dispatcher and spends the rest of the day making deliveries.

[1] At the hearing, the parties agreed that any unit found appropriate should exclude the Employer's office personnel who work at the corporate headquarters at Montebello.

[2] There are approximately 36 employees in the unit found appropriate by the Regional Director.

[3] The Regional Director also rejected the Employer's alternative contentions that: (1) all employees in the Employer's combined warehouse/showroom operations in Montebello and Torrance comprise an appropriate unit; (2) the salespersons employed in Montebello should be included in the petitioned-for unit; or (3) at the very least, the unit also should include all employees who perform general warehousing duties in Torrance.

After the drivers leave, the dispatcher takes calls from customers and on occasion contacts the drivers regarding problems with deliveries or delivery instructions. The dispatcher also keeps in contact with the Employer's various retail outlets and receives their orders for delivery of merchandise.

The CSR takes calls from customers who have complaints regarding merchandise purchased at any of the Employer's facilities, as well as about deliveries. The CSR is situated in the warehouse and is in constant contact with the warehouse employees. On occasion the CSR will have warehouse employees assist her when she is tagging items (e.g., "hold" tags, delivery instruction tags, etc.). Finally, the CSR schedules the "repair truck," which the Employer operates for the purpose of performing minor repairs on furniture sold to customers.

The Employer also employs three to four salespeople at its Montebello facility. These individuals are responsible for making sales to customers and keeping the showroom in order.[4] When the will-call dock is closed, the salespeople will load the merchandise into the customer's car. This occurs on a daily basis. In addition, the salespeople frequently assist warehouse employees in loading furniture onto customers' cars from the will-call dock.

The Employer's work force at the Torrance facility consists of one full-time warehouse employee, one regular part-time warehouse employee, and three to four salespeople. Virtually all of this location's business is will-call. However, except for Saturdays, there is only one warehouse employee working in the warehouse. As a result, the sales employees frequently handle the warehousing aspect of will-call, i.e., pulling merchandise and loading it onto the customers' vehicles. In addition, the salespeople regularly assist in keeping the warehouse in order and with moving and rearranging furniture.[5] The Torrance employees (sales and nonsales) have at least weekly contact with the Employer's drivers and helpers from Montebello. Every week a 45-foot trailer is loaded at Montebello and then driven to Torrance. Drivers and helpers, or on occasion warehouse employees from Montebello, will go to Torrance and assist the Torrance sales and warehouse employees in unloading and checking the merchandise received from Montebello. In addition to handling the weekly transfers from Montebello, driver/helper teams transport merchandise from Torrance to Montebello when there is a depletion of inventory at Montebello.

Each of the seven retail stores has three to four salespeople. In addition, three or four of the stores employ part-time cashiers.[6] As there are no warehouse employees at any of these stores, the salespeople perform all necessary warehousing duties. Thus, in addition to making sales and maintaining the stores, the sales employees are responsible for handling all aspects of will-call and for receiving and inspecting all items shipped from Montebello. As a result of their receiving duties, salespeople have regular weekly contact with the Employer's drivers and helpers, who spend from 2 to 4 hours each week at each store while unloading and arranging merchandise. The salespeople help with this work about half of the time. In addition to performing their regular duties, the cashiers receive commissions for selling accessories to the customers. The cashiers have regular contact with the drivers but, due to working only part-time, on a less frequent basis than the sales employees. When the cashiers are not working, and in stores not employing cashiers, the sales employees perform the cashiering duties.

The transfer of employees among the nine facilities often is dictated by the demands of the Employer's business. When a facility is planning a major move or a new store is opened, employees from throughout the Employer's organization are transferred temporarily to that location to assist. In addition, all employees (sales and nonsales) at the facility in transition participate in the move. Although there is no regular rotation schedule, salespeople frequently are transferred between the showrooms and retail outlets when large sales are taking place or when employees are sick or on leave. Additionally, permanent transfers of salespeople are frequent and have been initiated both by the employee for personal reasons and by the Employer for business reasons. The record indicates that the average salesperson works at five to seven different stores at different times within any 1-year period.

The one full-time warehouse employee at Torrance permanently transferred to that facility from the Montebello warehouse. When he is absent for extended periods such as vacations, a Montebello warehouse employee is temporarily assigned to the Torrance facility.

The only permanent transfer of an employee from a nonsales position to a sales position, or vice versa, involved the transfer of a store manager to a [4] Flores, the maintenance employee for Montebello headquarters and warehouse, on occasion will assist in showroom maintenance. He is the only employee employed by the Employer whose primary duty is maintenance.

[5] At the hearing, Sparks testified that, when he worked in Torrance sales, he spent 1–2 days a week in the warehouse.

[6] Three of the locations which have cashiers are Torrance, Lakewood, and Culver City.

higher managerial position. However, the record indicates that the Employer intends to use the warehouse as a training ground for sales positions. The Employer in fact hired two individuals as truckdrivers with such a plan in mind. However, the plan did not come to fruition because of problems with insuring these two potential trainees due to their poor driving records.

Regarding supervision of the warehousing operation, Sparks is in charge of the Employer's warehouse facilities at Montebello and Torrance.[7] He is responsible for shipping and receiving, management of warehouse personnel, and the security of both warehouses and the eight trucks operated out of the Employer's Montebello facility. All warehouse employees, drivers, and helpers, as well as the CSR and dispatcher, report to Sparks.

The Montebello warehouse employees on the day shift are supervised by R. Cortez, who is in charge of receiving operations. J. Moore is solely responsible for the Employer's night operation,[8] and all night warehouse employees report to him. Both Cortez and Moore have the authority to discipline employees. However, with regard to hiring, Sparks interviews and hires the applicants, but will send them to either Cortez or Moore for their approval. In addition, the record indicates that Moore has been allowed to interview applicants and then send them to Sparks for final approval before hiring. Regarding authority to recommend discharge, if Moore should decide to discharge someone he first must consult Sparks. If, in his opinion, there are no extenuating circumstances, Sparks will accept the recommendation. As of the time of the hearing, Moore had not discharged or effectively recommended the discharge of any night warehouse employee. Moore also evaluates employees and has effectively recommended wage increases for at least two employees on his shift. Torrance warehouse employees are supervised on a day-to-day basis by Store Manager M. Fisher. However, all issues concerning wage increases, disciplinary problems, transfers, etc., are Sparks' responsibility.

The Employer's sales operation is directed by its general manager, Linder. Each of the retail outlets has a store manager who is directly responsible to Linder.[9] Each store manager determines the schedules for his sales employees and has the authority to grant time off. Regarding hiring, the general manager interviews the prospective sales employees, and if he likes them will "bounce them off the individual store manager." Finally, a store manager can request that a sales employee no longer work in his store, but has no authority to terminate salespeople.

All warehouse employees (pickers, shipping, receiving, and maintenance), the CSR, and the cashiers are paid on an hourly basis. The CSR is paid approximately $8 per hour plus overtime. The dispatcher is paid a salary and earns no overtime. The Employer's drivers, helpers, and salespeople are paid on a salary-plus-commission basis. Drivers and helpers earn a base hourly rate of $4.25 to $7.50 per hour. With commissions they can increase their earnings up to approximately $9.50 per hour. The salespeople generally receive a base salary of $1000 per month. All employees receive the same fringe benefits.

Analysis

The Employer contends that a separate uni Montebello warehouse employees is inappropriate due to: (a) the high degree of functional integration between the sales and warehouse/shipping operation; (b) the centralization of administrative matters; (c) the significant amount of interaction among all of the Employer's employees; and (d) the fact that all employees perform similar job duties. We find merit in the Employer's contention.

In concluding that a unit limited to Montebello and Torrance warehouse employees is appropriate, the Regional Director relied on his findings that: (a) the salespeople are under a separate line of supervision; (b) there have been no instances of temporary or permanent transfer between selling and nonselling positions;[10] (c) contact between selling and nonselling employee on the day shift, although frequent, is solely in the performance of their functions; (d) there are separate lines of progression for the sales staff and nonselling staff; and (e) sales personnel generally are compensated at a higher level than nonsales employees.

Contrary to the Regional Director, we find that the highly interdependent nature of the Employer's operational structure compels the conclusion that a separate warehouse unit is inappropriate, whether it consists of the Montebello warehouse employees alone or the Montebello and Torrance warehouse employees, and that only a wall-to-wall multifacility unit is appropriate. Explication of this finding involves a four-step analysis which begins with the petitioned-for unit of Montebello warehouse employees. A unit limited to this group of employees is inappropriate as it fails to include the two remaining warehouse employees in the Employer's operation. These two employees, who work at the Torrance facility, share a strong community of interest with the Montebello warehouse employees. The Montebello and Torrance warehouse employees perform similar functions, share common supervision, earn similar wages, and receive the same fringe benefits. Montebello warehouse employees frequently assist employees at Torrance with the performance of warehouse work. In addition, the one full-time Torrance warehouse employee was permanently transferred to that facility from Montebello and, when this employee is absent for extended periods of time, a Montebello warehouse employee is temporarily assigned to the Torrance facility. Based on this strong community of interest which exists between the Employer's warehouse employees, we find, in agreement with the Regional Director, that a unit limited to warehouse employees at Montebello is inappropriate and that any appropriate unit must include both the Montebello and Torrance warehouse employees.

Our decision to include the Torrance warehouse employees mandates the inclusion of the Torrance sales employees in the unit found appropriate. We are compelled to take this action based on the highly integrated nature of Torrance's sales and warehousing operations. As noted above, the small number of warehouse employees and the high volume of will-call business at Torrance inevitably result in the performance of warehousing functions by the Torrance sales employees. Sales personnel regularly assist in keeping the warehouse in order and with moving and rearranging the furniture. In addition, the sales employees frequently handle the warehousing aspect of will-call, i.e., pulling merchandise and loading it onto the customers' vehicles. This high level of integrated effort by the Torrance warehouse and sales employees makes clear that the disputed classifications should not be treated as two distinct groupings. Therefore, our decision to include the Torrance warehouse employees necessitates the inclusion of the facility's sales employees in the unit.

Taking this analysis one step further, we note that the Employer's average salesperson works at five to seven different stores at different times within any 1-year period. As a result of this frequency of temporary transfers, and our finding that the Torrance sales employees must be included in the unit found appropriate, we deem it necessary to evaluate the possibility of including all of the Employer's sales employees in the unit. In other words, we must determine whether an overall multifacility unit is appropriate.

When dealing with a multifacility unit, the well-established Board policy is to find a single-facility unit presumptively appropriate. This presumption only can be overcome by a showing of functional integration so substantial as to negate the separate identity of the single-facility unit. In making findings on this issue, the Board looks to such factors as central control over daily operations and labor relations, skills and functions of the employees, general working conditions, bargaining history, employee interchange, and the geographic location of the facilities in relation to each other.[11]

Here, we find that the presumption favoring a single-facility unit has been rebutted by the pervasive centralized control of all labor relations and personnel matters, the high degree of functional integration, the frequent temporary and permanent transfers of sales employees among all nine facilities, the similarity of job responsibilities at the Montebello warehouse/showroom and the other facilities, and the proximity of the facilities. We further find that these factors establish that a multifacility unit including the warehouse/showroom employees and all retail outlet employees is the only appropriate unit.

Control over the Employer's operations and personnel matters is highly centralized. All purchasing of merchandise, as well as receiving of the items from vendors, is performed at Montebello. Payroll and advertising for all nine facilities are handled at corporate headquarters in Montebello. All final personnel decisions regarding the hiring and firing of employees are handled by central management. For example, store managers may be asked what they think of an applicant, but the decision to hire is made by Linder, the general manager. Moreover, a store manager may request that a particular employee not work at his store, but he may not fire him.

The centralized nature of the Employer's operation compels the interdependence or integration of the retail outlets and the Montebello and Torrance facilities. When a customer chooses a piece of merchandise which he wishes to pick up later in the week, and the particular store does not have it in stock, the sales employee fills out a merchandise requisition form and sends it to the purchasing department at Montebello. If it is stock merchandise available at Montebello the order is entered in the computer, which prints out a listing of the merchandise to be transferred from the Montebello warehouse to the various outlets. These listings go to the night crew at Montebello, who pull and load the merchandise for delivery to the stores.

[11] Napa Columbus Parts Co., 269 NLRB 1052 (1984).

Also supportive of a finding that only a multifacility unit is appropriate is the fact, noted above, that the average salesperson works at five to seven of the Employer's facilities within a 1-year period. Because of this frequency of transfer, it is only logical that, because the Torrance sales employees are to be included in the unit, then all sales employees at the other facilities also are to be included. Moreover, the retail store employees and the warehouse and sales employees at Torrance have similar job responsibilities. All employees do some degree of warehousing, and the salespeople working at the retail outlets must handle any warehousing responsibilities which might arise. The cashiers assist in the selling process and, similar to the sales employees, receive commissions for accessories they provide for the customers. All employees receive the same fringe benefits. Finally, all facilities are within a 20-mile radius except for Thousand Oaks.

Based on the above factors, in particular the centralized administration, the high degree of functional integration, and the interchange of sales employees among the Employer's various facilities, we find that only an overall multilocation unit is appropriate for bargaining.[12]

As the unit found appropriate is substantially larger than the warehouse unit found appropriate by the Regional Director, the election conducted on 23 February 1984 must be vacated. However, as the Petitioner has indicated a willingness to proceed to an election in the broader unit found appropriate, we shall direct that the election be held in the following unit which we find to be appropriate:[13]

> All full-time and regular part-time maintenance employees, truck drivers, helpers, dispatcher, customer service representative, warehouse employees, including pickers, shippers and receivers, salespersons, and cashiers employed by the Employer at all of its facilities; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

ORDER

The election conducted on 23 February 1984 is vacated.

[Direction of Election omitted from publication.]

[13] As the unit found appropriate is larger than that requested, the Petitioner is accorded a period of 10 days in which to submit the requisite showing of interest to support an election. In the event the Petitioner does not wish to proceed to an election herein, it may withdraw its petition without prejudice by notice to the Regional Director within 7 days from the date of this decision.

14 December 1984

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered objections to an election held on 21 July 1983 and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 24 for and 47 against the Petitioner, with 6 challenged ballots, an insufficient number to affect the results.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and briefs, and hereby adopts the hearing officer's findings and recommendations only to the extent consistent herewith.

The hearing officer recommended sustaining the Petitioner's Objections 1 and 5,[1] which contended respectively that the Employer made unlawful threats to reduce wage rates, and that the Employer conveyed to the employees the futility of selecting the Petitioner as their collective-bargaining agent. We find that the Employer engaged in no objectionable conduct.

The Petitioner seeks to represent a unit of employees at the Employer's lumber mill in New Boston, Texas. The Employer also operates other mills, including unionized plants at Coushatta, Louisiana, and Nacogdoches, Texas.

During the Petitioner's organizing campaign, the Employer's officials conducted a series of meetings with the employees. At the first meeting or meetings held on or about 27 June 1983, the Employer's regional manager Ben Smith addressed the employees. Smith's remarks commenced with an introduction:

> Let me take a few minutes here and discuss what the law is and how collective bargarning [sic] really works.
> First, I hope everyone understand [sic] that collective bargaining does not mean that a company must agree to anything a union asks for or to sign a contract at all, if the company does not think the contract is in the plant's or the employees' best interest. The labor laws require the parties to bargain in good faith, but it [sic] does not require them to agree with each other . . . . Even if they do agree, that does not necessarily mean wages or benefits will improve . . . . After negotiations, things may go up, they may stay the same . . . or they may go down . . . .

Smith informed employees that within the last several years at various plants operated by the Employer

> . . . there have been a number of unionized operations where pay has been negotiated frozen or reduced . . . . While most of these freezes and reductions were in paper and converting plants at IP, it shows you that through good faith bargaining, wages and benefits are frequently reduced.

Additional meetings were held about 6 and 7 July 1983, with Plant Manager Glenn Haddox and Smith as the speakers. In these remarks the officials compared the wages of the New Boston employees with those at other lumber mills across the South. The New Boston wages were higher. The Employer's spokesmen continued:

> We have discussed what the law says about wages and benefits changing in a contract. And, if need be, we will bargain in good faith at New Boston. You need to understand, however, that we will not agree to anything in a union contract which we believe is not in the best interest of the company. Take, for example, wages and benefits. It is clear to me that we would have a strong argument in any negotiations that wages and benefits are already too high here. Now, I am not threatening you people; you have a legal right to have a union represent you. But because we care about you as employees, you need to understand that we have a legal right to bargain hard for what we believe is best for the business. Now we have some further information which we will discuss with you before you vote which leads us to believe that this union will agree to lower wages and benefits than we have right now in New Boston.

Further meetings were held during the weeks of 13 and 19 July 1983. Assistant Plant Manager Henry Conly spoke for the Employer at a meeting held during this time. As found by the hearing officer, Conly indicated that the Employer would bargain for lower wages like those at the Employer's union-represented plants, i.e., Coushatta and Nacogdoches. Conly compared the wages at New

[1] In the absence of exceptions thereto, we adopt, pro forma, the hearing officer's recommendations that Objections 2 and 6 be overruled.
At the hearing the Petitioner withdrew Objections 3 and 4, with no opposition by the Employer. The hearing officer thereafter declined to consider these objections in her report.

Boston and Coushatta, pointed to Coushatta's wages on a bulletin board, and said, "These wages are the ones we are shooting for." Conly also spoke of his participation in prior negotiations at one of the unionized mills, noted that he was a hard negotiator, and stated, "You better bring a big lunch, because it could take a long time to negotiate a contract."

A chart comparing the wages of New Boston with Coushatta and Nacogdoches was posted in the plant shortly before the election. Several employees noticed these wage comparisons, including the higher New Boston figures.

The hearing officer treated Objection 5 together with Objection 1 because both objections involved conduct of the Employer which occurred in the same series of employee meetings. She concluded that this conduct created an "atmosphere of apprehension in the voters' minds," inculcated a sense of futility, and interfered with the employees' choice. We conclude to the contrary that the Employer's speech and actions were consistent with the requirements of the Act.

In evaluating whether an employer's statements during a union organizing campaign have a coercive effect on employees, the focus of our inquiry is whether the totality of the employer's statements have created an atmosphere preventing a free and untrammeled choice by the employees, thereby disrupting the intended laboratory conditions.[2]

The present case is barren of such coercive circumstances. Contrary to the hearing officer, we discern no basis to warrant a conclusion that the Employer improperly warned employees of a decrease in wages and benefits and thereby "inculcate[d] in employees a sense of futility." Consistent with our recent decision in Caradco Corp., 267 NLRB 1356 (1983), the statements made by the Employer regarding the possibility of lower wages and benefits cannot, in context, reasonably be construed as a threat to reduce employee wages or benefits if the Petitioner won the election. Thus, as in Caradco, the comments of the Employer's representative emphasized repeatedly that any reduction in wages and benefits could only be undertaken through collective bargaining with the Union.

In the meetings held about 27 June, Regional Manager Smith stressed the Employer's commitment to good-faith bargaining and remarked that as a result of negotiations "things may go up, they may stay the same . . . or they may go down." Although Smith referred to unionized plants operated by the Employer where wages had been reduced, he specifically informed employees that this occurred "through good faith bargaining." In the meetings held about 6 and 7 July, Smith and Plant Manager Haddox referred to possible wage and benefit reductions only in the context of collective bargaining. Indeed, they expressly stated to employees that the Employer had reason to believe that "this union will agree to lower wages and benefits," thereby emphasizing the collaborative nature of any reduction through negotiations. In addition, Smith and Haddox assured employees in these meetings that they had a legal right to choose union representation and expressly disavowed any threat of retaliation. Assistant Plant Manager Conly's remarks at the later meetings reiterated the Employer's adherence to the bargaining process. The statements attributed to Conly contain express or clearly implied references to negotiation: the Employer would bargain for wages like those at its unionized plants; he was a hard negotiator; "these wages are the ones we are shooting for," and "it could take a long time to negotiate a contract" (emphasis added). Viewed in their entirety, these remarks convey no indication that the Employer would initiate unilateral changes in the employees' terms and conditions of employment or retaliate against employees because they selected the Union.

It bears emphasis that we view the later meetings, as the employees viewed them, in the light of the initial sessions held only 2 to 3 weeks earlier. Hence we interpret Conly's gesture to the bulletin board, as well as his remarks, in the light of Smith's and Haddox's repeated expressions of their willingness to comply with the requirements of collective bargaining. Neither Conly's gesture, nor his remarks, can be considered in this context to have disrupted the laboratory conditions for the election, or to have inculcated a sense of futility. The Employer's subsequent posting of the chart containing wage comparisons is not objectionable. We have upheld the use of similar charts in the past.[3] Further, employees clearly were aware that the Employer's statements regarding its commitment to collective bargaining were not merely idle words but had been demonstrated by negotiated agreements at its other unionized plants.[4]

[4] Our dissenting colleague contends that the Employer, through Assistant Plant Manager Conly, made "an explicit declaration . . . of an adverse consequence of unionization" by allegedly indicating that the Employer would "insist" on lower wage levels. The hearing officer found in her concluding analysis, however, that Conly stated only that the Employer "would bargain for" wages like those at its unionized plants and that those were the wages the Employer "was shooting for" and "wanted to negotiate." Although the term "insist on" appears in Employer's Exh. 13, Conly testified he did not read this speech word for word, but used the text as an outline, and no credited union witness claimed to have heard "insist on." It is clear that the Employer's statements regarding Accordingly, as the record does not support the Petitioner's objections that the Employer's speeches constituted a threat of retaliation or inculcated a sense of futility among the employees, the objections are hereby overruled. Because the tally of ballots shows that the Petitioner failed to receive a majority of the valid ballots cast, we shall certify the results of the election.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for United Paperworkers International Union, AFL–CIO and that it is not the exclusive representative of these bargaining unit employees.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

For the reasons expressed in the hearing officer's report attached hereto, I would sustain the Petitioner's Objections 1 and 5 and set the election aside. The Employer's campaign statements can only be interpreted as threatening retaliation against the employees in the event that the New Boston plant became unionized. I agree with the hearing officer that the Employer's references to "bargaining" and "negotiations" are insufficient to mask the intended coercive tone of the Employer's speeches and conduct.

Indicative of the tone of the entire campaign is this excerpt from Assistant Plant Manager Conly's remarks to the employees on 13 and 14 July: "I can assure you . . . that if we are required to negotiate wages and benefits with this union, these . . . are the wages we will insist on in a lumbermill contract at New Boston" (Emp. Exh. 13). (emphasis in the original). It could not be clearer that the Employer signaled the employees in this sentence that it would seek a lesser wage level precisely because the Union was present. Thus if the employees voted for the Union, they were "assured" of the Employer's insistence upon the lower wage levels of Coushatta and Nacogdoches. If the employees voted against the Union, according to the clear implication of Conly's remarks, the existing, higher wage levels would remain undisturbed—wage levels which the Employer set and therefore clearly found acceptable. The Employer's transparent indication of its intent to administer differential treatment to its employees depending on the outcome of the election creates an atmosphere of apprehension and a sense of futility in the minds of voting employees, and warrants setting aside the election. Accordingly, I dissent.[1]

[1] The present case is distinguishable from three recent cases in which I found an employer's remarks to its employees unobjectionable. I have agreed to the certification of election results where an employer made no express or implied promise that the employees' wages would be increased if the union were voted out, and where the employer made no suggestion that the employees' wages or benefits would suffer if they voted the union in. Viacom Cablevision of Dayton, 267 NLRB 1141 (1983); Caradco Corp., 267 NLRB 1356 (1983). I have also voted to certify the election results where the employer's predictions as to the effects of unionization referred to "demonstrably probable" consequences beyond its own control. International Harvester Co., 258 NLRB 1162 (1981) (Member Zimmerman, dissenting). In the instant case, the Employer told the employees that, if required to bargain with the Union, it would insist on a fixed, lesser wage rate. Far from implication or suggestion, this was an explicit declaration by the Employer of an adverse consequence of unionization well within its own control.

APPENDIX

Findings of Fact

Objections 1 and 5

Since these two objections involve statements allegedly occurring on or about the same dates and in the same series of employee meetings held by Assistnat Plant Manager Henry Conly, they will be treated together, for the purporse of this Report.

Petitioner's Position:

The Petitioner, in support of these objections (regarding the threat to reduced wages and the futility of selecting the Petitioner as collective-bargaining agent), offered employee witnesses Ronald Lofland, George Conway,[2] and Ricky Almand.

It was undisputed that during the Petitioner's organizing campaign, the Employer, through various management personnel, held a series of employee meetings for the purpose of explaining its positon. These meetings occurred between June 27 and July 19 on a weekly basis, at varying times and places, and involved employees grouped by departments and/or by their union sentiments. The meetings lasted between 15 to 60 minutes and were held during work hours.

The first series of employee meetings was held primarly by Ben Smith, Regional Manager of the Arkansas Wood Products Division, around June 27. Glenn Haddox, Plant Manager, and Henry Conly, Assistant Plant Manager, were present and participated in lesser degrees. There were no allegations that objectionable statements were made during this first series of meetings; they are mentioned for background purposes. The employees were told of other companys and unions agreeing to pay cuts and reductions in benefits, after bargaining. A copy of excerpts from Smith's speech was supplied as Employer's Exhibit 4 and it stated therein:

> At IP within the last several years, there have been a number of unionized operations where pay has been negotiated, frozen or reduced. In fact, after wages and benefits, taken as a whole, neither indicated that it would undertake unilateral action nor implied that it would retaliate against employees by administering differential treatment depending on the outcome of the election. Thus, we find that the Employer did not exceed the limits of permissible campaign conduct. Caradco Corp., supra.

[2] Conway's employment was terminated 7/18/83.

> bargaining with the same union, IP has frozen wages in several operations and actually reduced wages in others where the employees were represented by the UPIU. While most of these freezes and reductions were in paper and converting plants at IP, it shows you that through good faith bargaining, wages and benefits are frequently reduced.

The second series of employee meetings occurred around July 6 and 7. Again Ben Smith was the primary spokesperson, with Glen Haddox participating. Petitioner's witness Ron Lofland recalled that at the meeting he attended, Company personnel explained why they didn't need a union, with emphasis on strikes and "lots of emphasis on wages being reduced to possibly the national average wage." Lofland recalled this latter statement occurring around July 7 and 13 and that Glenn Haddox and Ben Smith were the speakers.

The third and fourth series of employee meetings occurred the weeks of July 13 and 19. At the fourth meeting Lofland recalled Conly making wage comparisons between New Boston and Coushatta, La. on a bulletin board. He said Conly went to the board, pointed to Coushatta's wages, which were consideraby lower than New Boston's, and said "these wages are the ones we are shooting for." He later testified that the wages were from $1.50 to $1.75 lower for the same type jobs at Coushatta than those at New Boston.

Lofland stated that Conly also spoke of the negotiations he had been involved in before, that he was a hard negotiator and that:

> You better bring a big lunch, because it could take a long time to negotiate a contract.

And after this meeting Lofland testified there were wage comparisons posted throughout the saw mill area for people to view, up until the election. Lofland recalled the wage comparisons being posted on a chalkboard in the saw mill area and in an office in the breakroom.

Petitioner's witness George Conway testified as follows:

> The third meeting, the fourth meeting, Henry said that if the union came in, he would do everything he could to get the wages lowered to what they was at other mills and—it was the third meeting because he said that he was negotiating contracts at the mill that he came from and that he wanted to negotiate this contract and they would get their wages down.

Conway also recalled the Coushatta wage rates being posted on the bulletin board on a rack.

As Conway had been discharged on July 18, and had a charge pending dismissal in the National Labor Relations Board Regional Office at the time of the hearing, the Employer requested and received (for cross-examination purposes) a portion of Conway's affidavit[3] relating to the objection issues mentioned under direct examination. Under cross-examination Conway testified that Conly had referred to a chart showing average wage differences between union and non-union plants, and Conley recalled no specific columns on Coushatta's wages. He guessed, it was not clear, that Coushatta was included in those average union wages.

A part of Conway's affidavit was read into the record, under cross-examination, and it stated that during the week of July 11, Conly had said: "he has a very experienced contract negotiator and he would bargain our wages down, and our benefits cut down . . ." But in earlier direct testimony, Conway had said Conly would get their wages down. When asked which of his statements was true, Conway replied "both." Petitioner's witness Ricky Almand testified that he attended five of the Employer's meetings and that the fifth was held the day before the election. Almand recalled that at one of the meetings there was a little "board-like deal" on a three-legged pedestal. It had the wages on certain jobs for Nacogdoches and Coushatta and New Boston and the differences between the pay, and that Conly and Smith were always saying "how much better, how much more we was making than Nacogdoches and Coushatta."

Almand's recollection was similar to Conway's in that he recalled being told that the reason Conly was brought to New Boston was because he negotiated contracts at other plants and that Conly would:

> "try to negotiate the contract with the—whenever it come time, when and if the Union made it, come time [sic] for negotiation to get our wages down with Nacogdoches and Coushatta."

He recalled the kiln operator classification showing a difference between New Boston and Coushatta and Nacogdoches of about 38 cents.

Under cross-examination Almand said that he assumed the chart containing the comparisions between New Boston and the United Paperworkers International Union average wages included Coushatta and Nacogdoches. And he restated that a chart was posted which included Coushatta and Nacogdoches in front of the mill breakroom and on a three-legged pedestal in the office conference room.

Employer Position:

The Employer, in defense of these two objections, offered Ben Smith, Henry Conly, and John Clary as witnesses. Smith testified that at the first meeting on June 27, it was his objective to inform the employees that it could be hard bargaining and that wages could be reduced. He referred to a newspaper article telling the story of unions which had agreed to pay cuts and reductions in benefits . . . with the point that "these unionized companies bargain with the unions for less money and less fringe benefits for their employees.[4]

[3] Employer's Exhibit 2.

[4] Excerpts from Smith's speech were provided as Employer's Exhibit 4, with the Employer refusing to put the entire speech into the record, advising that the other portions did not deal with the objections raised herein.

At the second series of meetings (July 6 and 7) Smith testified that he read from Employer's Exhibit 5 and "referred to the chart" on a tripod but did not put on a display of it. The chart reflected the differences between average industry wages and New Boston wages for certain job titles.[5] It was noted in his speech that New Boston wages were anywhere from $1.89 to 24 cents an hour above the average industry wage. A copy of excerpts of Smith's speech as provided, as Employer's Exhibit 5, and therein he stated:

> . . . And, if need be, we will bargain in good faith at New Boston. You need to understand, however, that we will not agree to anything in a union contract which we believe is not in the best interest of the company. Take, for example, wages and benefits. It is clear to me that we would have a strong argument in any negotiations that wages and benefits are already too high here. Now, I am not threatening you people; you have a legal right to have a union represent you. But because we care about you as employees, you need to understand that we have a legal right to bargain hard for what we believe is best for the business. Now we have some further information which we will discuss with you before you vote which leads us to believe that this union will agree to lower wages and benefits than we have right now in New Boston.

Smith appeared to reluctantly admit that he was aware wages were basically higher at New Boston than at Nacogdoches, and that Coushatta was mentioned in the meetings and "it may have been Nacogdoches too." He believed Coushatta and Nacogdoches were included in the survey's figures (chart referred to in his speech and previously identified as Employer's Exhibit 17.)

Henry Conly testified that he spoke from a prepared statement on July 13 and 14, using the statement as an outline, and that he utilized a chart comparing UPIU average wages with New Boston's. Ultimately, he advised he spoke with everyone in the plant's conference room of the office building, everyone who was logistically available. A copy of excerpts[6] from his speech was provided as Employer's Exhibit 13. And a copy of the chart was provided (minus the wages and differences in wages) as Employer's Exhibit 18. An excerpt from the excerpts of the speech reads:

> . . . Now, if you were bargaining for the Company, and you found cut that the Union had never negotiated wages and benefits as good as what you had paid before the union was voted in, what kind of hard bargain would you demand? Of course, the Union does not want you all to think about union wages and benefits. The union would like to forget about these wages, too. I can assure you, however, that if we are required to negotiate wages and benefits with this union, these [chart] are the wages we will insist on in a lumbermill contract at New Boston.[7]

Conly's testimony regarding the posting of Nacogdoches and Coushatta wages was contradictory. In earlier testimony Conly answered:

> Q. In fact, you posted the wage rates from Coushatta at one point, didn't you?
>
> A. Not any meetings that I delivered.
> Q. I mean after the meetings, do you have knowledge that the Coushatta wage rates were posted in the plant?
>
> A. As an official posting on a bulletin board?
> Q. That the company put it up somwhere where employees could see it.
>
> A. We had an information room where the wage rates were available at any of several mills.
> Q. I am going to ask this question again. Were the wage rates from Coushatta posted someplace in the plant where employees could see them?
> A. Not that I recall.

Later Conly admitted the Coushatta wages were posted in the plant on July 19; but insisted they were not posted during his speeches on July 13 and July 14. Conley advised that he told employees he had been "involved in" the negotiations of the contract at Coushatta, that he was on the negotiation committee. In other testimony, he denied ever mentioning Coushatta or Nacogdoches in his comments.

Conely recalled making a statement on July 13 that if the Paperworkers were certified and they started contract negotiations, that "they should pack a lunch" (perhaps stating this in three or four of the employee meetings). He specifically denied saying he was a hard bargainer but said that "they would insist on bargaining for competitive rates."

John L. Clary, Manager of Employee Programs, testified that he prepared the chart containing the average wages paid by the UPIU represented lumber mills and the differences in the wages (to New Boston's). No specific references were made on the chart to Coushatta or Nacogdoches. He did not recall Conly mentioning Coushatta or Nacogdoches but he recalled responding to a question of an employee in one of the meetings that Coushatta's wages were included in the averages on the chart.

Discussion, Analysis and Recommendation:

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969) the standards for evaluating an employer's prediciton of the possible effects of unionization are measured as follows:

> (The employer) may . . . . make a prediciton as to the precise effect he believes unionization will have on his company. In such case, however, the prediction must be carefully phrased on the basis of objec-

[5] Employer's Exhibit 17.

[6] The Employer refused to furnish the entire speech, advising that other portions did not deal with the objections raised herein.

[7] Conly stated he was aware that wages were higher at New Boston than at Nacogdoches and Coushatta—varying from 20 cents an hour on some jobs to $2.00 on other jobs.

> tive fact to convey an employer's belief as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control . . . . If there is any implication that an employer may or may not take action soley on his own initiative for reasons Unrelated to economic necessities and known only to him, the statement is no longer a reasonable prediction based on available facts but a threat of retaliation based on misrepresentation and coerion, and as such without the protection of the First Amendment . . . .

The employees who listened to the Employer's speeches were not aware of the legal terms which can make a speech either coercive or non-coercive, but were average-type production workers. Almand recalled Conly stating[8] that he would try to negotiate New Boston's wages down with those at Coushatta and Nacogdoches (both UPIU represented mills). Almand recalled Conly stating they were being paid too much. Lofland also testified that Conly made wage comparisons between New Boston and Coushatta and pointed to Coushatta's wages on a bulletin board and said "these wages are the ones we are shooting for." Similarly, Conway stated that Conly told the employee group he attended that he (Conly) would do everything he could to get wages lowered to that of other mills; that he wanted to negotiate and they would get their wages lowered. Whether the terms used were "bargain" or "negotiate" the wages down, the effect was the same to these employees.

One of the issues of fact was whether the Employer's charts used in the meetings contained wage comparisons between Coushatta, Nacogdoches, and New Boston. While the charts provided as exhibits by the Employer (after the close of the hearing) do not indicate any reference to Coushatta or Nacogdoches, the undersigned concludes that this is not pivotal because the chart containing Coushatta and Nacogdoches wages compared to New Boston wages was posted shortly before the election. Conly himself, finally, testified that the Nacogdoches and Coushatta wages were posted on July 19 (transcript pages 183–184). Lofland, Conway and Almand all concurred in their testimony of seeing these wage comparisons and seeing that the New Boston wages were higher. Further, both employer witnesses Smith and Clary recalled "Coushatta" and "Nacogdoches" being mentioned in the meetings. It would not be difficult for anyone to get confused, after a series of meetings where charts were shown, and to believe that the figures recalled were on one set of charts rather than another, especially as these figures were posted (and the speeches referring to UPIU wage averages all occurred) within a short span of time in July.

While the petitioner's witnesses may not have been knowledgeable on dates of speeches, the undersigned specifically credits the testimony of Almand, Conway, and Lofland regarding the Employer negotiating or bargaining their wages down, or "shooting for Coushatta's wages." Both Almand and Lofland were direct and careful in their testimony. Lofland had made some notes of Conly's remarks some time after the speeches, voluntarily obtained them from his vehicle upon request of Employer's counsel, and testified consistently with those notes thereafter. While Conway was credible, he appeared to be easily led by both the petitioner and Employer's counsel, and his recall was not as accurate as Lofland's and Almand's. Further, the excerpts from the Employer's speeches confirmed many of the ideas expressed by these witnesses.

Conly, on the other hand, was not as credible, especially with respect to his testimony concerning the posting of the Coushatta wage rates. He appeared to be knowledgeable but reluctant, and at times he was evasive in his answers. While some of this could be explained by the "critical" position in which he was placed during this campaign, the undersigned does not believe this was the reason for his lack of forthrightness.

As seen by all of the Employer's literature (excerpts provided) and by the testimony of Smith and Conly, the campaign was obviously designed to emphasize and reemphasize the Employer's higher wage rates vs. the Union's lower wage rates at other IP lumber mills. While Section 8(c) of the Act permits an employer to portray its practices (and furnish specific details) with respect to its represented employees so that the voters can be completely informed, the employer is not free to predict and/or warn of wage and benefit decreases if the employees do not vote against the union representation.

The undersigned concludes that the general tone of the Employer's meetings was negative and left the impressions that: (1) the employees were making more money than the Employer's union-represented mills; (2) the UPIU had not been able to negotiate wages as good as those currently enjoyed in New Boston; (3) Conly had negotiated (or been involved in the negotiations (at Coushatta) and would be involved in negotiations in New Boston if the UPIU were elected; (4) Conly indicated the bargaining could be long (bring a sack lunch) and that they would bargain for wages like those at the other union-represented mills, i.e. like Coushatta and Nacogdoches. The undersigned further conludes that the reasonable effects upon the employees of such an employer campaign (with Coushatta's wages being posted two days before the election), could only be inhibitory, inculcate in employees a sense of futility, create an "atmosphere of apprehension in the voters' minds" and interfere with the employees' choice in the election to come. Mohawk Bedding Co. 204 NLRB 277. North American Car Corporation 253 NLRB 958.

Accordingly, it is recommended that these objections be sustained and a second election directed.

[8] While it was not clear at which meeting in July he heard this statement, this did not cause his recollections to be lacking in credibility.

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 27 September 1983 the Acting Regional Director for Region 20 issued his Decision and Direction of Election finding appropriate two single-store units consisting of beauty salon employees of the Employers at stores located in downtown San Francisco, California, and in the Stonestown shopping center in San Francisco, California. The Employers filed timely requests for review and supporting briefs contending, among other things, that the only appropriate unit would include beauty salon employees in 21 Emporium-Capwell stores located in the San Francisco Bay area. The Petitioner filed a statement in opposition.

By telegraphic order dated 28 October 1983, the Board granted the Employers' request for review with respect to the appropriateness of the two single-store units.[1] That same date, the Regional Office conducted elections in the two single-store units and impounded the ballots.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the requests for review and supporting briefs and has decided to affirm the Acting Regional Director's findings and conclusions as modified.

Emporium-Capwell operates 21 retail stores in the San Francisco Bay area, where it provides beauty salon services in conjunction with its lessees Seligman & Latz and Kree Institute of Electrology. The Union petitioned to represent in a single unit the beauty salon employees at Emporium-Capwell's stores in downtown San Francisco and in the Stonestown shopping center in San Francisco, California. Alternatively, the Union indicated that it would represent the beauty salon employees in two separate single-store units. The Employers contended that the only appropriate unit would include the beauty salon employees at all 21 Emporium-Capwell stores in the San Francisco Bay area. As noted, the Acting Regional Director found appropriate the two single-store units alternatively requested by the Union, and we affirm.

There are a total of about 190 beauty salon employees in the 21 store unit sought by the Employers. The greatest distance between any two of these stores is about 170 miles. Downtown San Francisco and Stonestown, the two closest stores, are located only about 8 miles apart.[2] Nonsupervisory employees in the beauty salons at the downtown San Francisco store total about 30 (including employees in the Soul Scissors salon) and nonsupervisory employees in the Stonestown salon total about 20.

There is no history of collective bargaining among the Employers' beauty salon employees in the units here involved. But the Union has long had collective-bargaining agreements with Emporium-Capwell covering retail employees in the downtown San Francisco and Stonestown stores.

The Employers proffered evidence of some transfers among beauty salon employees in the 21 stores. However, there is no evidence of temporary transfers among nonsupervisory employees, and the only reason shown in the record for permanent transfers of nonsupervisory employees was the personal convenience of the employees involved.[3] Management does not encourage transfers because employees are expected to establish their own clientele and the salons would lose business if employees shifted frequently from salon to salon. The Acting Regional Director found that the record disclosed about 35 instances where employees at one of the Employers' beauty salons transferred to another over a period of almost 20 years. But in many instances the record merely shows that employees who worked in one of the Employers' salons had also worked in one or more other salons.[4] The record also shows that at the time of

[1] The requests for review were denied with respect to the Acting Regional Director's findings: (1) that Emporium-Capwell, Seligman & Latz, and Kree Institute of Electrology are joint employers of the beauty salon employees here involved, and (2) that the Union is not disqualified from representing these employees because it admits to membership owner-operators of beauty shops who are in competition with the Employers and who may be elected to the Union's executive board. On this latter point, the Acting Regional Director found that the record does not establish that any of the owner-operators with whom the Union has collective-bargaining agreements are on the Union's executive board or have any role in determining the Union's bargaining strategy.

[2] The average distance between the downtown San Francisco and Stonestown stores and the other stores is 35 or 40 miles, and the greatest distance between the downtown San Francisco/Stonestown stores and any of the other stores is a little over 100 miles.

[3] The Employers do not contest the Acting Regional Director's finding that "[w]ith the exception of supervisory and managerial personnel, the record discloses no instance of a temporary assignment or transfer of an employee" (Decision and Direction of Election, p. 6). Nor do the Employers contest the Acting Regional Director's finding that "[w]here reasons [for transfers] were given . . . the record reflects that the transfers were for the personal convenience of the employee involved." Id.

[4] The Employers' evidence on this point consisted of the testimony of Seligman & Latz Account Executive Barry Kinder who named about 40

the hearing 3 of approximately 190 employees in the 21 salons worked part time in 2 or more of the salons.[5]

Salon employees in all 21 stores are subject to the same general work rules and employment practices and are paid according to a uniform wage scale, but some employment benefits differ. Salon employees at Capwell stores receive vacation benefits based on average pay; those at Emporium stores receive benefits based on base pay. Employees at the downtown San Francisco and Stonestown salons pay less for benefit coverage than do employees at other salons. Account Executive Barry Kinder testified that the lower benefit cost to these employees is probably related to the Union's collective-bargaining agreement covering retail employees at the downtown San Francisco and Stonestown salons.

All salons in the 21 stores are under the central management of Account Executive Kinder.[6] He makes final decisions on whether employees are hired, fired, transferred, or promoted. He also approves wage increases and vacation schedules and may consult with local salon managers on vacation schedules or scheduling changes. Kinder may visit a salon once a month or once every other month.[7] He or his assistant is in daily telephone contact with almost all the salons.

Each salon is supervised on a daily basis by the local manager.[8] Salon managers may recruit and interview applicants for employment and make recommendations regarding hiring. After Kinder has authorized the hiring of an employee for a given number of hours a week, the salon manager schedules the hours the employee will work. Salon managers are also responsible for training and developing new staff. They are required to keep accurate personnel records and to evaluate employees monthly. Salon managers counsel employees on their work performance and may sign reprimands called counseling memos. According to the manager's manual, an employee may be discharged after three counseling memos. But, as noted, Kinder has authority to make the final decision to discharge.

Employees at each salon have basically the same work rules and employment practices. Kinder testified that salon managers are expected to see that employees live up to the rules, but that some managers are tougher in policing the rules than others.[9] Salon managers deal with employee conflicts within the salon and normally handle first-step employee grievances. They authorize employees time off for sick leave and may approve scheduling changes. Additional responsibilities listed in the sample job description for salon managers in the manager's manual include "[m]ak[ing] decisions/-recommendations on personnel changes," establishing rapport with the manager of the store where the salon is located, attending store management meetings, and ensuring that the salon meets its assigned sales goals. With Kinder's approval, salon managers may offer specials during slow time in their salons and the timing of these specials is largely up to the salon manager.

Despite the centralized administration of the Employer's beauty salons, we find that the single-store units at downtown San Francisco and Stonestown, California, are appropriate. See NLRB v. Lerner Stores, 506 F.2d 706, 708 (9th Cir. 1974); Spring City Knitting Co. v. NLRB, 647 F.2d 1011, 1014 (9th Cir. 1981); Renzetti's Market, 238 NLRB 174, 175 (1978). In our view, the local salon manager exercises a sufficient degree of autonomy in day-to-day supervision of the salon employees to support the single-store units. See B. Siegel Co. v. NLRB, of the Employers' beauty salon employees, past and present, who had also worked at one or more other beauty salons. Kinder acknowledged that in some instances there may have been gaps between the periods of employment at the different salons, and he included in the employment histories work in beauty salons in stores outside the 21-store unit sought by the Employers. In many instances, Kinder did not specify the times when the employees worked in different salons, but he testified that one of the instances occurred in the 1960s and another about 12 years before the hearing. Fewer than 10 of the cited employment histories involved nonsupervisory employees who worked in the downtown San Francisco or Stonestown salons and in another salon within the 21-store unit sought by the Employers. Some of these employees were no longer employed at downtown San Francisco or Stonestown; others have had uninterrupted service at downtown San Francisco or Stonestown since the 1960s or early 1970s.

Emporium-Capwell contests the Acting Regional Director's finding that 15 of the transferees were supervisors, urging that no more than 13 of the transferees were supervisors and that not all were permanent supervisors. We accept the truth of this assertion, but do not view it as altering the overall picture of insubstantial interchange of unit employees.

[5] One of these three employees had recently moved to San Francisco and was apparently attempting to build up a clientele there before terminating work in his old salon. Another employee supervised electrolysis in salons providing that service. The third did not work in the downtown San Francisco or Stonestown salons. A fourth employee is erroneously listed in the Acting Regional Director's decision as currently working a split week in three salons. That employee was a salon manager at the time of the hearing. She had previously worked as a cosmetician, dividing her time among three salons, but had never worked at downtown San Francisco or Stonestown.

[6] Kinder also has responsibility for nine other salons at Liberty House stores. But he testified that his involvement in those salons is not as detailed as his involvement in the 23 salons (including the 2 Soul Scissors facilities) at the 21 Emporium-Capwell stores.

[7] Kinder testified that he visits the Stonestown salon at least once a month and that his visit might be brief or might last half a day. An employee at the Stonestown salon testified that he saw Kinder at the store maybe every other month and that Kinder or his assistant occasionally watches the salon function.

[8] In four salons (including the main San Francisco and Stonestown salons), the manager performs only supervisory duties. In other salons, the manager is a working manager who also performs hair care services for customers.

[9] The record shows, for example, that one salon manager told employees they need not wear ties despite published dress guidelines that at the time required men to wear ties.

670 F.2d 64, 65 (6th Cir. 1982); Renzetti's Market, supra, 238 NLRB at 175–176. The Employers have not shown that the day-to-day supervision of unit employees is "done solely by central office officials." NLRB v. Lerner Stores, supra, 506 F.2d at 708. On the contrary, day-to-day supervision is necessarily performed, in large measure, by the local salon managers. Nor have the Employers shown a sufficient degree of employee interchange involving the downtown San Francisco/-Stonestown salons so as to destroy their status as "identifiable units." Id. Rather, there were no temporary transfers among unit employees and such permanent transfers as occurred within the unit were not shown to be for any reason other than the personal convenience of the employees involved. See Friendly Ice Cream Corp. v. NLRB, 705 F.2d 570, 578–579 (1st Cir. 1983); NLRB v. Pan American Petroleum Corp., 444 F.2d 328, 578–579 (10th Cir. 1971), cert. denied 404 U.S. 941 (1971); Buehler's Food Markets, 232 NLRB 785, 786 (1977).[10] The significant distances among the stores, although not conclusive, provide further support for single-store units. See Victoria Station v. NLRB, 586 F.2d 672, 675 (9th Cir. 1978); Buehler's Food Markets, supra, 232 NLRB at 786. Finally, there is an absence of any bargaining history on a broader basis or any request for representation on a broader basis. See NLRB v. Lerner Stores Corp., supra, 506 F.2d at 708; Renzetti's Market, supra, 238 NLRB at 176.

Cases cited by the Employer where single-facility units were rejected are factually distinguishable.[11] For example, in Super X Drugs of Illinois, 233 NLRB 1114 (1977), the 5 stores were much closer than the 21 stores here involved, the store managers could not reprimand employees without prior approval of the district manager, the latter spent more time in the individual stores than does the account executive here, and there was significant temporary employee interchange.

In Petrie Stores Corp., 266 NLRB 75 (1983), the union had petitioned for 10 single-store units and had excluded other stores of the employer's that were located in the same shopping malls with the petitioned-for stores. The closeness of these stores was reflected in a substantial interchange of employees on a temporary basis, local managers were not involved in scheduling, branch supervisors visited each store at least once every 2 weeks, and the employees had companywide seniority.[12]

In short, the employers in the cited cases made a persuasive rebuttal to the presumptive appropriateness of a single-facility unit that was not made by the Employers here.

Accordingly, on the facts presented here, we find the following units appropriate for collective bargaining:

> All receptionists, electrologists, cosmetologists, manicurists and cosmeticians employed by the Employers at the Emporium-Capwell facility located in downtown San Francisco, California, including the Soul Scissors department, excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.
> All receptionists, electrologists, cosmetologists, manicurists, and cosmeticians employed by the Employers at the Emporium-Capwell facility located in the Stonestown Shopping Center, San Francisco, California; excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Accordingly, we shall remand the case to the Regional Director with directions to open and count the impounded ballots, to issue tallys of ballots, and to take further appropriate action.

[10] Emporium-Capwell expresses concern that if employees in the downtown San Francisco and Stonestown salons are permitted to organize, the employees could no longer work part time in two or more salons because continuation of that practice would pose "some virtually unresolvable issues concerning Union jurisdiction over individual employees." (Br. 16.) This concern seems unwarranted since out of the approximately 50 salon employees at downtown San Francisco and Stonestown only 1 employee was performing nonsupervisory work in another salon at the time of the hearing and he was apparently attempting to build up a sufficient clientele in San Francisco so that he could stop work at his old location. In any event, no serious issue of union jurisdiction would be presented by employees' continuing to work part time in two or more salons. Regular part-time or dual-function employees would be in the unit and covered by any collective-bargaining agreement only when performing a substantial amount of unit work. See Ocala Star Banner, 97 NLRB 384, 385–386 (1951); Berea Publishing Co., 140 NLRB 516, 519 (1963); Marine Petroleum Co., 238 NLRB 931, 932 (1978). They would be out of the unit when performing nonunit work.

[11] Unit determinations, by their nature, are highly fact specific. See NLRB v. WKRG TV, 470 F.2d 1302, 1311 (5th Cir. 1973) ("determination of a unit's appropriateness will invariably involve factual situations peculiar to the employees and unit at issue").

[12] Similarly, in White Castle System, 264 NLRB 267 (1982), district supervisors made daily visits to each restaurant to check on the employees' performance, there were hundreds of temporary transfers in a year, and there was a history of collective bargaining in a Detroit-area unit. The district supervisor in Kirlin's Inc., 227 NLRB 1220 (1977), visited each of the six stores on a weekly or biweekly basis, handling any problems that might occur in day-to-day operations; there were temporary and permanent transfers to meet management's needs; hourly scheduling of employees was performed by the home office; and two of the six stores were located only 100 yards apart in the same shopping mall. In ITT Continental Baking Co., 231 NLRB 326 (1977), the local store managers were so lacking in authority that they were found not to be statutory supervisors and in Second Federal Savings, 266 NLRB 204 (1983), the local branch offices did not have managers. Finally, in NLRB v. Chicago Health & Tennis Clubs, 567 F.2d 331, 337–338 (7th Cir. 1977), cert. denied 437 U.S. 904 (1978), the court rejected the Board's approval of a single-store unit on the grounds that the union had previously sought representation in the Chicago metropolitan area unit urged by the employer; there were temporary transfers on almost a daily basis, as well as significant permanent transfers; and the store managers lacked authority to perform many functions, including authority to handle grievances or post weekly work schedules without prior approval by the district manager.

ORDER

It is ordered that this case be remanded to the Regional Director for Region 20 to open and count the ballots cast in the elections conducted in this proceeding on 28 October 1983, to issue tally of ballots thereon, and to take further appropriate action.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 20 April 1983 Administrative Law Judge Thomas E. Bracken issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The issue presented is whether the Respondent failed to bargain in good faith with the Union over its decision to create new supervisory positions, and to staff those positions by promoting unit employees. The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally removing 21 employees from the bargaining unit; by refusing to honor and apply the terms of the current collective-bargaining agreement to those employees; by failing and refusing to withhold from the promoted employees' wages dues authorized to be deducted by dues checkoff and failing to remit those dues to the Union; and by failing and refusing to bargain with the Union over the impact of the promotions. We disagree.

The operative facts begin with the Union's certification on 19 September 1979 in the following unit:

> All office employees employed by the Employer at its facilities located at 4650 Hampton Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri, and 1111 Woods Mills Road, St. Louis County, Missouri, EXCLUDING managerial employees, confidential employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Negotiations for the parties' first contract commenced in April 1980. At that time the Respondent employed approximately 16 employees plus General Manager Mitchell, Manager Mann, Assistant Manager Reese, and four persons—Hoepfinger, Beal, Ukena, and Harster—who were called supervisors by the parties. The latter four individuals had asked Mitchell if they could be included in the bargaining unit. Consequently, during the negotiations, Mitchell told union representative O'Toole that the Respondent would include the supervisors in the bargaining unit. There was never any discussion as to whether the supervisors met the definition of a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

The Union submitted a proposed recognition clause which read as follows: "The Company agrees to recognize the Union as sole collective bargaining agent for all office and office clerical employees including supervisors, excluding the manager and assistant manager." The Respondent offered a counterproposal, which was accepted by the Union, recognizing the Union in a unit "of all employees working as office employees and excluding managers." The parties then agreed to classify Hoepfinger, Beal, Ukena, and Harster as "administrators" and to include them in the bargaining unit. The parties reached agreement on a contract which was effective from 16 July 1980 through 15 July 1983.

From the summer of 1980 until the end of 1981, the Respondent experienced a phenomenal growth in its operations which resulted in the augmentation of its two facilities with four new branch offices. Also, the employment complement grew from a total of 23 to 60 employees.

Throughout this time, General Manager Mitchell, Manager Mann, and Assistant Manager Reese were the only individuals not covered by the collective-bargaining agreement. Only Mann and Reese had the power to hire, fire, discipline, and process grievances during that period of time. Additionally, Mann was the only person who established employee breaktimes or authorized overtime, and he, together with Reese, approved scheduled vacations and float days.

The four administrators did not have the authority to hire, fire, discipline, effectively recommend the same, or to assign work to employees. In fact, they performed bargaining unit tasks in addition to having responsibility for the administration of their respective departments. Accordingly, it does not appear that the administrators were supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

[1] The General Counsel's motion to strike the Respondent's first exception for lack of clarity is hereby denied.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In agreeing with his colleagues that the facts of the instant case distinguish it from those relied on by the judge, Member Hunter expresses no view on the merits of those cases.

In November 1981, the Respondent initiated plans for a reorganization in response to its accelerated growth. Effective 1 January 1982, the Respondent established a new management hierarchy and promoted 22 employees into the new supervisory and managerial positions. Hoepfinger, Ukena, Krems, and Stinnett, the administrators at that time, were among those promoted.[3] Assistant Manager Reese, also among the 22, was given the additional responsibility of branch office operations.

The Respondent effectuated its reorganization without notice to or prior bargaining with the Union. Moreover, the Respondent announced that those promoted would no longer be covered by the collective-bargaining agreement and therefore would not be required to pay union dues. Accordingly, the Respondent ceased to deduct dues from their paychecks.

The parties subsequently met on 10 February 1982 to discuss the reorganization. O'Toole complained to Manager Mann that the new managers were still performing bargaining unit work. Mann responded that he needed more time to hire additional people to fill the bargaining unit vacancies created by the promotions and the Union raised no objections. In fact, between 31 December 1981 and mid-July 1982, the Respondent opened two more branch offices and its work force was increased from approximately 60 to 135 employees, supervisors, and managers.

The Respondent contended that it had no obligation to bargain with the Union because those who were promoted became Section 2(11) supervisors who occupied positions not intended by the parties to be included in the bargaining unit. Consequently, the Respondent felt justified in ceasing to deduct union dues from the employees' pay.

The General Counsel argued, and the judge concurred, that the parties had agreed to include supervisors in the bargaining unit, that whether those promoted in January 1982 were actually Section 2(11) supervisors was irrelevant, and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally promoting the employees and refusing to bargain with the Union thereafter. Both the General Counsel and the judge relied on Arizona Electric Cooperative, 250 NLRB 1132 (1980), and Carolina Telephone Co., 258 NLRB 1387 (1981). Further, the judge relied on Kendall College, 228 NLRB 1083 (1977), in holding that the Respondent's promotions had a significant impact on the bargaining unit such that the Respondent had an obligation to bargain with the Union over the Respondent's reduction of the bargaining unit.

First, we disagree with the judge's conclusion that the parties agreed to include supervisors in the bargaining unit. The parties did agree to include four employee administrators, but it is clear that these individuals were not supervisors within the statutory definition. This is especially true in light of the very small work force in existence at the time the contract was negotiated. Furthermore, the Respondent objected to the Union's specific reference to "supervisor" in the recognition clause proposed by the Union and instead included only office employees and excluded managers.

Second, we reject the notion that it is irrelevant whether or not the promoted employees were statutory supervisors. In this regard the judge has misplaced his reliance on Arizona Electric, supra and Carolina Telephone, supra. In Arizona Electric, supra, the Board held that the respondent had violated the Act by unilaterally removing certain employees from the bargaining unit during the midterm of the contract, and reclassifying them as supervisors. The Board found it irrelevant to determine whether the promoted individuals were supervisors but focused on the fact that the parties had previously agreed to the inclusion of these employees in the bargaining unit and that there had been no change in either the employees' job duties or in the Respondent's operations. Similarly, the Board held in Carolina Telephone, supra, that the Respondent violated the Act by unilaterally excluding a group of secretaries from the unit when the parties had initially agreed to their inclusion and their duties had not materially changed before their removal from the unit.

In the instant case, unlike the factual settings in Arizona Electric and Carolina Telephone, supra, the duties of the unit employees who were promoted had changed. The Respondent did not merely retitle bargaining unit employees who, but for a classification change, would have continued to perform bargaining unit work. Instead, the Respondent required the promoted employees to perform supervisory tasks and imbued them with the authority of statutory supervisors and managers—powers and responsibilities that they had not previously enjoyed when performing strictly bargaining unit work.

In particular, 12 of the individuals named in the complaint—Vivian Harster, Karen Schmidt, Pat Schmidt, Cheryl Hood, Ron Bull, Dennis Cook, Jo Ellen Voss, Pauline Hill, Claire Louis, Barbara Stimac, Charlotte Jones, and Joyce Bell—are either branch managers or assistant branch managers. The parties stipulated that the managers and their assistants have the same powers. The evidence establishes that these powers include the authority to discharge, to schedule working hours, and to resolve first-step grievances. On this evidence, we find that the branch managers and assistant branch managers are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

The remaining alleged discriminatees are Pat Voss, supervisor of loans and collections; Jackie Hamra, assistant supervisor in charge of collections; Norman Gericke, assistant supervisor in charge of mortgage loans; Sharon Wright, supervisor of certificates, new accounts, and daily action funds; Terry Cartwright, supervisor of share drafts and VISA; Bill Rogers, assistant supervisor of IRA accounts; Jo Ward, supervisor of accounting; Karen Aronoff, assistant supervisor in charge of tellers; and Dennis Manning, manager of supplies.

Union representative O'Toole testified that he considered Jackie Hamra, Norman Gericke, Sharon Wright, Terry Cartwright, Jo Ward, and Karen Aronoff to be supervisors. He further testified that he viewed Pat Voss and Dennis Manning as managers but did not consider Bill Rogers to be either a supervisor or manager.

Jackie Hamra assists Pat Voss in the loan and collection department. In his absence, she is in charge of the department but, otherwise, she is responsible for the work of the two or three clerks in the division. Hamra also evaluates job performances of employees and has effectively recommended the discharge of an employee.

Norman Gericke also reports to Pat Voss and is responsible for the work of several clerks dealing with real estate loans and first and second mortgages. Gericke evaluates the job performances of the clerks in his department and trains them in their areas of deficiencies.

Karen Aronoff schedules working hours and assigns work to the tellers in the main facility. She reports to Jo Ward who evaluates clerks and tellers, assigns work, and has discharged an employee. Both Ward and Voss report to Shirley Ukena, manager of operations, who reports directly to General Manager Mann.

Sharon Wright is responsible for the work of between 11–25 employees who handle new accounts, certificates, and the daily action fund. Terry Cartwright has the responsibility for the work of about seven employees in the share draft and VISA department. Bill Rogers heads the newly formed IRA accounts division, staffed with two or three clerks. He is also responsible for all the IRA accounts generated by the branches and he trains the IRA personnel at the Respondent's various locations. Rogers, Wright, and Cartwright report to Jan Stinnett, manager of new accounts/certificates and investments, who reports directly to General Manager Mann.

Finally, Dennis Manning assists Donna Krems, assistant supervisor of administration. Krems reports to Dale Hoepfinger, manager of administration, who reports directly to General Manager Mann. The parties stipulated at trial that Hoepfinger has the authority to process grievances for the Respondent, has access to employee personnel files and records, and that Krems possesses Hoepfinger's responsibilities and authorities in his absence. Manning is responsible for the physical management of the main facility and its branches including handling tenant complaints, securing and monitoring janitorial and security services, managing equipment and maintenance contracts, and overseeing courier services.

It is clear that Hamra, Gericke, and Aronoff are statutory supervisors by virtue of their respective authorities to recommend discharge, to evaluate employees, and to schedule and assign work. Aronoff reports to Ward who occupies a position in the Respondent's hierarchy at the same level as Voss, to whom Hamra and Gericke report. Ward has exercised the authority to discharge an employee, and she also has the authority to evaluate employee performances. Thus, Ward too is a statutory supervisor. It can safely be inferred that Voss, Rogers, Wright, and Cartwright possess at least as much authority as do Hamra, Aronoff, and Gericke, who are on the hierarchical rung below them, and that they must share Ward's authority to discharge. Accordingly, we find that Voss, Rogers, Wright, and Cartwright are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

Union representative O'Toole testified that in his opinion Dennis Manning was a manager and should be excluded from the bargaining units. Prior to the reorganization, Manager Mann performed the tasks for which Manning is now responsible. Consequently these duties had never been considered to be bargaining unit work and Manning is accordingly excluded from the unit.

Having determined that the Respondent promoted these individuals into true supervisory positions, the crucial issue is whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by promoting them without bargaining with the Union. We emphasize first that neither the decision to create new supervisory positions nor the selection of individuals to fill these positions is a mandatory subject of bargaining.[4] Under the Act, neither party may dictate to the other its choice of representatives and, therefore, an employer need not bargain with a union over its selection of supervisors. However, an employer may have an obligation to bargain with a union if it reduces bargaining unit work. For instance, if an individual promoted to a supervisory position continues to perform former bargaining unit work, that loss of work to the bargaining unit may be a change in the terms and conditions of employment that could give rise to a bargaining obligation under Section 8(d) of the Act.

Unlike the situation in Kendall College, supra, where the Board found that the respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by removing a substantial number of employees from the bargaining unit unilaterally and thereby abolishing bargaining unit jobs, the Respondent's personnel action here was not sufficient to give rise to any duty to bargain with the Union. The Respondent immediately began hiring replacements to fill the bargaining unit vacancies temporarily created by its decision. Although some of the promoted individuals continued to perform a degree of bargaining unit work while new employees were being hired, the Respondent could not have been expected to have exactly 21 new employees waiting in the wings at the same time it promoted another 21 employees. Ultimately, no unit jobs were lost; in fact, more were created. The Respondent is accorded a reasonable period of time during the transition within which to fill its bargaining unit vacancies, thus eradicating any temporary job losses and negating a duty to bargain over the reduction of bargaining unit work. Accordingly, we find Kendall College, supra, inapposite to the instant case and find, contrary to the judge, that the Respondent did not have an obligation under these circumstances to bargain with the Union over its reorganization.

Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[4] Consequently, the Respondent also did not violate the Act by ceasing to make dues deductions from promoted employees' wages or by exempting them from coverage of the collective-bargaining agreement.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS E. BRACKEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at St. Louis, Missouri, September 13, 14, and 15 and November 29, 1982.[1] The charge was filed by the Union on June 11 (amended July 9 and September 1), and the complaint was issued July 13. The original complaint alleges that the Respondent, St. Louis Telephone Employees Credit Union, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, as to employees Charolotte Jones, Karen Aronoff, Jackie Hamra, Norman Gericke, Karen Schmidt, Cheryl Hood, Dennis Cook, Claire Louis, Joyce Bell, Jo Ward, Sharon Wright, and Bill Rogers. On September 1, an amendment to the complaint was issued which added the names of 13 additional employees, alleging that their rights had been violated, just as those set forth in the original complaint. These additional employees were Dale Hoepfinger, Donna Krems, Shirley Ukena, Pat Voss, Jan Stinnett, Terry Cartwright, Vivian Harster, Pat Schmidt, Ron Bull, Jo Ellen Voss, Pauline Hill, Barbara Stimac, and Dennis Manny.[2] The violations alleged were for unilaterally changing job classifications, wages, benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment of employees; by refusing to apply the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union to these employees; by requiring these employees to withdraw from the Union, canceling their dues-checkoff agreements, and failing to withhold dues from the wages of these employees, and not remitting to the Charging Party dues consistent with valid employee authorization checkoff provisions; by refusing to bargain with the Charging Party, on request, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees of Respondent; and failing to bargain in good faith with the Charging Party by reneging on an agreement to waive all time periods for the filing of grievances regarding the aforementioned charges.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Employer, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a Missouri corporation, has been engaged in the operation of a credit union for approximately 47 years, with its main office in St. Louis, Missouri. During the 12-month period ending July 30, 1982, Respondent loaned money to and secured deposits from individuals, valued in excess of $500,000, of which an amount in excess of $50,000 represents deposits from and/or loans to individuals located outside the State of Missouri. Respondent admits, and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] All dates are in 1982, unless otherwise indicated.

[2] During the course of the hearing, the General Counsel's motion to withdraw the complaint as to Hoepfinger, Krems, Ukena, and Stinnett was granted. The parties stipulated that from and after January 1, 1982, these four employees have the power and have exercised such power to evaluate Respondent's branch managers as to the personnel relations and branch operations, that Hoepfinger has the authority to process grievances for the Respondent, that these employees have had access to employee personnel files and records, and that Krems possesses Hoepfinger's responsibilities and authority in his absence.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union, sometimes referred to as Local 13, or the Charging Party, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background[3]

Respondent, sometimes referred to as Company, Employer, or Credit Union, commenced its operation as a credit union in 1935, operating from one office. The members of Respondent, each of whom must own one share of stock, are generally employees of Southwestern Bell Telephone Company, Western Electric Company, Inc., and American Telephone and Telephone Company, Long Lines Division.

Prior to 1980, Respondent employed 17 to 18 employees at its main office located at 4650 Hampton in St. Louis, and at a field office located on premises of the Western Electric Company. At this time it had approximately 13,000 members. From 1980 to September 1982, the membership had increased to approximately 27,000 to 28,000 members. To help service these members in September 1982, the number of Respondent's employees had grown to approximately 135, and it had opened up six additional branch offices.

The controlling body of Respondent is a board of directors consisting of 13 persons who are elected by the membership. All are volunteers, and receive no salary. Prior to 1980, these Board members were chiefly management employees of the cited telephone companies. After 1980, they were primarily members of the Communication Workers of America (CWA), as well as employees of the same companies as listed above. There were also two committees of three persons each, who were elected by the Credit Union membership. One was called the supervisory committee, and it was responsible for audits and compliance with state statutes. The other committee was the credit committee and it was responsible for following the Board's policies and practices regarding loans.

The highest official of Respondent is Thomas Mitchell, whose title was general manager/treasurer. Mitchell, a member of the CWA, was also a member of the Board, and reported directly to the Board. Respondent's manager for all times material hereto, and the key working official in the day-to-day operation of the Credit Union, was Orville Mann. Mann, who was hired on September 4, 1979, reported directly to the general manager/treasurer but, unlike him, was not a member of the board of directors, or a member of the CWA.

Prior to entering into the first and current collective-bargaining agreement in July 1980, the board of directors had established personnel policies which related to the wages and benefits received by the Credit Union employees. At that time there were no written personnel policies as to discipline, misconduct, or discharge, and the manager himself assumed these responsibilities as part of his duties.

B. The Pre-1980 Events

On September 19, 1979, an election was conducted by the National Labor Relations Board for certain employees of Respondent. On September 26, 1979, the Board certified the Charging Party as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative in the following unit:

> All office employees employed by the Employer at its facilities located at 4650 Hampton Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri, and 1111 Woods Mills Road, St. Louis County, Missouri, EXCLUDING managerial employees, confidential employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

At the time of the election there were 16 employees on the agreed-upon voter eligibility list. (R. Exh. 16.) In addition to these employees, the Respondent also employed, at that time, seven other employees, General Manager Mitchell, Manager Orville Mann, Maureen Reese, Joydean Bachelier, John Beal, Vivian Harster, and Dale Hoepfinger. Managers Mitchell, Mann, and Assistant Manager Reese did not vote. Also, the last four named employees did not vote, although the reasons for this are not clear in the record. O'Toole testified that he "believed" that at election time Reese was the supervisor of bookeeping, Hoepfinger was supervisor of accounts, and that Harster was the supervisor of the loan department. He did not remember Beal's title. According to Mann, Reese was the assistant manager, the only assistant manager he ever had,[4] Hoepfinger was the senior collector, Harster the senior loan counselor, Bachelier his secretary, and Beal a general all-around handyman.

Following the certification, contract negotiations were not pursued by Local 13 as a matter of strategy. Membership on Respondent's board of directors was coming up for an election, and Local 13 was looking forward to a new board, whose members would be more union oriented than management oriented. On December 6, 1979, the Union did forward to the Company a proposal consisting of various contract clauses. However, these proposals did not contain a recognition clause.

C. The 1980 Negotiations

About March or April 1980, 6 or 7 months after the certification, negotiations commenced. Local 13's negotiating team consisted of Business Representative Patrick O'Toole, employees Margaret Stoff and Shirley Ukena.[5] Respondent's four-person negotiating team was led by Treasurer Mitchell and his chief assistant manager, Mann.

---

[3] The testimony herein was substantially uncontradicted. There was one major issue of credibility, which concerns whether a company official agreed to allow the Union to waive time limits applicable to the filing of a grievance. A second issue was whether there was a meeting of company and union officials on January 15. I have resolved these credibility issues following the summation of the testimony related thereto.

[4] Reese was at no time a member of the bargaining unit.

[5] Ukena was promoted from an accounting department employee to administrator in that office sometime between the election, and the adoption of the collective-bargaining agreement.

At the first meeting one of the matters discussed was the status of Hoepfinger, Ukena, Harster, and Beal, none of whom had voted in the election. As testified to by Mann, these four employees had previously notified Mitchell that they wanted to be covered by the collective-bargaining agreement. O'Toole testified without contradiction that during the negotiations concerning a recognition clause, Mitchell stated "I'm going to give you something that you'll really like. We're going to include the supervisors in the bargaining unit.[6] O'Toole did not ask Mitchell why he was offering to do so, nor did he specifically name the employees he considered to be supervisors. O'Toole did testify that the Union considered Hoepfinger, Ukena, Harster, and Beal to be supervisors, because they had been excluded from voting in the election.

At the following meeting Local 13 submitted a proposed agreement to the Credit Union, in which the recognition Clause specifically provided that supervisors were to be in the bargaining unit. Article I, captioned "Union Recognition," read as follows:

> The Company agrees to recognize the Union as sole collective bargaining agent for all office and office clerical employees including supervisors, excluding the manager and assistant manager.

This recognition clause was not accepted by Respondent, and at the following session Respondent submitted its own clause, which contained both a recognition clause and management rights clause as follows:

> Recognition
> The Employer agrees to recognize the Union as the sole and exclusive Collective Bargaining Representative for and on behalf of all employees working as office employees and excluding Managers.
> It is agreed that nothing in this agreement shall limit the employer in the exercise of its functions of management to serve the needs of all members, and not limited to the direction of its working forces, the determination of the number of employees it will employ or retain, the right to employ, discipline, discharge, promote, classify, demote, transfer or release employees, determination of the hours of employment and working shifts, scheduling of the production of work to be performed and determination of the operations, methods, and processes being vested in and reserved by the Employer.

While the record does not disclose when the Employer's recognition clause was submitted, or specifically accepted by the Union, it was accepted, and appears in the collective-bargaining agreement that was entered into by the parties for the period of July 16, 1980, to July 15, 1983, inclusive. (G.C. Exh. 3.) O'Toole testified without contradiction that during the negotiations he discussed the matter of supervisors with Treasurer Mitchell, and Mitchell agreed that the persons referred to in the Union's original recognition clause as supervisors, would be classified in the agreement as administrators.[7] The executed agreement in article XII set forth wages for employees under four headings: (1) temporary and part time; (2) clerks, tellers, receptionist; (3) counselors, bookkeeper, secretary; and (4) administrators. This administrator classification covered Hoepfinger, Ukena, Beal, and Harster, and subsequently Jan Stennett, when Harster ceased being an administrator. The administrators' pay was substantially higher than that of the employees in the other classifications.

From the time of the signing of the bargaining agreement until December 31, 1981, the contract covered all wages, hours, terms, and conditions of all employees of the Company, including Hoepfinger, Ukena, Harster, and Beal, excepting only Managers Mitchell, Mann, and Assistant Manager Reese. Also, on several occasions following the signing of the agreement, the parties amended its terms through sound, basic collective bargaining. One matter involved an amendment that concerned holidays that fell on Mondays. The other involved the establishment of a "branch coordinator," and culminated in a letter agreement dated April 6, 1981, by which the Union agreed to the Company's proposal that such a person would receive an extra $3 a day for each workday. (G.C. Exh. 7.) This person was commonly referred to as "in-charge" but had no additional responsibilities and was a classification employee.[8]

D. The Growth of the Credit Union and Changes in the Organizational Structure

Chiefly because of the aggressive policies of Mann, the Credit Union grew tremendously in all aspects from the summer of 1980 through December 31, 1981. When Mann started as manager, the only services offered were loans and savings and checking accounts. He rapidly introduced real estate loans, second mortgages, cashiers checks, travelers checks, trust accounts, custodial accounts, daily action fund accounts, thrift accounts, and IRAs.

To handle this growth the work force grew from the 23 employees at the time of the election, to 60 by the end of December 1981. So also the number of members increased from 13,636 as of June 30, 1980, to 21,628 by December 31, 1981, and for the same period of time, the total assets increased from $26,545,278.83 to [6] On the first day of the hearing Respondent had objected to the admission of this conversation based on the parole evidence rule. Respondent's objections were sustained, and the General Counsel moved for a reconsideration of this ruling. When the hearing resumed, the General Counsel's motion to reconsider was granted, and the conversation admitted into evidence. See Joe Carroll Orchestras, 254 NLRB 1158, 1162 (1981); Federated American Insurance Co., 219 NLRB 200, 203 (1975); Printing Industries of Northern California, 204 NLRB 329 (1973).

[7] I credit O'Toole's testimony and note that Mitchell, Mann's superior officer, was not called to testify by the Respondent.

[8] Mann, in testifying, regularly referred to the clerks, tellers, and receptionists as classification 1 employees, and the counselors, bookkeepers, and secretaries as classification 2 employees, although they were not so designated in the contract. The term "in-charge" was apparently an old expression that had been used at one time by Western Electric employees, and had been absorbed into the language of the credit union employees.

$97,925,305.55. To service these members, the Respondent opened up four branch offices in the same period.[9]

Respondent's tremendous growth was nationally recognized in the credit union industry. A news release of the Credit Union National Association, Inc. located in Madison, Wisconsin, reported that "The CUNA report found the fastest growth among the large credit unions was experienced by St. Louis Telephone Employees Credit Union, St. Louis, Missouri which vaulted from 328th largest in 1980 to 58th in 1981." (R. Exh. 9.)

During this period of unprecedented growth Mann was making virtually all management and supervisory decisions, as well as performing many ministerial functions. He determined which employees should receive upgrades, assigned tellers, scheduled vacations, oversaw the filing of Federal reports and, along with Maureen Reese and John Beal, responded to branch office burglar alarms in the middle of the night. Throughout this period Mitchell, Mann, and Reese were the only employees not covered by the collective-bargaining agreement.

In October and November, Mann spoke with Mitchell and the administration committee about the necessity of reorganizing the operation of Respondent because of its growth and state financial regulations. Finally, in November 1981 the board of directors was convinced that a reorganization was necessary.

In the last week of November, Mann conducted a regularly scheduled staff meeting at the main office, which was attended by 40 to 50 employers. At this meeting Mann announced that the Credit Union was to open up "managerial" positions, that these positions would be posted on the bulletin board, that the employees should be thinking about it, and if any one was interested to contact him. This was the first notice that the employees received which informed them that there was to be a company reorganization. Prior to this meeting, Mann had not notified any representative of Local 13 of these planned changes.

Mann's statement that the new positions would be posted on the bulletin board was never carried out. Article IX of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement provided for posting as follows:

> Section 1—Promotions and transfer shall be on the basis of seniority, qualifications, ability and fitness to do the job. Job vacancies within the bargaining unit shall be posted by the company for a three (3) day period. The company may fill the position temporarily until bidding is complete.

In the first week of December 1981, Mann began to personally conduct interviews with the employees he had selected to fill the new positions. Margaret Stoff, who had been a bookkeeper for 3 years, was called in by Mann and informed she was to be promoted to the position of supervisor of accounting. Her duties would be the paying of bills, balancing the journal, preparing financial statements, and evaluating the employees in her department. She was further told that Mary Lowery was to be in charge of the tellers in the accounting department and that she would evaluate Lowery. The manager showed her a diagram setting forth the people to be promoted and the new positions they would occupy, telling her that she would be under Ukena. The manager also told her she would no longer be in the Union, and that she would be on probation for 9 months. Also, if she wished to return to her old job she could do so. Stoff asked if the jobs were to be posted on the bulletin board, and the manager advised that this would not be done as they were not union jobs, and therefore the Company had no need to post them.

Mann forthrightly testified that when he interviewed employees for promotions, "I explained to them that if they took the position of [Management] they would no longer be represented by the Union, that they would no longer be part of the Union." He did not recall telling anyone not to pay union dues, and there was no testimony that he did so.[10] Margaret Stoff, when asked if she knew of anyone who was required to cancel their dues-checkoff agreement, replied, "No. Mr. Mann just said that you would no longer pay your union dues. You didn't have to."

On Tuesday, December 15, 1981, the administrative committee recommended to the board of directors the salary structure for "the new management group." On the following night, all employees considered by Mann for promotions attended a meeting at a restaurant in St. Louis County which was conducted by Mitchell and Mann. Mann congratulated all present on their promotions and Mitchell introduced each person, stating his or her new title and duties. When he asked for questions, employee Vivian Harster asked if these people would be in the Union any longer, and Mitchell said no, because it was too hard for supervisors to evaluate fairly another union member, and therefore Respondent felt it would be better if supervisors were no longer in the Union.

On December 28, 1981, the board of directors formally adopted the reorganizational plan and approved the new salary schedule to be used "for the newly appointed management people." According to Mann, these new rates were approximately 50 cents an hour more than their union rates.

On December 30, 1981, a two-page written notice was placed on each employee's desk by Respondent. This letter began as follows: "I am very pleased to announce a new organizational structure and the promotions of various staff people into the management positions." The letter then went on to list the names of 22 employees, and to state briefly their new duties. The letter also stated that all of the people named in the letter were now part of the new management structure, and would henceforth "be working for the credit union outside of the Union Contract." (G.C. Exh. 8.)

[9] One in Hazelwood, Missouri, in October 1980; in Baldwin, Missouri in March 1981; in St. Louis in July 1981; and Fairview Heights, Illinois in August 1981. This increase in branches continued in 1982 as two more branches were opened up in April. As of the date of this hearing, the branch office in Hazelwood handled more volume and business transactions than the entire organization when Mann commenced employment in September 1979, and had in this branch almost as many employees as had been employed by all of the offices at the time Mann was hired.

[10] Art. VI of the parties' contract provided that Respondent would check off union dues from the wages of all union members, and remit this money to the Union on a monthly basis.

At no time prior to the December 30, 1981 notice to the staff of the new organizational structure had Mann or Mitchell discussed their plans with Local 13, or any of its officers or stewards. However, when Chief Steward Jo Ann Wattler received her copy of the December 30 memorandum, she called Business Representative O'Toole, informed him of the contents of the letter, and asked him if the Company could make those changes, and if the Union could do anything about it. Wattler was not an experienced steward, as she had only held that office since the previous October, and had not filed or processed any grievances. O'Toole advised her that he would set up a meeting with the Employer.

E. The Events of 1982

1. The January 5 letter

By a letter dated January 5, Dale Hoepfinger, the newly appointed assistant manager in charge of personnel, wrote to O'Toole, notifying him that "the credit union has established a new managerial team." (G.C. Exh. 9.) In the letter Hoepfinger advised that all the people who were to staff the team had been taken from the ranks of the Credit Union employees, and he then set forth 21 names. He also wrote that these people would no longer be covered by the union contract "and will therefore need withdrawal cards if possible."

O'Toole received Hoepfinger's letter on January 6, and this was the first time that he had been advised by Respondent that Respondent was making these organizational changes. He then started an investigation as to why these employees were being taken out of the bargaining unit, telephoning Respondent. According to O'Toole, he talked to either Mann or Hoepfinger, and scheduled a meeting for January 8. This meeting was subsequently canceled because of O'Toole's sickness, and another meeting was scheduled.

O'Toole testified that he and Steward Wattler met with Mann at the main office of the Credit Union on the afternoon of January 15. Wattler testified that she thought the meeting was around January 15. At the meeting they discussed the contents of the Company's January 5 letter, and O'Toole asserted that some of the employees named therein were still doing the same work that they had done prior to January 1. Mann advised him that these people would be doing strictly managerial work, and that other people would be hired to do the work that the new managers had formerly performed, but that he needed more time to hire additional employees. When O'Toole then asked Mann if he would waive the time period for filing grievances, if any such grievances should arise out of this situation, Mann replied yes to his request.

Wattler corroborated O'Toole's testimony that he asked Mann if he was willing to waive time limits for filing a grievance. Wattler was a hesitant, unsure witness, and impressed me as an advocate who was testifying for a cause, and not stating the facts as she remembered them, and I do not credit her testimony.

Mann admitted that a meeting had been scheduled for January 15, but denied that such a meeting was held. Mann fixed the date of his first meeting in 1982 with O'Toole as February 10.

O'Toole was a very busy union official who participated in many meetings with many employers, and he had difficulty in remembering dates throughout his testimony and never produced any written notes or records of meetings. Both Steward Wattler and Stoff testified that at a meeting of the parties on June 8 O'Toole advised Respondent that he had written records that would show that a meeting was held on January 15 and would furnish them to the company officials. The record does not show that he ever did so, nor did he produce any such records at the hearing. I credit Mann's testimony that there was no meeting on January 15, as he was an impressive, candid witness. He had previously checked his files, and found no record of such a meeting. It was Mann's policy to make notes of every meeting he attended.

2. The February 10 meeting

All parties agree that there was a meeting on February 10. O'Toole, Wattler, and Local 13's president Pat Douglas met at the main office with Mann and Hoepfinger. At this meeting the parties discussed essentially the same matters that O'Toole had testified were discussed on January 15. O'Toole testified that he brought up that managers were still doing bargaining unit work. Mann replied that he needed more time to hire more people. O'Toole also questioned the amount of time that employees would have to decide to return to their former job. The business representative also testified that he proposed that if a grievance needed to be filed in the future, Respondent waive "all time limits," and that Mann agreed to this. Finally, O'Toole asked Mann if the Company would consider opening and renegotiating the whole contract, so as to settle this problem of managers and assistant managers. Mann replied that he did not have authority to do that. O'Toole's desire to reopen the whole contract was based on a request of the union membership expressed at a union meeting in late January.

Mann testified that the meeting did concern the Union's claim that the Company had taken people from the bargaining unit, and that it was also O'Toole's position that the contract was too ambiguous. He also admitted that the Union wanted to open the contract and renegotiate it in its entirety. Mann acknowledged that he told O'Toole that he did not have the authority to reopen the contract, as only the board of directors has such power. Mann also denied that he agreed to any waiver of time periods for the filing of a grievance, and further maintained that it was not discussed.

I credit Mann's testimony that he did not agree to waive time periods for the filing of a grievance concerning the promotion of the employees. It is to be noted that O'Toole did not argue with Mann that he had previously agreed at a prior meeting that he would waive time periods. It is inherently probable that had Mann so agreed on January 15, and if several weeks later Mann reversed himself, O'Toole would have vigorously reminded him of his prior agreement, and would have demanded to know why Mann had changed his position.

O'Toole testified that prior to the meeting the relationship between the Credit Union and the Charging Party was congenial and informal. Whenever there had been a problem, he and Mann would sit down and "hash out" the problem. There had been very few formal grievances and no arbitration cases in the history of their relationship. The business representative also testified that he thought that Mann had the authority to waive time periods for filing grievances, but admitted that he had never been told by the Board of Directors that Mann had such power. O'Toole at no time requested Mann to put in writing an agreement to waive the time period.

3. The events of March

Sometime in March, the Union formulated its position as to the exclusion from the Union of the employees who had been promoted. On March 19, pursuant to instructions from O'Toole, Steward Wattler filed a written grievance with Assistant Manager Reese. The grievance, as drafted by O'Toole, read as follows:

> Nature of grievance Management positions taken out of the union indiscriminately. Donna Krems, Karen Aronoff, Pat Voss, Jackie Hamra, Norm Gericke, Sharon Wright, Terry Cartright, Bill Rogers, Pam Reed, Jo Ward, Dennis Manning, Cheryl Hood, Karen Schmidt, Dennis Cook, Claire Louis.

The remedy requested was that these employees be "Placed back in the Union." As to the caption "Clause of Contract Violated," no clause was stated, but typed thereafter was "Protection of the Contract." Reese denied the grievance stating that it was untimely, but advised Wattler that she would be willing to discuss it informally.

A meeting was then arranged by Wattler with Mann to discuss the grievance, and the two met on March 23. Wattler testified that she asked Mann why Reese had put on the grievance, that it was untimely, when at two different meetings she had attended with O'Toole and Mann it was agreed that the time limits would be waived. According to Wattler, Mann replied that Reese had not been at those meetings and was not aware that the time limits had been waived. During the balance of the meeting, Mann questioned Wattler as to Local 13's position regarding the jobs of the employees listed in the grievance.

According to Mann, he had Wattler state the reasons for the Union's objections for each employee promoted to management positions, which he wrote down. Mann did not recall if at any time Wattler said anything with respect to any prior waiver of time limits for filing a grievance. Mann prepared minutes of this meeting, which were signed by both Mann and Wattler. (G.C. Exh. 11.) The minutes did not contain any mention that Wattler had asked Mann why Reese had answered that the grievance was untimely, or any mention that it had been agreed at two previous meetings that time limits for filing grievances on the January changes would be waived. The minutes did state in the first paragraph "Disposition of this grievance from Maureen was that the grievance was filed outside of the time limit but she would be willing to discuss the grievance informally with the shop steward." Although Wattler was given a copy of these minutes, she did not ask Mann to make any changes.

4. The April 15 meeting

On April 15, O'Toole and Wattler met with Mitchell and Mann at the main office of Respondent, and discussed the employees who had been promoted on January 1. O'Toole testified that he asked Mitchell if he would open up the contract and renegotiate all matters contained in it, and Mitchell refused to do so. O'Toole then brought up the grievance filed on the promotions, and Mitchell stated that it was untimely. O'Toole then asked Mitchell if he knew that Mann had waived the time limits contained in the grievance procedure. According to O'Toole, Mitchell said he was not aware that Mann had waived the time limits, and that he had asked Mann if he had done so, and Mann replied that he did not remember. O'Toole then submitted a list of 12 people that he thought should be back in the Union, because they were doing bargaining unit work, and Mitchell promised to send him a list of the job description for those 12 employees.

Mann testified, after refreshing his recollection by means of notes he dictated immediately following this meeting (R. Exh. 18), that he told O'Toole that he had not and did not have the authority to waive any time limits and would not do so. As previously stated, Mitchell did not testify at any time during the hearing.

5. The June 8 meeting

On June 8 the parties had their last meeting to discuss the promotions made on January 1. By this time 20 to 30 new employees had been hired. Local 13 was represented by O'Toole, Wattler, and Margaret Stoff, a newly elected steward.[11] The Credit Union was represented by Mitchell and Hoepfinger. O'Toole again told Mitchell that the Union wanted to bargain over the positions that had been "pulled" out of the Union. When Mitchell replied that there was no reason to bargain because it involved management positions, O'Toole advised him that he would go the Labor Board. O'Toole also requested that the dispute be submitted to arbitration, but Mitchell refused, saying the request was untimely.

Steward Stoff also testified that O'Toole told Mitchell that the Union should have been notified before these promotions took place, and Mitchell replied that they were not union positions and therefore the Company did not have to contact the Union.[12]

F. Contentions of the Parties

The General Counsel's basic contention is that the parties in July 1980 agreed to the inclusion of all employees, except managers, in the bargaining unit regardless of their supervisory status, and that at midterm of the collective-bargaining agreement, in January 1982, when Respondent removed approximately 21 employees from the unit without prior notice to or bargaining with the Union Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The General Counsel relies chiefly on the authority of Arizona Electric Power Cooperative, 250 NLRB 1132 (1980).

[11] Wattler and Stoff were sisters.

[12] The testimony of the three union witnesses as to this meeting was uncontradicted and is credited.

Respondent, on the other hand, contends that Arizona Electric Power is not applicable to the facts of this case, and relies heavily on Chemical Workers Local 1 v. Pittsburgh Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157 (1971).

G. Analysis and Conclusions

I do find that this case falls within the four corners of Arizona Electric Power and that when Respondent unilaterally removed the 21 employees from the bargaining unit in January 1982, it violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. In Carolina Telephone Co., 258 NLRB 1387, 1388 (1981), the Board affirmed and summarized its holding in Arizona Electric Power as follows:

> In Arizona Electric Power Cooperative, Inc., 250 NLRB 1132, 1133 (1980), we held that unilateral attack on the integrity of an agreed-upon bargaining unit would be disruptive of an established bargaining relationship, and that therefore the scope of a unit may be changed only by mutual agreement of the parties or by Board action. Consequently, we found that a respondent's unilateral action in withdrawing recognition from a union as representative of certain employees during midterm of a contract, the bargaining unit of which the parties had knowingly and voluntarily negotiated, violated the Act. We noted that our conclusion would not be altered by a finding that the employees affected by the respondent's action were supervisors or managerial employees. Id. at 1133–34.

There is no question but that Respondent had knowingly and voluntarily negotiated with Local 13 for a unit of "all employees working as office employees" and had solely excluded "Managers." It is true that this bargained-for unit was different from the certified bargaining unit. However, it is well settled that an employer and a union, by agreement, may alter the certified unit so long as one party does not insist on a change in the composition of the unit to the point of impasse. Newport News Shipbuilding, 236 NLRB 1637 (1978). There is of course, no claim by Respondent that the altered unit was in any way related to an impasse.

Thus, at the midterm of the collective-bargaining agreement, when on January 1 the Company, without prior notice or bargaining with the Union, removed approximately 21 employees from the agreed-upon bargaining unit and admittedly placed them in its "new managerial team,"[13] it unilaterally changed the job classification, wages,[14] benefits, and other terms and conditions of the employment of these same 21 employees.

Respondent states in its brief that none of the persons promoted into the "supervisory/managerial positions as a result of the December 30, 1981 reorganization were until that time supervisors." The Employer then goes on to argue that unless the General Counsel proves that these employees elevated into supervisory/managerial positions, they remained, in fact, only employees, as defined in the Act, and the law requires a dismissal. I do not find this to be the applicable law. Both Arizona Electric and Carolina Telephone hold that it does not matter if the employees removed from the unit were statutory employees, supervisors, or managerial.[15]

Both the General Counsel and Respondent cited Dura-Vent Corp., 257 NLRB 430 (1981), in support of their cases. However, I find that it clearly supports the General Counsel's position. In Dura-Vent 12 working foremen were unilaterally transferred by the company out of the bargaining unit to the position of supervisors. Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson, who was affirmed by the Board, found that these transfers involved a significant amount of unit work. While Judge Anderson expressly did not find that the newly transferred employees became supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, he did find that it made no difference:

> Were the employees in the supervisory position[s] not statutory supervisors, however, a violation would still occur and the remedy would be no less. This is so because when employees are unilaterally removed from the bargaining unit—whether they remain employees or are transmuted into statutory supervisors—the Union is denied its opportunity to bargain over changes having a significant impact on the unit it represents.

There can be no doubt but that there was a significant impact on the unit represented by Local 13, when the Company removed some 21 employees therefrom. At that time the Company had 60 employees, which meant that one-third of the employees that the Union had represented were suddenly and without notice removed from its protective mantle. While Manager Mann did assure O'Toole that the Company intended to hire more employees in the future to take the place of the displaced unit employees, this does not cure the sudden severance of 33-1/3 percent of the employees from the unit represented by the Union. See Kendall College, 228 NLRB 1083 (1977), wherein the Board found that the employer's reduction of the bargaining unit by 25 percent had a substantial effect on that unit.

For the above reasons, I find that Respondent's unilateral action in withdrawing recognition from the Charging Party as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the approximately 21 employees violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Mann's letter of December 30, 1981, to the staff (G.C. Exh. 8) clearly advised all employees that the employees being promoted into management positions, effective January 1, would "be working for the credit union outside of the union contract." The record is undisputed that commencing with that date, these employees did work outside of their contract, as Respondent no longer applied the terms of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement to these employees promoted to the management team.

Paragraph 6,C of the complaint alleges that since January 1 Respondent has required these same 21 employees to withdraw from the Union, has canceled the contract's dues-checkoff provision, and has refused to withhold from the employees' wages and remit this dues money to the Union. Respondent contends that there was no violation because there were no threats or coercion to cause an employee to cease paying dues. While this is true as to threats, it is wide of the mark. The fact is that Respondent did unilaterally cease carrying out its contractual duty to deduct the dues from the employees' wages and to remit these monthly dues to the Union. This was clearly an interference with the employees' rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1). Wilson & Sons, 193 NLRB 350 (1971); Cavalier Spring Co., 193 NLRB 829 (1971). Since this failure to check off and remit dues was done unilaterally, in midterm of the contract, it also violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 (1980); Independent Stave Co., 248 NLRB 219 (1980).

Paragraph 6,D of the complaint alleges that since on or about January 1, 1982, and continuing to date, Respondent refused to bargain with the Union, upon its request. Respondent contends in its brief that the Union never asked to bargain about the "make-up rates, benefits, etc." of these supervisory managerial positions, and that the Union presented no legitimate demands to bargain until August when the Union filed a grievance on the issue of management employees doing bargaining unit work.[16]

It is true that the Union did not seek to bargain over the specific questions of makeup rates, benefits, and such for the promoted employees. However, it was not necessary for the General Counsel to prove such specific matters in order to support a refusal to bargain charge. Manager Mann admitted that the meeting of February 10 concerned Local 13's claim that the Company had taken employees from the bargaining unit and that the Union wanted to reopen the contract and renegotiate it in its entirety because it was too ambiguous. While the record does not show what parts of the contract O'Toole considered to be too ambiguous, it is a reasonable inference that he was talking about the wording of the parties unique union recognition clause, that excluded only "managers" from the bargaining unit.

At the meeting of the parties on April 15 they again discussed the employees who had been promoted on January 1, and O'Toole's repeated request that the Company agree to open the contract and renegotiate it in its entirety was once again rejected. Finally, at the June 8 meeting, O'Toole did tell Respondent in so many words that the Union wanted to bargain about the employees who had been taken from the bargaining unit and placed in the supervisory staff.

When O'Toole on February 10, April 15, and June 8 asked the Respondent to bargain over the entire collective-bargaining agreement, he was following the long-standing and the well-recognized bargaining technique of asking for a lot more than a union really expects to get. He wanted to bargain over the Union Recognition clause, and thereby force the Company to bargain over the employees it had unilaterally promoted out of the bargaining unit on January 1. Thus, I find that Respondent from February 10 on did refuse to bargain with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, as it refused to bargain about anything.

Paragraph 6,E of the complaint alleges that on or about March 23, and continuing to date, Respondent has refused to bargain with the Union, by reneging on its agreement with the Charging Party to waive all time periods for filing grievances regarding the changes it had made in the job classifications, wages, benefits, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees promoted on January 1 to the management staff.

As testified to by O'Toole, the grievance was due to be filed by January 9.[17] To meet this deadline he had scheduled a meeting with Mann for January 8, which meeting had to be postponed because of his illness. Thus the deadline recognized by O'Toole had passed. However, this apparently did not seem a problem to the business manager, because of the past informal and congenial relationship of the parties. Undoubtedly, O'Toole expected that he would be able to sit down with Mann and informally work out the grievance just as he had done in the past. However, Respondent did not follow this pattern.

Since I have previously credited Mann's testimony that he did not agree to waive the time periods for filing grievances regarding the change in the status of the employees, listed in Hoepfinger's letter of January 5, it follows that Respondent did not unlawfully refuse to bargain on March 23, April 15, and June 8, when it refused to process the grievance filed by steward Wattler on March 19. I shall therefore recommend dismissal of this allegation of the complaint.

Conclusions of Law

1. St. Louis Telephone Employees Credit Union is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Office and Professional Employees International Union, Local 13, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All employees working as office employees and excluding managers is the unit for which the aforesaid Union is the exclusive bargaining representative.

[16] On August 19, Local 13 filed a formal grievance, which stated as the nature of the grievance "Supervisors doing bargaining unit work." R. Exh. 5.

[17] Art. XXVIII of the parties collective-bargaining agreement provided that a written grievance must be filed within 3 working days from the date that the employee has knowledge of the grievance. The Union received notice of the grievance on January 6, when O'Toole received Hoepfinger's letter of January 5.

4. By removing approximately 21 employees from the bargaining unit about January 1, 1982, without prior notice to the Union and without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain, Respondent refused to bargain with the aforesaid Union as the representatiave of employees in the bargaining unit for which the Union is the exclusive bargaining representative, and thereby has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. By refusing to honor and apply the terms of this collective-bargaining agreement with the Union since January 1, 1982, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By rendering the dues-checkoff provision contained in the collective-bargaining agreement ineffective, and failing and refusing to withhold from said employees' wages, and failing to remit to the Union the dues money required thereunder, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. By failing and refusing to bargain with the Union, on request, since about February 10, 1982, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

9. Respondent has committed no other unfair labor practices.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent, in violation of its duty under Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, withdrew recognition from and refused to bargain with the Union as the representative of employees, including those who were promoted about January 1, 1982, in the unit for which the Union is the exclusive bargaining representative, I shall order it to bargain collectively with the Union and to restore these employees to the unit, conditioned on the affirmative desire of these employees as expressed through their bargaining agent.

The record indicates that these employees received a pay raise when promoted out of the unit, and the General Council in her brief does not ask for any backpay. Also, it is not Board policy to request employees to relinquish increases in wages and benefits. Dura-Vent Corp., supra. Since it is not now possible to determine if the unilateral changes have been detrimental or beneficial, I shall issue a restoration order conditional upon the affirmative desires of the affected employees as expressed through their bargaining agent. Kendall College, 228 NLRB 1083 (1977); Herman Sausage Co., 122 NLRB 168 (1958).

If the Union elects such a restoration of benefits, a general order is issued below requiring Respondent to make the promoted employees whole for any loss of wages, benefits, or other rights and privileges they may have suffered as a result of Respondent's unfair labor practices. Backpay, if any, shall be computed with interest, as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[18]

The General Counsel in her brief, did request that the Union be made whole for dues not remitted to it by Respondent. Since I have found that such dues were not remitted, and that such failure to comply with the contract violated the Act, I will order Respondent to reimburse the Union for its losses due to Respondent's failure to so check off, and remit dues of the said employees, as required by the collective-bargaining agreement. El Centro Health Center, 266 NLRB 1 (1983); *J. DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 1 December 1982 Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached decision. The Charging Party Union filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 1.

"1. By reprimanding and threatening its employees with discipline for filing grievances or engaging in other union and protected concerted activities, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Commercial Cartage Company, Fenton, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The judge indicated in his Conclusions of Law that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by issuing disciplinary warnings to employees for engaging in union and other protected concerted activities. As the judge indicated earlier in his decision, however, this conduct violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. We shall amend the judge's Conclusions of Law accordingly.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard in St. Louis, Missouri, on September 13, 14, and 15, 1982, based on unfair labor practice charges filed by Automotive, Petroleum and Allied Industries Employees Union, Local 618, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 618 or the Union),[1] and complaints issued by the Regional Director for Region 14 of the National Labor Relations Board.[2] The complaints were consolidated for hearing. The complaints allege that Commercial Cartage Company (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by issuing disciplinary notices to and discharging Samuel A. Williams because Williams had filed an unfair labor practice charge against Respondent and had engaged in other union and protected concerted activities and violated 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally failing and refusing to implement scheduled wage increases. Respondent's timely filed answers deny the commission of any unfair labor practices and assert that the 8(a)(5) allegations should be deferred to arbitration.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to examine and to cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. The General Counsel and Respondent have filed briefs which have been carefully considered.

On the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS AND THE UNION'S LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Respondent is a Missouri corporation engaged at Fenton, Missouri, in the interstate transportation of liquid freight, including petroleum and chemical products, by tank truck. Jurisdiction is not in dispute. The complaints allege, and Respondent admits, that during the calendar year ending December 31, 1981, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the interstate transportation of freight and, during that same period, performed services valued in excess of $50,000 for enterprises which meet the Board's retail, direct inflow or direct outflow jurisdictional standards. I find and conclude that Respondent is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] The charge in Case 14–CA–15790 was filed on March 9, 1982, and the charge in Case 14–CA–15895 was filed on April 23, 1982.

[2] The complaint in Case 14–CA–15790 issued on July 14, 1982. The complaint in Case 14–CA–15895 issued on June 3, 1982, and was amended on July 15, 1982.

The complaints allege, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that the Union is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background—The Collective-Bargaining Relationship

For more than 10 years, Local 618 has represented Respondent's employees.[3] Respondent is a member of the Labor Relations Advisory Association (LRAA), and is party to the Central States Area Tank Truck Agreement (CSATTA), between that association and the Central Conference of Teamsters, of which Local 618 is an affiliate.

The CSATTA which was in effect at the time of the events herein had a term of November 15, 1979, through November 14, 1982. That agreement was supplemented and amended by the Teamsters Local 618 Missouri Rider to the CSATTA, effective for the same term. As discussed in more detail infra, that rider was itself supplemented and amended by a further addendum, the Commercial Cartage Co. Local Petroleum Addendum, effective from November 15, 1980, through November 14, 1982.

B. Case 14-CA-15895—The Alleged Refusal to Bargain

1. Factual discussion

The wage rates for the employees represented by Local 618 were set forth in the Missouri Rider. However, in May 1981[4] Respondent and the Union negotiated a separate addendum for the purpose of providing economic relief to Respondent. Pursuant to that agreement, signed on May 5 by Lawrence Lewis, Respondent's vice president of administration, and on May 19 by Peter J. Cavatoe, the Union's assistant business representative, Respondent was obligated to increase its employees' wages by 43 cents per hour on November 15.

In the course of negotiations for the May relief agreement, Stanley Lewis, Respondent's president, told Cavatoe that he did not want to be in a position where subsequent relief granted to other carriers, different from that granted to Respondent, placed Respondent at a competitive disadvantage. Accordingly, the following language was proposed by the Employer and included as part of the relief addendum:

> IV. It is understood and agreed that any additional relief from the current Central States Area Tank Truck Agreement accepted by the Union membership will also affect this addendum.

Immediately on receipt of the relief addendum, Cavatoe responded, by letter dated May 20, addressed to Stanley Lewis, in an attempt to clarify his understanding of the above-quoted article IV. His letter stated:

> In regard to the re-negotiation of your company addendum at Commercial Cartage Co., your front letter sent to me attached to the addendum, Section IV, should be clarified. Any changes in the entire Central States Area Tank Truck Agreement that can be effective or less than our settlement, must be presented to your employees and our members, and voted on for approval in accordance with recognized Central Conference procedures.

Respondent received Cavatoe's clarifying letter and did not respond.

The May relief addendum had been presented to the Union's membership prior to its approval. At that meeting, Stanley Lewis addressed the members and urged their approval. According to employee Howard Guerber, Lewis promised the employees that if this relief proposal were accepted, Respondent would seek no further relief for the duration of the contract. Stanley Lewis denied giving the employees any such assurances. He testified that the drivers were told that Respondent would expect that relief granted to other employers would be granted to them. On balance, I am persuaded to credit Stanley Lewis. It would, I believe, have been highly improbable that Stanley Lewis would have assured the employees that no further relief would be expected when Respondent was simultaneously seeking language which would give it the opportunity, if not the right, to have additional relief granted if such relief were granted to Respondent's competitors. I note, additionally, the absence of any testimony corroborating that of Guerber notwithstanding that Cavatoe, Samuel Williams, who was the Union's steward, and other employees, some or all of whom were presumably in attendance at that meeting, testified on behalf of the General Counsel.

On September 14, the LRAA requested that the Central States Conference of Teamsters Tank Truck negotiating committee renegotiate the CSATTA because of the adverse efforts of industrywide deregulation, competition from nonunion and non-CSATTA carriers, and the general downturn in the economy. The request was predicated on article 33 of the CSATTA, which provides for reopening in the event of various circumstances, including "change in economic or competitive circumstances of the unionized tank truck industry on a local, state or area level, which has a significantly adverse effect on the financial structure of the tank truck industry."[5] On Sep-

[3] The applicable collective-bargaining agreement describes the bargaining unit thusly:

> Section 1.1—Operations Covered
>
> The execution of this Tank Truck Agreement on the part of the Employer shall cover all over-the-road and local tank truck operations of the Employer, within, into, and out of the Area and Territory contiguous thereto.
>
> Section 1.2-Employees Covered
> (a) The employees covered by this Agreement shall include any and all the employees of the Employer employed directly by and/or under the supervison and control of the Employer within the jurisdiction of the Union and who are represented by the Local Union or during the life of this Agreement may come to be represented by the Local Union.

[5] That article further provides: "Upon the failure of the parties to agree in such negotiations . . . either party shall be permitted all lawful economic recourse to support its request for revisions."

tember 28, George Vitale, chairman of the Central Conference of Teamsters Tank Truck negotiating committee, responded, rejecting the request for reopener negotiations but promising to discuss the proposed reopening at the November meeting of the Joint Area committee. Vitale further stated that local unions were not authorized, at that time, to conduct separate negotiations with individuals or groups of employers and that the employers covered by the CSATTA would be expected to pay the November 15 wage increases, as scheduled. On November 5, the Central States Tank Truck Joint Area committee met. The minutes of that meeting indicate that carriers would be permitted to seek relief on a state or local basis, subject to the approval of the Joint Area committee. Carriers would be expected to pay scheduled wage increases, it was noted, where local unions or state conferences rejected requested relief. Thereafter, at least two carriers, signators to the CSATTA, were granted some form of economic relief by Local 618.[6]

On November 14, Richard Norsen, Respondent's vice president of operations, addressed a letter to Cavatoe. In that letter, Norsen noted that the LRAA had reopened the contract on September 14. His letter stated:

> The Commercial Cartage Co. addendum dictates that any changes in the Central States Area Tank Truck Agreement could be applicable to our agreement if accepted by the Union membership.
> Inasmuch as pending negotiations with the Central Conference of Teamsters could result in additional relief from the current Central States Area Tank Truck Agreement which might be applicable to the Commercial Cartage Co. Addendum, Commercial Cartage Co. is suspending all wage increases until such time as the L.R.A.A. concludes negotiations with the Central Conference of Teamsters.

Respondent posted a copy of this letter on the employee bulletin board.

At some point shortly after the November 14 letter to the Union, Norsen verbally repeated to Cavatoe Respondent's desire for additional relief and, it appears, asked to meet with Cavatoe for negotiations toward such relief. Cavatoe informed Norsen that he had been voted out of office, effective January 1, 1982, and told Norsen that he was not in a position to negotiate for his successors. Cavatoe suggested that negotiations with those who would replace him would be more appropriate. Norsen repeated Respondent's position that it was not going to put the scheduled wage increase into effect and was told by Cavatoe that Respondent should honor their agreement.[7] Respondent did not put the scheduled wage increase into effect.

On February 17, 1982, Norsen met with the Union's new officers, including Robert Miller, its secretary-treasurer/business representative, at a grievance meeting. In the course of that meeting, Miller asked about the November 14 wage increase, stating his understanding that it had not been paid. Norsen referred to Respondent's November 14 letter, with which Miller was unfamiliar and acknowledged that Respondent had not put the increase into effect. Norsen asked Miller to negotiate additional relief on the basis of the relief which had been granted other employers. Miller requested Norsen to send him some specific proposals.[8]

Miller discussed Respondent's oral request for relief with the Union's stewards and, not having received any proposals from Respondent, wrote Stanley Lewis on March 5. In that letter, Respondent was advised that the Union did not desire to engage in negotiations to modify the current agreement prior to its expiration date. Respondent was requested to begin paying the scheduled wages and to pay the backpay due under the November 14 increase.

On March 9, 1982, Norsen replied. He disagreed with the Union's refusal to negotiate for modifications and referred to the LRAA reopening of the CSATTA on September 14, to the relief granted to Illinois employers by the Illinois Conference of Teamsters (which allegedly consisted of waiving November 15, 1981 scheduled wage and cost-of-living increases), and to relief granted to two employers in the St. Louis area. Respondent asserted that it "desperately needs additional relief in order to remain competitive and to survive in these most trying times." A reference was made to a proposal prepared by Respondent (but apparently no copy was attached). The letter closed with the following:

> We urgently request a meeting with Local 618 and our employees to present this proposal for your members' approval.
> Please advise the most convenient time and place we can meet.

Miller responded on March 11, 1982. He pointed out that the relief granted to the Illinois employers and that granted to at least one of the St. Louis employers only placed their wage scales at approximately what Respondent would be paying if it had put the November 15, 1981 increases into effect. Respondent's request for additional relief was rejected and the Union, once again, requested that Respondent comply with its agreement.

On March 12, Respondent sent the Union its proposals.[9] In those proposals, Respondent sought to eliminate certain workweek, seniority, overtime, uniform, and job classification provisions. In regard to wages, it sought to eliminate the November 15 wage increase and to maintain the then existing hourly wage rate and weekly guarantee.

Miller replied on March 16. Once again, Respondent's request for negotiations and a meeting with the employees was rejected. Miller pointed out that the major oil companies were paying considerably more than Respondent and that further relief given to Respondent would adversely affect its members employed by those employees. Compliance with the contract was demanded.

[7] Norsen's testimony is not materially different.

[8] At one point, Norsen testified that he believed that Miller had stated that he would take Respondent's proposal to the employees. He was, however, not sure that Miller had made any such commitment and postulated that he may only have drawn such an inference from Miller's agreement to look at Respondent's proposal. Norsen's pretrial affidavit states only that Miller told Norsen to put something down in writing which the Union would look at. It further indicates that Miller did not agree to negotiate or offer to set up a meeting.

[9] Respondent's letter was erroneously dated March 9, 1982.

On April 24, 1982, Clifford Pyatt, the Union's steward, filed a grievance over Respondent's failure to pay the scheduled wage increase and the backpay since November 14. The record does not reflect what disposition was made of Pyatt's grievance.

On April 29, 1982, Respondent posted a memorandum to its Fenton drivers in regard to contract relief. The memorandum, to which were attached copies of the correspondence between the parties and the relief addendum signed by other local employers, reiterated Respondent's efforts to secure contract relief and refuted the Union's reference to wages paid by the major oil companies to their drivers. The letter urged the employees to review the circumstances and solicited their assistance by requesting their union representative to meet with the Employer.

It was stipulated that Respondent had requested that the relief issue be submitted for review and a vote by the employees and that the Union had declined to permit a vote on that issue. At hearing, Respondent stated that it was willing to arbitrate the question of whether it was obligated to pay the wage increase in the absence of such a vote and to abide by the decision of an impartial arbitrator. The CSATTA provides for the final resolution of all controversies by reference to Joint State or Joint Area Committees, composed of equal numbers of labor and management representatives. The decisions of these committees are final and binding on all parties.

2. Analysis of the refusal-to-bargain issue—applicability of Collyer

Respondent contends that the refusal-to-bargain allegations of the General Counsel's consolidated complaint must be dismissed pursuant to the Board's decision in Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971), as modified by General American Transportation Corp., 228 NLRB 808 (1977), and Roy Robinson Chevrolet, 228 NLRB 828 (1977), inasmuch as this is a dispute "arising over the application or interpretation of an existing collective-bargaining agreement" which should be decided by the method agreed upon by the parties, i.e., arbitration. Collyer, supra at 840; LMRA, Section 203(d).[10] The General Counsel argues that Respondent's conduct, about which there is little dispute, amounts to a clear midterm modification of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, undertaken without securing agreement from the Union, and thus establishes a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act. The General Counsel asserts that the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, including the various addenda, does not lend itself to an interpretation which could arguably authorize Respondent's actions.

[10] Respondent essentially concedes that if its conduct is not supported by the contractual language, it has violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

In Collyer (supra at 839), the Board, Members Fanning and Jenkins dissenting, held that where a "dispute in its entirety arises from the contract between the parties, and from the parties' relationship under the contract, it ought to be resolved in the manner which that contract prescribes." Under such circumstances, the Board found, dismissal of the complaint, with appropriate retention of limited jurisdiction, is the appropriate disposition. Adherence to Collyer, at least as to cases alleging violations of Section 8(a)(5), was reaffirmed by the Board majority in Roy Robinson Chevrolet, Members Fanning and Jenkins dissenting.[11]

In Collyer the Board, citing back to its earlier decision in Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., 175 NLRB 141 (1969), set forth four criteria for the application of Collyer deferral: (1) that the parties have a long-established and successful bargaining relationship; (2) that "no claim is made of enmity by Respondent to employees' exercise of protected rights"; (3) that Respondent demonstrate its willingness to submit the dispute to resolution under a final and binding grievance-arbitration procedure applicable to that dispute; and (4) the issue arise out of the confines of the collective-bargaining relationship. The General Counsel here raises no contention that the first three criteria have not been met. Indeed, the facts establish that there has been a long and presumably successful collective-bargaining relationship between Respondent and the Union, Respondent's conduct here, while unlawful if not authorized by the contract, does not appear to be motivated by an intention to disparage employee exercise of statutory rights, and Respondent has indicated its willingness to submit this dispute to the contractual grievance-arbitration machinery.[12]

Clearly, deferral is not warranted where contract language is clear and unambiguous and permits no construction which could legitimize the action taken. Struthers Wells Corp., 245 NLRB 1170 fn. 4 (1979). The initial question, therefore, is whether, as Respondent contends, this is a dispute which presents questions concerning the interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement or whether, as the General Counsel contends, no fair reading of the relevant contract language would authorize Respondent's actions.

The warrant for its actions, Respondent argues, is found in the interplay of CSATTA article 33, which provides that either party may reopen negotiations when a "change in economic or competitive circumstances [11] See also Maine Yankee Atomic Power Co., 258 NLRB 832 (1981), where the Board reversed an administrative law judge's Collyer deferral involving the unilateral creation of a new job outside the unit and the transfer of unit work to that new position on the basis that the issue of deferral to arbitration had been neither pleaded nor raised; the Board noted that the employer had not requested deferral of the basic issue. See also Standard Oil Co. (Ohio), 254 NLRB 32 (1981), where the Board, Member Fanning dissenting, determined that an 8(a)(5) issue involving an employer's unilateral implementation of a voluntary program of physical examinations was appropriate for Collyer deferral.

[12] The contractual grievance procedures, providing for resolution of all controversies by Joint State and Joint Area Committees made up of equal numbers of delegates from labor and management, satisfy the Board's standards for deferral. See United Parcel Service, 232 NLRB 1114 (1977), and cases cited at fn. 4. See also Campbell Sixty Six Express, 202 NLRB 1126 (1972).

. . . has a significantly adverse effect on the financial structure of the tank truck industry" and article IV of Respondent's relief addendum, which provides that "any additional relief from the current Central States Area Tank Truck Agreement accepted by the Union membership will also affect this addendum." Respondent contends "that these articles obligate Local 618 to submit a wage relief proposal to its members for a vote prior to Respondent's obligation to pay such increases." Respondent relied on these contractual provisions and the fact that relief was being sought by the LRAA and had been granted to at least two of its competitors when it notified the Union that it was withholding the November 15 wage increase pending bargaining for additional relief.

I cannot conclude, as the General Counsel would have me do, that the contractual language presented is so clear and unambiguous that Respondent's interpretation must be rejected out of hand. In particular, the words "accepted by the Union membership" might be interpreted as Respondent urges, particularly when considered in conjunction with the language of Cavatoe's May 20 letter. That letter, purporting to clarify article IV, appears to lend credence to Respondent's interpretation when it states that any changes in the CSATTA "that can be effective or less than our settlement must be presented to your employees and our members, and voted on for approval." (Emphasis added.) One can argue that Cavatoe's letter can be construed as the Union's acknowledgment of its obligation to present Respondent's proposals for relief to its members for a vote. One can also argue that it merely prohibits Respondent from implementing changes unless and until approved by that membership. Which argument is the more persuasive is a fit question for an arbitral panel. Accordingly, I must conclude that Respondent's conduct raises a question of contract interpretation suitable for resolution by the parties' agreed-to method of dispute resolution.

However, the General Counsel further argues that Respondent's conduct, withholding a scheduled wage increase, i.e., its "failure to implement the wage provisions amounts to a repudiation of the contract and strikes at the very heart of the collective-bargaining relationship." From this, the General Counsel argues that it would be inappropriate to defer the dispute to the grievance-arbitration machinery, citing Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 207 NLRB 1063 (1973). Oak Cliff-Golman, I believe, is distinguishable from the instant case. In Oak Cliff-Golman, the employer had unilaterally modified the contract, reducing wages and salaries, as an alternative to closing its business when faced with dire economic circumstances. At hearing, the employer asserted a defense based upon Collyer. The Board, in a panel consisting of Chairman Miller and Members Fanning and Jenkins, rejected the deferral defense. The latter two Board Members held that they would not defer under any circumstances because they did not subscribe to the policy enunciated in Collyer. Chairman Miller reasoned that deferral was inappropriate because there was "no claim, and indeed no room for any finding, that the contract's terms even arguably authorized the action taken by Respondent." Thus, he noted, the case did not turn on any underlying dispute over the meaning of a contract's terms.[13] The employer in Oak Cliff-Golman further contended that its action was at most a breach of contract which should be remedied "by other processes and ultimately by the courts." It was in response to this contention, not the Collyer defense, that the Board stated "that a clear repudiation of the contract wage provision is not just a mere breach of the contract, but amounts, as a practical matter, to the striking of a death blow to the contract as a whole, and is thus, in reality, a basic repudiation of the bargaining relationship." In such circumstances, the Board held, it was authorized and obligated "to protect the statutory process of collective bargaining against conduct so centrally disruptive to one of its principal functions—the establishment and maintenance of a viable agreement on wages."

Even assuming that the language of Oak Cliff-Golman, quoted above, is applicable to questions of Collyer deferral, I cannot find, in the circumstances of this case, that Respondent's refusal to implement the scheduled wage increase amounts to a "death blow to the contract" or "a basic repudiation of the bargaining relationship." Here, Respondent continued to apply all other terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, notified the Union of its intended action, and sought bargaining with the Union. There is not the slightest indication that Respondent would not have complied with the results of any negotiations or a vote of the membership had one been conducted. Respondent, I must conclude, was not repudiating its contract; rather, it was complying with (or taking advantage of) what it believed were its rights to seek economic relief during the term of the agreement.[14]

Accordingly, I shall recommend that the 8(a)(5) portion of this consolidated complaint be dismissed with the Board retaining limited jurisdiction, as hereinafter described.

C. Alleged Discrimination

1. Factual discussion

Samuel A. Williams commenced his employment with Respondent in 1967. Throughout his tenure he was a transport truck driver and a member of the Union. For approximately 11 years prior to his discharge on December 9, 1981,[15] he was the Union's steward. As steward, Williams filed an average of two or three grievances per month. During 1979, he had also filed two unfair labor practice charges alleging that Respondent was discriminating against him because of his union or other protected concerted activities.[16] Williams received several reprimands between 1973 and 1975, but had a clean disciplinary record for approximately 5 years prior to May 1981.

[13] See Roy Robinson Chevrolet, supra at 830.

[14] The General Counsel notes in brief that Respondent made no proposal for relief until March 1982, by which time it was already 3 months delinquent in paying the scheduled wage increase. This is, I believe, irrelevant as Respondent was, at all times, relying on both the efforts of the LRAA to secure relief on an associationwide basis and on the relief subsequently granted to other employers in Respondent's geographical area. Moreover, I note that as the relief Respondent sought included rescission of the scheduled wage increase, payment of that wage increase when the contract called for it would have essentially negated the relief Respondent sought. Recovery of those moneys from the employees after payment would have been impractical, if not impossible.

On March 19, Williams (as an individual) filed an unfair labor practice charge, Case 14–CA–14829, alleging that Respondent, by refusing to pay a wage increase due on November 15, 1980, by threatening employees with the closure of its Fenton terminal, and by soliciting employees to operate as independent contractors, had discriminated against its employees, and had engaged in other conduct in an attempt to discourage membership in the Union.[17] Williams served this charge on Respondent, and it was seen by both Stanley and Lawrence Lewis, at the beginning of a March 19 meeting held for the purpose of negotiating Respondent's relief addendum. According to Williams' uncontradicted testimony, Stanley Lewis, on receiving a copy of the charge, asked Business Representative Cavatoe what it was all about. Cavatoe stated that Williams had merely exercised his right to file a charge with the NLRB. That meeting continued following Williams' service of the charge and broke up several hours later when Williams questioned the veracity of Stanley and Lawrence Lewis and accused the company of presenting forged documents to justify its economic position.[18]

On March 20, Williams returned to the Fenton terminal, clocking out at 4:13 p.m. He was told that Lawrence Lewis wanted to see him and was directed to wait. He waited approximately 15 to 20 minutes and was then brought in to Lawrence Lewis' office. There, according to Williams' testimony, Lewis referred back to a conversation held a week earlier, wherein a reference had been made to how much various people were worth at Commercial Cartage, picked up a copy of Williams' unfair labor practice charge, threw it across the desk and told Williams "this is the limit . . . you're done at Commercial Cartage . . . from now on you'd best watch yourself around here." Lewis' tone of voice, according to Williams, was not "quite normal"; Lewis was allegedly yelling "to a certain extent." Lewis unequivocally disputes and denies Williams' version of this conversation. He testified, in a version which I deemed to be the more accurate for the reasons set forth below, that he made no reference to the charge filed and served on March 19. He also denied yelling at Williams or throwing a copy of the charge across the desk. According to Lewis, his conversation referred not to that charge but rather to Williams' accusations of the previous evening concerning alleged forgeries of company documents and to his attacks on the character and veracity of Stanley and Lawrence Lewis. Lewis told Williams that such behavior was not appropriate and not conducive to substantive negotiations, that negotiations could not proceed without an atmosphere of trust and confidence, and that claims of forgery did not lend themselves to a successful conclusion of the negotiations.[19]

On May 23, Williams erred in the quantities of different grades of gasoline to be delivered to a customer. He reported his error to the dispatcher and another driver was dispatched to provide the customer with the correct quantity of product ordered for the holiday (Memorial Day) weekend. On May 28, Williams received a written reprimand, signed by Norsen. This was the first discipline given Williams since the alleged threat in March. He filed no grievance or unfair labor practice charge in regard to it, notwithstanding that he testified to considering this discipline the start of Lawrence Lewis' efforts to effectuate the alleged threat, because he admitted respon-

[16] Williams referred to these as "discrimination charges" and, it appears, drew a distinction between such charges and his subsequent charge, which he knew to be an "unfair labor practice charge." Contrary to Respondent's contention, I find no basis to discredit Williams arising from the fact that he denied filing "unfair labor practice charges" prior to March 1981. His error was one of terminology, not credibility.

[17] The record does not reflect the disposition of Case 14–CA–14829. I note that in the relief addendum ultimately agreed to, Respondent agreed to pay all back wages due from November 15, 1980.

[18] Lawrence Lewis' version of the course of this meeting was not disputed or contradicted by either Williams, who testified in the General Counsel's case in chief and on rebuttal, or by Cavatoe. I credit that version notwithstanding that a letter from Respondent's former attorney, setting forth Respondent's position on this case during the investigative stage, apparently misstated that the meeting had broken up in part because of the service of that charge. That statement, as well as a statement that Lawrence Lewis subsequently spoke to Williams because Williams' charge filing had put "a fly in the ointment," appear to be in error. Respondent terminated its relationship with the attorney who drafted that letter.

[19] Williams' credibility in regard to this conversation is weakened, rather than strengthened, by the attempt to support his version through the testimony of Clifford Pyatt. Pyatt, called as a corroborating witness by the General Counsel, testified that after he "came in from work about 5 in the afternoon," he walked back to Lewis' office to report a problem with his truck. There, at "around 5:00 or just a few minutes after," he allegedly heard Lewis state, in a voice both loud and mad, something to the effect that Williams was "through" or that Lewis would get Williams "one way or another." Pyatt subsequently testified that he had returned to the terminal at about 4:45 p.m. and had spent 10 or 15 minutes completing his paperwork before he went to Lewis' office. The clerical employees who worked outside Lewis' office, he testified, were gone for the day when he walked by their work stations, the conversation which he allegedly overheard must have occurred, he said, between about 5 and 5:03 p.m. and he left the building within about 3 minutes after allegedly hearing this threat. However, documentary evidence, including Pyatt's delivery tickets and his timecard, establish that it would have been virtually impossible for him to have been present when the conversation between Lewis and Williams occurred. Thus, while the testimony of Lewis credibly indicates that the conversation occurred shortly after 4:30, which testimony is essentially corroborated by Williams' timecard and the order of events which Williams described, Pyatt's delivery tickets establish that he was approximately 45 miles and 1 hour's driving time away from the terminal at 4:10 p.m. He did not clock out that evening until 5:28 p.m. Moreover, the secretarial area outside Lewis' office would not have been devoid of employees at the hour Pyatt allegedly walked through it because, according to Lewis' uncontradicted testimony, those clericals worked on flextime and some would have been there beyond the 5 o'clock hour. I note, too, that Williams testified that he believed he had walked past various secretaries on his way to Lewis' office. I additionally note that Williams' affidavit, given on March 27, makes no mention of Lewis yelling at him or raising his voice and describes their conversation as "short, sweet, and to the point." Moreover, Williams claimed that he learned that Pyatt had overheard this conversation within a week or 10 days after it allegedly occurred. Notwithstanding that he had filed a charge and given affidavits in support thereof, he claimed that he did not deem the existence of such corroborating evidence to be sufficiently important or relevant to warrant reporting it to the Board. Similarly, I note inconsistencies between Pyatt's testimony and his pretrial affidavit. Considering all of the foregoing, and my observations of the witnesses and their demeanor, I must conclude that Lawrence Lewis' denials of the conversation as attributed to him by Williams and Pyatt are more credible than the versions of that conversation presented by Williams and Pyatt.

sibility for the mistake charged against him.[20] Lawrence Lewis played no role in the events of May and Norsen denied that Williams' union or other protected activities motivated him in issuing this reprimand.

In August, Williams and a number of other employees signed a petition addressed to the Fenton police department wherein they complained that Respondent was unlawfully deducting money from their paychecks. When the police refused to act on the basis of a petition, Williams signed a formal complaint, charging larceny in excess of $150, making these same allegations on behalf of himself and his fellow employees. The police contacted Respondent and informed Norsen of the role that Williams had played in filing the complaint. On August 15, Norsen wrote Williams, charging that he had made unfounded accusations which were "an act of dishonesty" in violation of both that portion of the CSATTA which defined his authority as a job steward and the contract's discharge and suspension provisions. Williams was suspended and warned that if his complaint against Respondent was not resolved by August 21, he would be discharged. Other involved employees were warned that their support of the complaint could subject them to discharge; they were advised to notify Norsen, by August 19, of their intentions with respect to that complaint.

On August 20, Williams withdrew his complaint. On August 24, Norsen notified Williams, by letter, that his charges were "incorrect and, as such, an act of dishonesty" which could have resulted in discharge. However Respondent waived the discharge option and left his suspension, from August 16 through August 20, to serve as disciplinary time off. The letter stated that it was a "final warning that any further violations of the Contract or Company Rules will result in your discharge." The employees who had signed the petition but not the complaint were issued reprimands and warnings that further violations of the contract or rules would "result in severe disciplinary action up to and including discharge."

Williams filed a grievance concerning his suspension but no timely unfair labor practice charge. He also filed a grievance restating his allegations concerning Respondent's unauthorized deduction of time and money from his wages.

Norsen had come to Respondent and become its vice president of operations in late April. He was, according to testimony, a stickler for the enforcement of company rules. On May 15, he had issued a memorandum to the drivers directing them to complete driver operational reports "on all operational and sales incidents" including "spills or mixtures (cargo loss), personal injury," and "trip-related incidents." On May 20, he issued a memorandum informing the drivers of new forms for requesting paid or unpaid time off.

About September 10, Williams' grievance over his August suspension was discussed but not resolved at the first step of the grievance procedure. At that time, according to Williams, Cavatoe informed Norsen and Lawrence Lewis that the grievance would be added to the agenda for the next meeting of the Joint State committee, to be held on September 17. Williams testified that he told Lewis and Norsen that he would be in attendance to present his grievance. Norsen testified that verbal notice given at that time would have been satisfactory notwithstanding that written notice of time off for union business was required under article IV of the CSATTA. However, he denied hearing Williams say that he would be attending the next step of the grievance procedure.[21] It is conceivable that Williams made the statement, as he claimed, and that neither Norsen nor Lewis heard it. Whether they heard it or not, I find it difficult to believe that they would not have expected Williams to absent himself from work to attend a grievance meeting wherein his own grievance would be discussed and possibly resolved.

When Williams reported for work on September 16, he informed the dispatcher that he would be absent the following day. The dispatcher said he would write it on the dispatch sheet and Williams observed him making some notations thereon. Williams then took out his first load for the day and, while making that delivery, was sprayed with gasoline. According to Williams, no more than one-half gallon escaped from the hose and all of it fell on him, soaking his trousers. None of the spillage hit the ground. Williams reported the incident to the dispatcher, stating that he would complete the load, return the truck to the terminal, and go home to shower and change.

On Williams' return to the yard, he found two messages and forms in his mailbox. The first requested him to sign a leave-of-absence form for the following day. Williams refused; he wrote on the form, "This is not leave of absence—this is union business." The second requested that he fill out a driver operational report "for spill, cargo loss for coverage of possible complaint from term. or customer." Again, Williams refused, writing his own note which stated, "There was not spill only what went on me. One half to one gallon. Sam."

On September 22, Williams received his third reprimand since March 1981. That reprimand, a letter signed by Norsen, referred to his refusal to complete both forms and to his poor attendance for the week. It alluded to the cost of health and welfare benefits incurred by Respondent and stated:

> We cannot tolerate poor attendance or failure to fill out required requests for time off or explanation of why you cannot complete a days' work. We pay an enormous amount of fringe benefits on each employeee and must have complete attendance and job performance if we hope to remain in business.
> This letter is a warning that you must make arrangements in advance if you intend to be off work for any reason and that you will fill out required reports as requested or disciplinary action will follow.

[20] While Williams did not consider his mistake serious or costly, Norsen testified that the Company's efforts to rectify this mistake cost it 8 hours' holiday pay.

[21] Although Cavatoe testified on behalf of the General Counsel, he was not questioned and did not testify concerning Williams' alleged verbal notice. Lewis, however, corroborated Norsen's testimony.

Williams testified that company policy, as he understood it, did not require the completion of a spill report unless 5 or more gallons of gasoline were spilled. Pyatt, attempting to corroborate Williams, testified that no spill report was required unless 5 or more gallons were spilled. Spills of 3 to 5 gallons, he said, were merely noted on the delivery slip which was signed by the station managers or attendants. He, too, had had an incident where 1 or 2 gallons of gasoline spilled on his person, but that occurred approximately 2 years earlier. The only report Pyatt made of that incident, other than verbally informing the dispatcher, was to make a notation on the delivery ticket. Norsen testified that he made no exceptions in the requirement for completion of driver operational reports based on the size of a spill. He knew of no other incidents where a spill had occurred where a driver was requested to complete a report and did not do so. Respondent's exhibits, driver operational reports submitted both before and after Williams' September 22 reprimand, establish that drivers did submit reports of spills. The smallest spill reported, however, was 5 or 6 gallons.

Williams also testified that his attendance record was good and no evidence was offered to refute that testimony.

On September 22, Williams received a letter from Respondent which reviewed the claims of improper payment alleged in his grievance. In that letter, Norsen asserted that no instance of pay shortage could be found, that Williams' claim was unfounded, that the review which Respondent undertook had been time consuming and expensive, and that most of his problems were due to improper or incomplete logging of off-duty time and rest or lunch stops. That letter concluded with a reminder that pay requests must be completed in accordance with company policy and with a warning stating that "all lunch and rest stops must be logged accordingly. . . . Failure to properly complete your log or trip reports could subject you to disciplinary action." A copy of that letter was placed in his personnel file and that fact was noted in the letter.

Since at least some time prior to November 1979, Federal and state laws have required that vapor recovery systems be used when deliveries of gasoline are made to retail outlets. Such systems prevent the escape of gasoline fumes into the atmosphere. Respondent has endeavored to comply with these legal strictures. As early as November 30, 1979, Lawrence Lewis issued a memorandum to all of Respondent's drivers wherein he referred to deliveries being made without effecting the vapor recovery connections and stated, inter alia, "this disregard for the Federal and State laws, as well as Company policy must cease immediately. We intend to comply with the law as much as possible." Lewis also referred in the letter to the possibility of lost business resulting from driver failure to use vapor recovery. Williams described his understanding of Respondent's policy regarding the use of vapor recovery: Its use was required, he said, "at all times if and when possible." Other employees described it in even stronger terms. Thus, Howard Guerber testified that the policy was "to always use vapor recovery unless . . . it's impossible and then you call in." John Kronmueller testified that its use was mandatory and Clifford Pyatt similarly testified that impossibility was the only justification for failure to effect the vapor recovery hookup, that this was strict company policy, that violation of this policy would subject any employee to discharge and that Norsen was "a stickler for the rules." Each of the employees, however, testified that there were instances when vapor recovery hookup could not be made and that, in such circumstances, they were expected to call the dispatcher and secure authorization before making a delivery without using vapor recovery. Each also testified that at various sites where vapor recovery was impossible, they had ceased calling after repeatedly requesting and being granted such authorization.

Respondent also had a policy which required that drivers not leave the hoses unattended while gasoline is being delivered into the underground tanks. Gasoline, it was pointed out, is an extremely hazardous product, both toxic and highly explosive.

On the morning of December 9, Williams was dispatched on two loads, the second being to a Skelly station across from the airport where he had been making deliveries several times each month for a number of years. After completing his first delivery, he picked up the second load and drove to that station. According to his testimony, when a driver would pull into that station to make a delivery into the 10,000 gallon regular gasoline tank in the manner directed by the station manager, vapor recovery hookup was impossible because the rear wheels of the trailer would be immediately over the connection to the vapor recovery system. Williams testified that he had never used the vapor recovery system on that tank and had initially called the dispatcher on each occasion to inform him of that impossibility prior to making his delivery. After months of securing authorization to make the delivery without vapor recovery, Williams stopped calling. He had not been making such calls for the last 6 months.[22]

[22] Williams' testimony is corroborated by that of Kronmueller and both corroborated and contradicted, to some extent, by the testimony of Guerber and Pyatt. Thus, Guerber initially testified that the vapor recovery on that tank could be used when only one type of gasoline was being delivered. He said it could not be used on most occasions when two types of gasoline were being delivered because the driver could not get his truck and trailer into the station correctly, that cars would block the access. On cross-examination, Guerber admitted that it was possible to use the vapor recovery system on that tank but that its use required additional work including the moving of the truck. However, he further testified that the system on that tank had been changed since December 1981 and that prior to that date that tank did not have a working vapor recovery system. This latter testimony is not corroborated by any other witnesses, was not mentioned in an earlier affidavit given by Guerber, and is not credible. Pyatt testified that if a driver pulled into the airport Skelly station the way its management wanted him to, the trailer would be on top of the vapor recovery system, its wheels would prevent access to the connections, and, if there was enough room to reach them, the hoses were not long enough to make the connection. His testimony about the length of the hoses was credibly disputed by Respondent. He further testified, in what was clearly an exaggeration, that the plate over the connection was a half-inch thick sheet of steel 4 feet square which could not easily be lifted. All three drivers corroborated Williams' testimony that they had ceased calling the dispatcher for permission to make deliveries at that station without effecting vapor recovery some 6 months or so earlier.

According to Williams, he pulled into the station on December 9 in the way he normally did, and began unloading into the 10,000 gallon regular gasoline tank without attempting to hook up the vapor recovery system. At some point during his delivery, he allegedly shut off the flow of gasoline and went into the station to speak with a Skelly official about changing the type of hookup being used from a 2-point connection to a single-point system. That official, Charles Rand, agreed with Williams, according to Williams' testimony, and promised that he would speak to the Company's engineering department about changing the system. As Williams was then completing the delivery into this tank, Lawrence Lewis drove up, stepped out of his car with a camera,[23] and asked him why he was not using the vapor recovery. Williams explained the situation to Lewis, showed him why the vapor recovery system could not be used, and told him that he had pulled into the station in the manner requested by the customer. Lewis took some pictures, went inside the station, and spoke with Rand while Williams completed that delivery, moved the truck to the next set of tanks, hooked up the vapor recovery system, and completed his delivery. When Lewis came out of the station, he told Williams that Williams was being suspended and would be driven back to the terminal in Lewis' car. After a brief wait at the terminal, Williams was called into Norsen's office. Norsen asked him whether he had failed to use the vapor recovery system and whether he had left the trailer unattended while gasoline was being delivered. Williams explained the impossibility of using the vapor recovery system from the position the equipment was in and his reason for so positioning the truck.[24] He denied admitting that he had made a mistake warranting his discharge, as contended by Norsen and Lewis, discussed infra. Norsen told Williams that inasmuch as he "was on a final warning from the Fenton police incident . . . they had no alternative but to discharge" him.

As Lawrence Lewis described the incidents of December 9, he had been driving to a business appointment and passed the airport Skelly station. On doing so he noticed one of the Company's trucks with the product hose connected from the truck to the tank but no driver in attendance. From that vantage point he could not observe whether gasoline was actually being delivered. When he drove around the back of the station he saw gasoline fumes emanating from vents at the rear of the station which established that gasoline was being delivered and that the delivery was being made without vapor recovery. As he pulled around the front of the station he observed Williams coming out of the station, going to his truck. He watched Williams complete his delivery and move the hose to the next tank, again without making a vapor recovery hookup. Lewis then approached Williams and asked whether he was going to hook up the vapor recovery system. Williams protested that he could not reach it but, when Lewis asked him to try, was able to make the connection. Lewis asked Williams why the connection had not been used on the first tank and Williams told him that it was not possible, that he had discussed the problem with the customer's representative, had suggested that they utilize a different kind of hookup, and said the customer's representative had agreed with him.

After speaking with the customer's representative, Lewis called the terminal and told Norsen what he had observed. Norsen told him to suspend Williams and bring him back to the terminal. After watching Williams complete his delivery, and proving to Williams that the plate over the vapor recovery system could easily be removed, Lewis took some photographs and then drove Williams back to the terminal. At the terminal, according to both Norsen and Lewis, Williams was asked why he had not used the vapor recovery system. Williams, admitting that he had not used it and had made a mistake in not doing so, claimed that the position of the rear wheels on the trailer prevented access to the vapor recovery system. Norsen then asked why he had allowed product to be delivered without attending the hoses. To this, Williams responded that he could see the hoses from inside the station but admitted that he had made a mistake. Norsen then told Williams that Respondent could not condone his violations of company policy, that what he had done were dischargeable offenses and that he would be suspended pending probable discharge. Williams left the meeting saying something to the effect that Respondent would never get away with discharging him.

On December 9, Respondent, in a letter signed by Norsen, discharged Williams. That letter described the events of December 9 and charged him with both unloading without use of the vapor recovery system and leaving his unit while product was being discharged. It went on to state as follows:

> Your actions are in violation of the Uniform Rules and Regulations Governing Employees of Tank Truck Carriers Signatory to the Central States Area Tank Truck Agreement, Sections 3(g) "Flagrant disobeying of orders. First offense—reprimand," and 3(j) "Leaving equipment unattended when loading or unloading. First offense—reprimand." You were issued a final warning on August 24, 1981 that any further violations of the contract or Company Rules would result in your discharge.
> In view of the final warning and the nature of your conduct and attitude during what should have been a routine delivery, we feel we have no alternative except to discharge you for continued violations of the contract and Company rules.

Notwithstanding the language of the discharge letter, Norsen testified that Williams would have been discharged for his December 9 conduct whether or not he had received the August 24 final warning. The reference to that warning, according to Norsen, was only to satisfy the procedural requirements of the contractual grievance

[23] Credible testimony established that all company officials carry cameras for the purpose of photographing accidents, competitors who fail to make appropriate vapor recovery hookups, and other incidents.

[24] Williams acknowledged, under questioning by me, that it would have been possible to pull his truck in in a different way so as to effect vapor recovery but stated that to do so would have blocked a portion of the front of the station. It was this obstruction to which the customer objected.

procedure. The grievance committees request employers to furnish prior disciplinary records at the grievance proceedings, he said.

Williams filed a grievance over his discharge and that grievance was heard at several levels, culminating in a hearing before the Joint Area committee in Hollywood, Florida, on February 9, 1982. At that hearing, Stanley Lewis, speaking for Respondent, stated in the course of his summation that Williams had disagreed with him in regard to economic relief for the employer in the March negotiations and "that since that time period [Williams] had tried to become a knight in shining armor and take up all the troubles of the rest of the drivers."[25]

Several employees, including Kronmueller, provided affidavits to Williams for his use in regard to his grievance, which affidavits purported to show that the vapor recovery system could not be used at the airport Skelly station. Kronmueller's statement was brought out at the Two and Two (Joint State Committee) hearing and, on the following day, according to Kronmueller, Norsen approached him, looked at him with what Kronmueller described as "the evil eye" and told him "I'll get you for that." Norsen admitted knowledge of Kronmueller's affidavit in support of Williams, admitted making notations as to which employee had given such affidavits, and admitted speaking to Kronmueller about it. He claimed that he only told Kronmueller that Respondent was going to see to it that the people who had signed affidavits indicating that they could not make the vapor recovery hookup at the airport Skelly station were assigned to make deliveries to that station so that Respondent could establish that their statements were untrue.[26] On January 14, pursuant to Norsen's directions, Kronmueller was assigned to make a delivery to the airport Skelly station and to call Norsen as he was leaving for that site so that Norsen could meet him there. When Kronmueller called in, he asked Norsen why Norsen was coming out to the station. Norsen told him that it was to take his picture and prove that his affidavit supporting Williams was a lie. Norsen did meet Kronmueller at that station and took his picture using the vapor recovery system "in every way imaginable" including on the 10,000 gallon regular gasoline tank. Considering that Norsen did what, according to his testimony, he stated he would do when he spoke to Kronmueller, and also considering both their demeanors and inconsistencies between Kronmueller's testimony and his affidavit, I must credit the testimony of Norsen over that of John Kronmueller.

2. Analysis and conclusions

The General Counsel contends that Respondent bore animus against Williams because of the unfair labor practice charges he had filed in March 1981, and other union or protected activity he had engaged in, and "engaged in a systematic effort to build a case against Williams in order to eventually justify its intention to discharge him." Both the September 22 disciplinary warnings and the December 9 discharge are alleged as violative of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.[27] Each of the actions taken against Williams by Respondent, according to the General Counsel, was in fulfillment of the threat allegedly uttered by Lawrence Lewis on March 20. The discharge incident resulted, according to the General Counsel, from an elaborate multistage scheme whereby Williams would be dispatched to a station at which Respondent knew that the drivers "could not and did not" use the vapor recovery system, in such a way that Respondent would know when he was there, with Lewis positioned and camera equipped so as to catch him in the alleged transgression. Respondent denies that there was any scheme to discipline and ultimately discharge Williams and asserts that the conduct in which Williams engaged on December 9, in and of itself, warranted and brought about that discharge.

The alleged March 20 threat by Lewis to Williams is the linchpin in the General Counsel's theory, holding a wheel consisting of four disciplinary actions to an axle of unlawful motivation. The General Counsel's failure to establish the threat by a preponderance of credible evidence has withdrawn that linchpin. I cannot find, in its absence, that the discipline which followed Williams' filing of Case 14–CA–14829 on March 19 was part of any systematic effort to build a case against him or was otherwise motivated by animus toward Williams' charge-filing activity. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the General Counsel's complaint, insofar as it alleges a violation of Section 8(a)(4) of the Act, be dismissed.[28]

The failure of the General Counsel to credibly establish the March threat, or to convince me that its "systematic scheme" theory is valid, does not preclude a finding of merit as to some of the complaint's allegations. It is clear on the face of the August reprimand and suspension letters that Williams, by filing the complaint with the Fenton police, had engaged in an activity both concerted and protected.[29] Similarly, it is plain, from the [25] Stanley Lewis acknowledged that, in response to an inquiry about the grievances filed by Williams, he had referred to Williams as considering himself "a knight in shining armor."

[26] The General Counsel offered this evidence solely to establish Respondent's animus toward employee exercise of protected rights; the intention to allege this as a separate violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) was expresly disclaimed.

[27] Inasmuch as the charge in Case 14–CA–15790 was not filed until March 9, 1982, Sec. 10(b) of the Act precludes any unfair labor practice finding in regard to the alleged March 20 threat, the May reprimand, or the August reprimand and suspension.

[28] With respect to the reprimand which Williams received in May, I can find no evidence which would warrant a conclusion that Williams was disciplined at that time in reprisal for his charge-filing activities, even assuming that Sec. 10(b) of the Act would permit such a conclusion. See Machinists Local 1424 (Bryan Mfg.) v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411 (1960), and Greenville Cotton Oil Co., 92 NLRB 1033 (1950), enfd. sub nom. Grain Millers v. NLRB, 197 F.2d 451 (5th Cir. 1952), discussed infra. Williams admitted making the mistake for which he was reprimanded and Respondent's action in reprimanding him may as rationally be explained by the presence of Norsen, a stickler for rigid adherence to company rules and newly arrived on the Commercial Cartage scene, as by any implication of animus. Moreover, it must be noted that Williams had filed previous charges without any hint of employer animus toward such activity and that Lawrence Lewis, the alleged perpetrator of the threat, was not involved in the May discipline. Rejection of the General Counsel's contentions that the May discipline was unlawfully motivated and evidenced animus further negates the General Counsel's contention of a long-range scheme to eliminate Williams from the scene.

face of the disciplinary letters issued to Williams and his fellow employees, that Respondent strenuously objected to this exercise of their statutory rights. This animus, although displayed by Respondent in actions taken outside 10(b)'s limitation period, may be considered to explain and "shed light on the true character" of Respondent's actions within that statutory period which may constitute, in and of themselves, unfair labor practices. As the Supreme Court more fully stated in Bryan, supra, 362 U.S. at 416–417:

> It is doubtless true that § 10(b) does not prevent all use of evidence relating to events transpiring more than six months before the filing and service of an unfair labor practice charge. However, in applying rules of evidence as to the admissibility of past events, due regard for the purposes of § 10(b) requires that two different kinds of situations be distinguished. The first is one where occurrences within the six-month limitations period in and of themselves may constitute, as a substantive matter, unfair labor practices. There, earlier events may be utilized to shed light on the true character of matters occurring within the limitations period; and for that purpose 10(b) ordinarily does not bar such evidentiary use of anterior events. The second situation is that where conduct occurring within the limitations period can be charged to be an unfair labor practice only through reliance on an earlier unfair labor practice. There the use of the earlier unfair labor practice is not merely "evidentiary," since it does not simply lay bare a putative current unfair labor practice. Rather, it serves to cloak with illegality that which was otherwise lawful. And where a complaint based upon that earlier event is timebarred, to permit the event itself to be so used in effect results in reviving a legally defunct unfair labor practice.

The two disciplinary letters issued to Williams on September 22 fall within the ambit of the first situation described by the Court in Bryan. They may, and I find that in part they do, constitute unfair labor practices in and of themselves on which Respondent's pre-10(b) conduct sheds light, helping to establish Respondent's animus, an element necessary to a finding of violation. Such animus is similarly shown by the remarks of Stanley Lewis at Williams' February 1982 grievance hearing wherein Stanley Lewis, in seeking to persuade the grievance panel to sustain Williams' discharge, derogatorily referred to Williams as a "knight in shining armor" taking up the causes of other employees.[30]

More strongly evidencing the discriminatory nature of the reprimand issued to Williams for his refusal to complete a leave-of-absence request and the warning issued to him for alleged absenteeism and improper logging of off-duty time is the obvious pretextual nature of those reprimands. Neither the collective-bargaining agreement nor the rules as announced by Norsen required that a union officer take a leave of absence to attend to union business and Respondent knew or should have known that his September 17 absence was for official union business. Indeed, the simple fact is that Williams was reprimanded for taking time off, to attend to union business, itself a protected activity. Additionally, Respondent included totally unwarranted references to absenteeism in the warning.

Similarly, the second September 22 warning appears to have been motivated by animus directed toward Williams' filing of the grievance to which the September 22 letter purported to respond. That very response sought to discourage similar recourse to the grievance procedure by emphasizing Respondent's displeasure at having to investigate claims of improper wage payments and warned that further discipline might result if such grievances brought to light what Respondent deemed to be the grievant's errors rather than Respondent's.

Accordingly, I must conclude that by reprimanding Williams for his refusal to submit a leave-of-absence request for his union business related absence on September 17, and its threat of discipline for filing a grievance concerning his wage payments, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[31]

Notwithstanding that I have found that Respondent bore animus toward those who would exercise their statutory rights, and particularly toward Williams, I am constrained by both the facts and the law from finding a violation in Williams' discharge. Williams was caught at the Skelly station in flagrante delicto, in violation of two well-established and significant rules. I cannot subscribe to the theory, propounded by the General Counsel, that this event was the result of an elaborate scheme wherein Respondent set up Williams for discharge, for the following reasons: (1) I have discredited the evidence of the threat which allegedly set the ground work for such a plot; (2) the evidence does not establish that Williams' as-complained to the police that the employer was issuing checks which were not being honored and filed a criminal complaint against the signer of the checks, his employer's president. For that he was discharged. The Board found that the employee's conduct therein constituted protected concerted activity. The merits of Williams' complaint, moreover, are irrelevant to this conclusion so long as his complaint was not made in bad faith. Wagner-Smith Co., 262 NLRB 130 (1982); OMC Stern Drive, 253 NLRB 486 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 676 F.2d 698 (7th Cir. 1982); John Sexton & Co., 217 NLRB 80 (1975). There is neither evidence nor implication of bad faith in this record.

[30] Stanley Lewis was certainly not, by these remarks, attempting to persuade the grievance panel of Williams' virtues. I note, further, that to a lesser extent even the credited versions of the March 20 conversation between Lawrence Lewis and Williams and the conversation between Norsen and Kronmueller concerning Kronmueller's affidavit in support of Williams tend to indicate Respondent's displeasure with employee exercise of protected rights.

[31] In reaching this conclusion I have rejected the General Counsel's contention that the September 22 reprimand, to the extent that it related to Williams' refusal to submit a driver operational report concerning the "spill" of gasoline, was also discriminatory. Respondent's policy, requiring the submission of such reports, contained no exceptions based on the amount of the spill and the evidence of any policy negating such a requirement for small spills was too vague, contradictory, or outdated to negate the plain language of the rule. Moreover, unlike the leave of absence and grievance response matters, Williams' refusal to submit a incident report did not involve any protected rights.

signment to two trips in succession was made so that Respondent would know when he would arrive at the airport Skelly station; (3) in view of the fact that the employees had not been calling in to report difficulties with the vapor recovery hookup at the airport Skelly station for 6 or more months, it cannot be established that Respondent would have had reason to believe that Williams would not utilize the vapor recovery system when making that assigned delivery; (4) similarly, in view of the importance Respondent attached to the use of vapor recovery systems, I cannot believe that it would knowingly have permitted the nonuse of vapor recovery for any significant length of time, as would necessarily be implied by the General Counsel's theory; (5) considering all of the evidence, including both the testimony of various witnesses and pictures introduced into evidence, I must conclude that Williams could have made the vapor recovery hookup on the 10,000 gallon regular gasoline tank, albeit with some extra effort, by stationing his truck somewhat differently, either a few feet back or ahead and by using extra hoses; and, (6) I further conclude that the evidence establishes Williams' failure to attend the vehicle while gasoline was being unloaded or, at the least, Respondent's reasonable belief that he had so failed. Williams had thus placed himself in breach of the established rules of conduct and exposed himself to justifiable discipline.

Respondent contends that Williams' December 9 conduct warranted and would have brought about his discharge even absent any prior warnings. This self-serving assertion is contradicted by the very language of the discharge letters. Therein, each of his actions on that day is described as a violation, for which reprimand is the appropriate first offense penalty. The letter goes on to refer to the final warning of August 24 and states that his discharge results from that final warning and from his conduct on December 9.

The letter, not Respondent's testimony, accurately describes the reason for discharge. The set of facts put forth in the letter, I believe, presents the second situation described by the Court in Bryan, infra, wherein the Court referred to "conduct occurring within the limitations, [which] can be charged to be an unfair labor practice only through reliance on an earlier [time-barred] unfair labor practice." To establish that Respondent's reliance on the August 24 final warning renders the discharge unlawful one would have to find that warning, itself, to have been unlawfully issued. This is precisely what Section 10(b), as analyzed by the Court in Bryan, prohibits. See also Greenville Cotton Oil, supra, cited with approval by the Court in Bryan. Therein, strikers who had been permanently replaced demanded reinstatement on the ground that the strike had been caused or prolonged by unfair labor practices committed by the employer prior to the hiring of the strike replacements. However, since the alleged unfair labor practices took place more than 6 months prior to the filing and the service of the charge, the Board held that Section 10(b) barred any reinstatement orders. See also Davis Fire Brick Co., 131 NLRB 393 (1961). Williams' discharge was therefore premised on discipline validly assessed for breach of Respondent's rules and a final disciplinary warning, the validity of which is beyond attack. Under such circumstances, even evidence of Respondent's animus toward those who would engage in statutory protected activities is insufficient to sustain the General Counsel's ultimate burden of proving the discharges discriminatory. It cannot be said, on this record, that Respondent would not have discharged Williams on December 9 whether or not he had engaged in union or other protected concerted activities. See Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). See also Klate Holt Co., 161 NLRB 1606 (1966), wherein the Board noted that the circumstance that the employer may have welcomed the justified opportunity to discharge an unwelcome activist does not make the discharge discriminatory and unlawful.

Accordingly, I shall recommend that the consolidated complaint, to the extent that it alleges that Williams was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, be dismissed.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By reprimanding and threatening its employees with discipline for filing grievances or engaging in other union and protected concerted activities, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affected commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not engaged in any unfair labor practices other than those described above.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[32]

ORDER

The Respondent, Commercial Cartage Co., Fenton, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Reprimanding or otherwise threatening employees with discipline for filing grievances or engaging in other union and protected concerted activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Remove the September 22 warning and reprimand from Samuel A. Williams personnel file.

[32] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Post at its Fenton, Missouri facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[33] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the Board shall retain jurisdiction of this proceeding for the purpose of entertaining an appropriate and timely motion for further consideration of the dismissal of the 8(a)(5) allegations of the consolidated complaint upon a proper showing that either (a) the dispute has not, with reasonable promptness after the issuance of this decision, been either resolved by amiable settlement in the grievance procedure or submitted promptly to arbitration; or (b) the grievance or arbitration procedures have not been fair and regular or has reached a result which is repugnant to the Act.

IT IS ALSO FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the consolidated complaints be dismissed insofar as they allege violations of the Act not specifically found herein.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT reprimand or otherwise threaten with discipline any of our employees who file grievances or engage in other union or protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL remove the September 22 reprimand and warning issued to Samuel A. Williams from his personnel file.

COMMERCIAL CARTAGE COMPANY

International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, and its Local Lodge 1224 of District Lodge 69 and Motor Trucks, Inc. Case 19–CB–4865

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On a charge filed by the Employer 28 July 1983 and amended 16 January 1984 the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 2 September 1983 and an amended complaint 18 January 1984 against the Respondents. The complaint alleges that Respondent Local Lodge 1224 refused to accept five employees' resignations from membership in the Union, and filed intraunion charges, conducted disciplinary proceedings, and imposed court-collectible fines against the employees for conduct that occurred after they had submitted resignations, and that Respondent International Association maintained a provision in its constitution restricting the right to resign. The amended complaint alleges these actions violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. The Respondents filed an answer denying that they committed any unfair labor practices.

On 30 January 1984 the parties jointly petitioned the Board to transfer the instant proceeding to the Board without benefit of a hearing before an administrative law judge. The parties agreed that the formal papers and the parties' stipulation of facts constitute the entire record in this case, and that no oral testimony is necessary or desired by any of the parties. On 23 July 1984 the Associate Executive Secretary, by direction of the Board, issued an Order approving the stipulation and transferring the proceeding to the Board. The General Counsel filed a brief. The Respondents did not file a brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the stipulation, the brief, and the entire record in this proceeding, and makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, a Washington corporation with its office and place of business in Everett, Washington, is engaged in the business of truck sales and repair. During the 12 months preceding issuance of the amended complaint, the Employer, in the course and conduct of its business operations, had gross sales of goods and services valued in excess of $500,000, sold or shipped goods or provided services from its facilities within the State of Washington valued in excess of $50,000 to customers outside the State of Washington or to customers within the State which were themselves engaged in interstate commerce by other than indirect means, and purchased or caused to be transferred and delivered to its facilities within the State goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside the State, or from suppliers within the State which in turn obtained such goods and materials directly from sources outside the State. The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Charging Party is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The parties further stipulated, and we find, that the Respondents are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

About June 1983 Local Lodge 1224 brought internal union charges, conducted disciplinary proceedings, and assessed court-collectible fines against employees Lloyd Winther, Roy Dawnes, Melvin Larsen, Morinus Oosterwyk, and John Venderped for crossing the Local's authorized picket line to work at the Employer. The five employees had been members of the Union. They submitted their resignations from membership during Local Lodge 1224's economic strike against the Employer, but before crossing the picket line. The Respondents have refused to consider the resignations effective because of restrictions on the right to resign contained in the International Association's constitution. The relevant portion of the constitution reads as follows:

> Resignations shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding the commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration.

[1] On 23 August 1984 the Respondents filed a motion to stay proceedings pending Supreme Court review of the validity of restrictions on resignation from union membership. We deny the motion.

B. Contentions of the Parties

The General Counsel contends that the Board's recent decisions in Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984), and Engineers & Scientists Guild (Lockheed-California Co.), 268 NLRB 311 (1983), are controlling and the act of disciplining the five individuals and the maintenance of the constitutional provision set forth above constitute violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. The Respondents allege that the complaint fails to state a claim and deny that they have committed unfair labor practices or that an appropriate remedy should include expunging the constitutional provision.

C. Discussion

We agree with the General Counsel. A union may not lawfully restrict its members' right to resign. Neufeld Porsche-Audi, supra. Accordingly, we find that the constitutional provision set forth above is invalid and the five employees' resignations were effective when submitted. Therefore, Respondent Local Lodge 1224 violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by refusing to accept the employees' resignations, and by filing intraunion charges, conducting disciplinary proceedings, and imposing court-collectible fines against the employees for returning to work after they had resigned their union memberships.

Furthermore, a union's maintenance in its constitution of an invalid provision restricting resignation tends to restrain and coerce employees from exercising their Section 7 rights. Lockheed-California, supra. Respondent International Association's maintenance of the constitutional provision set forth above therefore violated Section 8(b)(1)(A).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By refusing to accept resignations from employees Lloyd Winther, Roy Dawnes, Melvin Larsen, Morinus Oosterwyk, and John Venderped, and by bringing internal union charges, conducting disciplinary proceedings, and imposing court-collectible fines about June 1983 against them for returning to work at Motor Trucks, Inc., during Respondent Local Lodge 1224 of District Lodge 69's strike after they had submitted resignations from membership in the Union, Respondent Local Lodge 1224 of District Lodge 69 violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

2. By maintaining in its constitution the restriction-on-resignation provision set forth above, Respondent International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

3. The foregoing unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, we shall order that they cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order Respondent Local Lodge 1224 to refund to Winther, Dawnes, Larsen, Oosterwyk, and Venderped any moneys they may have paid as a result of the fines imposed against them, with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). In addition, we shall order the Respondents to expunge from their governing documents and constitution the restriction-on-resignation provision found invalid.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that

A. Respondent Local Lodge 1224 of District Lodge 69, Everett, Washington, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Restraining or coercing employees who have resigned from, and are no longer members of, the Respondent in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by refusing to accept their resignations, and by filing intraunion charges, conducting disciplinary proceedings, and imposing court-collectible fines against them because of their postresignation conduct in working at Motor Trucks, Inc. during the the strike that led to disciplinary action against Lloyd Winther, Roy Dawnes, Melvin Larsen, Morinus Oosterwyk, and John Venderped about June 1983.

(b) Maintaining in its governing documents the restriction-on-resignation provision in the constitution of Respondent International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO set forth below:

> Resignations shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding the commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration.

[2] Though the complaint in this case does not allege, in haec verba, the "maintenance" of the provision by Respondent Local Lodge 1224 as being unlawful, the complaint does allege that Local Lodge 1224 unlawfully refused to consider the resignations valid because of the provision. Further, the absence of such a "maintenance" allegation has no bearing on the Board's discretion to fashion appropriate remedies for the violations found. Neufeld Porsche-Audi, supra. We will therefore order Respondent Local Lodge 1224 to cease and desist from maintaining the provision in its governing documents and to expunge the provision therefrom. Member Dennis would not order Respondent Local Lodge 1224 to take these two actions. See id. at fn. 22.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the fines levied about June 1983 against Lloyd Winther, Roy Dawnes, Melvin Larsen, Morinus Oosterwyk, and John Venderped because of their postresignation work for Motor Trucks, Inc., and refund to them any moneys they may have paid pursuant to those fines, with interest.

(b) Expunge from its records and files all references to fines, intraunion charges, or disciplinary proceedings against the above-named employees for conduct occurring after their resignations from the Union, and notify them in writing this has been done.

(c) Expunge from its governing documents the restriction-on-resignation provision in the constitution of Respondent International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO set forth above.

(d) Post in its business office and other places where notices to its members are customarily posted copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the notice for posting by Motor Trucks, Inc., if willing, at all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

B. Respondent International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, Portland, Oregon, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Maintaining in its constitution the restriction-on-resignation provision set forth above in paragraph A,1,(b) of this Order.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Expunge from its constitution the restriction-on-resignation provision set forth above.

(b) Post at its business office and other places where notices to its members are customarily posted copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the notice for posting by Motor Trucks, Inc., if willing, at all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[3] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS AND AEROSPACE WORKERS, AFL–CIO

D & M Sheet Metal, Inc. and Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local Union #19, Petitioner. Case 4–RC–15562

14 December 1984

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered determinative challenges in an election held 6 April 1984 and the Acting Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 4 for and 2 against the Petitioner, with 3 challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the Acting Regional Director's findings and recommendations,[1] and finds that a certification of representative should be issued.

The Acting Regional Director found, inter alia, that D & M is an employer within the construction industry and that April Rambo and Robert McGinn worked enough days during the 24 months preceding the election to satisfy the Daniel Construction Co.,[2] special criteria available for determining voter eligibility in the construction industry. However, he concluded they were not eligible to vote because they were engaged in full-time nonunit work on, and prior to, the eligibility date. Eastern Rock Products, 239 NLRB 892 (1978).

We agree with the Acting Regional Director's recommendation that the challenges to the ballots of Rambo and McGinn be sustained. The parties raised no issue concerning special eligibility criteria when they entered into the Stipulated Election Agreement which contains the standard eligibility formula. We find that the agreement is proper and should be given effect. Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to consider the Daniel Construction issues that the Acting Regional Director discusses.

[1] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt, pro forma, the Acting Regional Director's recommendation that the challenge to Thomas Hollenbach's ballot be sustained.

[2] 133 NLRB 264 (1961) (employees in unit who worked at least 30 days in 12-month period preceding election or who did some unit work in 12-month period preceding election and at least 45 days in 24 months immediately preceding eligibility date, eligible to vote).

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Sheet Metal Workers International Association, Local Union #19 and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All sheet metal workers employed by D & M Sheet Metal, Inc., at its Westlawn, Pennsylvania facility, excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as definded in the Act.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, concurring.

I agree with my colleagues that the Stipulated Election Agreement should be given effect. I further find that the Daniel Construction eligibility formula does not in any event apply in this case. That formula is not implicated in every election in the construction industry. See, e.g., Dick Kelchner Excavating Co., 236 NLRB 1414 (1978); E. V. Williams Co., 175 NLRB 792 (1969). It was devised to address the unique sort of work assignments common in the construction industry. The Board found that because of the nature of the industry many employees experience intermittent employment for short periods and may be employed by several different employers during the course of a year. In consideration of those factors, the Board determined that employees who had been employed by an employer for at least 30 days in the year preceding the eligibility date for the election or had some employment with that employer in the year preceding the election and 45 days in the 2-year period preceding the eligibility date would have a continuing interest in their working conditions which would warrant their participation in the election. Here, as the Employer concedes, Rambo's and McGinn's work cannot be characterized as intermittent short term employment, nor do they work for several different employers in any given period of time. Instead, they hold permanent full-time jobs with another company. Although they sometimes work for this Employer, they do so only on the infrequent occasions when there is a lapse in their regular employment. As they hold regular full-time positions, they are not the kind of employees for which the special rule in Daniel Construction was developed.[1]

[1] Eastern Rock Products relied on by the Acting Regional Director is a limitation on the Daniel Construction rule; as Daniel Construction is not applicable in the instant case, likewise Eastern Rock does not apply.

Watt Electric Company and its alter ego, Watt Plumbing, Airconditioning & Electric, Inc. and John O. Watt and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 584, AFL–CIO–CLC. Case 16–CA–11434

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 31 July 1984 Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Linton issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Watt Electric Company and its alter ego, Watt Plumbing, Airconditioning & Electric, Inc. and John O. Watt, Tulsa, Oklahoma, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] In the absence of exceptions Member Hunter adopts the judge's conclusion that the Union is the Sec. 9(a) collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's employees.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. LINTON, Administrative Law Judge. In this alter ego case I find that Respondent, establishing an alter ego in order to operate nonunion with the hope that it could then make a profit, violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to apply the union contract to its alter ego, and transgressed Section 8(a)(3) by constructively discharging its employees, members of the Union, when they quit rather than applying to work for the alter ego.

The case was tried before me in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on March 7–8 and April 16, 1984, pursuant to the January 27, 1984 complaint issued, and thereafter amended, by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board through the Regional Director for Region 16 of the Board. The complaint is based on a charge filed December 22, 1983, by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 584, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union, IBEW, or Local 584), against Watt Electric Company, Inc.[1]

In the complaint, as amended, the General Counsel alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act on August 23, 1983, when WPA repudiated its collective-bargaining contract with Local 584, unilaterally terminated its employees, and began operating nonunion under the name of Watt Electric Company (WECO). The General Counsel also alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act on August 23 by terminating the employees of WPA because they were members of or represented by the IBEW.

By its answer Respondent admits receiving the charge but essentially denies all other allegations. At the hearing, Respondent amended its answer to admit commerce and certain other facts.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the brief filed by the General Counsel, I make the following[2]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

WPA, until August 23, 1983, and WECO, on and after that date, have been engaged in the business of providing electrical contracting services in the building and construction industry. During calendar year 1983, Respondent performed such services valued in excess of $50,000 for other business enterprises, including Oklahoma Electric Supply Company (OES), located within the State of Oklahoma. During the past 12 months OES, an Oklahoma corporation with a place of business in Tulsa, Oklahoma, purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 at its Tulsa facility direct from points outside Oklahoma.

WPA and WECO are members of the Eastern Oklahoma Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association, Incorporated (NECA). NECA is an organization of employers engaged in providing electrical contracting services. NECA exists for the purpose, inter alia, of representing certain employer-members in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreements with various labor organizations, including the Union. Various employer-members of NECA annually purchase goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside Oklahoma.

I find that at all material times Respondent has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] All dates are 1983 unless otherwise indicated. In this decision, Watt Plumbing, Airconditioning & Electric, Inc. is designated as WPA and John O. Watt as Watt. Because its articles of incorporation reflect the correct name to be "Watt Electric Company" (G.C. Exh. 11), I exclude the "Inc."

[2] Although Respondent asserted at the close of the hearing that it desired to file a brief, it failed to do so.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that Local 584 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

John O. Watt has been president of WPA since 1979 (Tr. 1:37; 3:16).[3] Watt testified that the Company, although under a different name, was established in 1910 (Tr. 3:15). For approximately 50 years it enjoyed a bargaining relationship with the Union (Tr. 3:15). In 1979 Watt's father, Dale Watt, sold WPA to his sons. John Watt purchased 87 percent and his brother Jim purchased 13 percent (Tr. 1:64–65, 119).

On January 2, 1974, Watt's father, still active in the business then, signed a "Letter of Assent-A" with the Eastern Oklahoma Chapter of the National Contractors Association (NECA).[4] In signing the form (G.C. Exh. 2), WPA designated NECA as its collective-bargaining representative for all matters "contained in or pertaining to the current approved inside labor agreement" between NECA and Local 584. The authorization, by its express terms, shall remain in effect until terminated by the undersigned employer giving written notice to the Eastern Oklahoma Chapter, NECA, and to the Local Union at least one hundred fifty (150) days prior to the then current anniversary date of the aforementioned approved labor agreement." By its amended answer, Respondent admits that the Assent designation, described above, remained in effect until June 1983 as to WPA (Tr. 1:15).

The most recent collective-bargaining agreement (CBA) executed by NECA and Local 584 expressed an effective term of June 2, 1982, through May 31, 1984, continuing thereafter from year to year unless modified or terminated on written notice of 90 days prior to the anniversary date (G.C. Exh. 3). By letter dated June 9, 1983, Watt, on behalf of WPA, purported to cancel the Assent and to revoke the designation of NECA as WPA's bargaining representative (G.C. Exh. 7).[5] In a letter bearing the same date, Watt notified Local 584 of its desire to terminate the CBA set to expire May 31, 1984 (G.C. Exh. 6). Watt stated in the letter that WPA representatives would be available to meet with the Union to discuss a successor contract.

The General Counsel contends that Respondent's attempt to withdraw the bargaining authorization was untimely because Watt's letter failed to give the required 150 days' notice. The argument appears to be that Respondent desired the notice to be effective immediately (Br. at 26). Of course, it is clear that Watt's revocation letters, dated June 9, 1983, gave well over the required 150 days' notice prior to the contract's anniversary date. However, on June 29, 1983, NECA and Local 584 executed an amendment to the 1982–1984 CBA whereby the CBA was extended 1 year, to May 31, 1985. The extension was in exchange for the Union's deferring 75 cents of a $1-an-hour pay raise, scheduled for June 1, 1983, to June 1, 1984, with the remaining 25 cents of the scheduled dollar to be paid to the pension plan effective June 1, 1983. WPA took advantage of the deferred wage rate by continuing to pay the existing rate, plus the additional 25 cents for the pension fund, until WPA became dormant in August 1983. Watt testified that he considered WPA bound to the 1982–1984 CBA for its original term, but not to the 1-year extension, and that the reason WPA ceased making the fringe benefit payments after August 1983 is because after August 23, 1983, WPA no longer employed any bargaining unit employees (Tr. 1:182, 192–196, 212). I find that WPA's revocation notice was timely and effective. The notice exceeded the 150 days required.

As established by the amended pleadings, the bargaining unit is described as:

> All full-time and part-time journeymen electricians, apprentices, and helpers employed by Respondent, exclusive of office employees, guards, watchmen, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WPA employed about four employees in the unit.[6]

B. Alter Ego WECO Created to Evade Union Contract

1. Facts

There is no dispute that by 1982 WPA was suffering from economic difficulty. Watt testified that WPA was losing jobs by being underbid by nonunion contractors during a time when the economy was generally poor (Tr. 1:231). The average nonunion pay rate, Watt testified, is about one-half that of union scale (Tr. 3:22, 48, 85). In January 1983 the Watt brothers, particularly John Watt, began a series of steps designed to help keep WPA afloat. Thus, in January, Watt eliminated his own salary (Tr. 1:68; 3:27). In April he mortgaged his home for $40,000, and Jim Watt did likewise for $10,000, and they put the funds into WPA (Tr. 1:70–71; 3:29, 91). Watt also sold an interest in an oil well, and in March he sold his automobile to provide his living expenses (1:71–72). WPA also auctioned some inventory for $40,000.[7] WPA

[3] Transcript references are by volume and page. The third day of this hearing followed a 6-week recess, and the reporting service prepared the volume of testimony for the third day as if it were a new hearing beginning with page one. To avoid confusion, I designate the transcript for the third day as volume 3, and I list the page numbers as they appear in that volume.

[4] The company name shown on the form is "Watt Electric Company." Watt explained that the company performed electrical work for 20 years, and that the clerks at NECA frequently used the name shown as the company's name as a shorthand rendition of the longer name (Tr. 1:214–216).

[5] Watt testified that WPA has not dropped its membership in NECA, and that WECO is a member of NECA although WECO has never assigned its bargaining rights to NECA (Tr. 3:92).

[6] Even if WPA initially entered into a prehire agreement with the Union under Sec. 8(f) of the Act, that agreement ripened into a Sec. 9 contract by virtue of the fact that WPA's employees constituted a permanent and stable work force with a majority, and perhaps all, being members of Local 584. In short, at all times material herein, Local 584 enjoyed majority status.

[7] Because the inventory sold at far below value, the sale hurt WPA's credit standing at the firm's bank, for the bank had listed the inventory at a much higher value (Tr. 3:31, 33).

also terminated an office employee who had worked for the firm 21 years (Tr. 1:137; 3:28).

Although Watt never told the Union how bad WPA's financial plight was, the NECA contractors did seek a number of contract changes in an attempt to remain competitive. The Union granted none of those requested, but did agree that a contractor could pay a reduced rate, 75 percent of scale, for certain small jobs. This concession was called the Jobs Target Program (G.C. Exh. 15).

Watt testified that, because the Jobs Target Program did not apply to much of his work, he went to each of his employees in July 1983 and asked if they would agree that WPA could apply the reduced scale to all jobs of WPA (Tr. 1:85, 92).[8] Each agreed. The Union did not learn of this conduct until late August (Tr. 2:374).[9]

Although the reduced rate helped, Watt testified, it was not enough (Tr. 1:93; 3:55). Earlier WPA's bank had given the Company an ultimatum—get profitable, or else! (Tr. 1:67, 160–161, 168) In August the Watt brothers decided they would have to take the ultimate step—begin operating a firm which had no union contract (Tr. 3:56). About August 1 the idea of incorporating another firm began to form (Tr. 1:40), and the decision made by the Watt brothers became firm on August 19 (Tr. 1:66, 217, 230). WECO was incorporated on August 22, the date the articles of incorporation were filed with the office of the Secretary of State of Oklahoma (1:41, 55; G.C. Exh. 11).

Watt testified that WECO was created in response to the bank's pressure to become profitable, and the only way left in which a profit could be made was by deactivating WPA and operating through a new company, WECO, which would not have to pay the high wages and benefits mandated by a union contract (Tr. 1:67, 161, 166).[10] This is reflected in a letter, dated January 9, 1984, from Respondent's counsel, Jeff Nix, to Board agent Leslie D. Imboden, responding to the Union's charge in this case. The first paragraph of the two-paragraph letter reads (G.C. Exh. 8):

> In response to the charges filed the Company replies as follows: Late in the summer of 1983 the employer ascertained that it could no longer operate paying union scale and further that the union would not consider a lesser rate, so the employer ceased doing business.

This is not a case involving a "double breasted" operation.[11] At the hearing Respondent's counsel described the situation as being one in which one company (WPA) simply "went broke," and, in an effort to salvage what was left, "They offered a reduced wage rate to employees who are performing essentially the same work [for WECO]." (Tr. 1:143)

Watt testified that he did not awake one morning hating the Union, and that if somehow he were given complete discretion regarding wages and benefits, he still would be operating under the CBA and WECO would not have been formed (Tr. 1:167–168).

The parties stipulated that Respondent converted WPA to a dormant status; that WPA exists merely to service its mortgage obligation; that the various business transfers, purchases, and lease payments between WPA and WECO have not been as an arm's-length transaction; and that WPA and WECO constitute a single integrated business enterprise, with the qualification that WPA exists only in its dormant condition (Tr. 1:149–151).

The parties further stipulated that at all times material, John O. Watt has controlled the operation and management of both WPA and WECO, and that the matters so controlled include labor relations (Tr. 1:60, 129).[12]

Watt testified that he was responsible for the hiring at both WPA and WECO, although Jim Watt, his brother, served as the only supervisor at WPA other than Watt (Tr. 1:132–133). Jim Watt is vice president of WPA and secretary-treasurer of WECO (Tr. 1:53, 55). The boards of directors of both corporations are composed principally of members of the Watt family (1:60). Watt testified that WECO assumed what business WPA had and has tried to expand on it (Tr. 3:64–65) while using the same job classifications for its electricians of journeyman and apprentice (Tr. 1:135). Following its August 23 deactivation, WPA has leased its office space, equipment, and land to WECO for $3600 per month from which WECO operates (1:141, 169). When WECO needs a supply item, it purchases it at market value from the inventory still owned by WPA (Tr. 3:89–90).

2. Analysis and conclusions

As noted by the Third Circuit in its lucid opinion in NLRB v. Browning-Ferris Industries, 691 F.2d 1117, (1982), the Board reviews the following four factors in determining whether two nominally separate entities in reality constitute a single employer: (1) functional integration of operations; (2) centralized control of labor relations;[13] (3) common management; and (4) common ownership or financial control.[14] However, a finding of single-employer status does not necessarily establish that an employerwide unit is the appropriate bargaining unit. South Prairie Construction Co. v. Operating Engineers

[8] The complaint was amended at trial to allege such direct dealing as being violative of Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act (Tr. 2:328, 379; G.C. Exh. 20).

[9] Watt bypassed the Union because he felt Local 584 would be negative (1:191, 225; 3:72). He never sought individual relief from the Union from the contractual wage scale and benefit contributions (Tr. 1:73–76). However, it should be noted that under art. II, sec. 2.4, of the 1982–1984 CBA, any better term granted to one contractor must be extended to all (G.C. Exh. 3).

[10] Watt testified that WECO has never recognized the Union or honored the 1982–1984 CBA (Tr. 1:174, 220).

[11] The Board has defined "double breasted" as being one "in which a contractor operates two companies, one unionized and the other nonunionized." Walter N. Yoder & Sons, 270 NLRB 652 fn. 2 (1984); Comment, Double-Breasted Operations In the Construction Industry: A Search For Concrete Guidelines, 6 U. Dayton L. Rev. 45 fn. 3 (1981).

[12] Dale Watt, the father of John O. Watt, has owned 100 percent of WECO's stock at all times (Tr. 1:66). John O. Watt is vice president of WECO and his wife, Malissa Watt, is president of WECO (Tr. 1:55). Notwithstanding Malissa Watt's position of president, Watt credibly testified, consistent with the stipulations, that his wife is not engaged in the operation of WECO (Tr. 1:121–122).

[13] Control of labor relations is deemed a critical factor. Gerace Construction, 193 NLRB 645 (1971); Comment, Bargaining Obligations After Corporate Transformations, 54 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 624, 634, and fn. 68 (1979).

[14] With equal clarity, the Court distinguished the different concept of joint employer.

Local 627, 425 U.S. 800 (1976). This is so because the criteria for finding a single employer are not the same as those used in determining the scope of the unit. Acoustics, Inc., 270 NLRB 1046 (1984). Thus, the collective-bargaining agreement (CBA) of one entity does not attach and bind the single employer simply because there is a single-employer finding. NLRB v. DMR Corp., 699 F.2d 788 (5th Cir. 1983); Samuel Kosoff & Sons, Inc., 269 NLRB 424 (1984); Naccarato Construction Co., 233 NLRB 1394 fn. 2 (1977). On the other hand, where two firms do comprise a single employer employing employees in an employerwide unit found appropriate, the CBA of one will bind the single employer. Walter N. Yoder & Sons, 270 NLRB 652 fn. 2 (1984); Ray C. Lapp Air Conditioning, 270 NLRB 641 fn. 2 (1984); DMR Corp., 258 NLRB 1063 (1981), remanded on other grounds 699 F.2d 788 (5th Cir. 1983).

In contrast to the single-employer situation, where two facially different firms are found to be alter egos of each other, the CBA of one automatically binds the other.[15] This result follows from the very definition of an alter ego. As a practical matter the second company, found to be the alter ego of the first, does not have a CBA of its own because typically the alter ego is established for the purpose of evading the original employer's responsibilities under its CBA. As we shall see, the purpose of the corporate transformation is a factor the Board considers.

In resolving questions of alter ego status the Board considers a number of factors, no one of which is controlling, with several being similar to those reviewed when determining single employer status. The Board recently listed these factors as including:[16] (1) common management and ownership; (2) common business purpose, nature of operations, and supervision; (3) common premises and equipment; (4) common customers, i.e., whether the employers constitute the same business in the same market; (5) the nature and extent of the negotiations and formalities surrounding the transaction; and (6) whether the purpose behind the creation of the alleged alter ego was legitimate or whether, instead, its purpose was to evade responsibilities under the Act.

Because I find WECO to be the alter ego of WPA, it is not necessary that I resolve the single-employer or appropriate unit questions.

Turning now to a review of the evidence regarding the alter ego factors, I note that consideration of the first factor calls for an affirmative finding. Admittedly, there was common management. Even though Watt's father is the sole shareholder of WECO, there is substantially identical ownership of WPA and WECO because the Board, at least in these circumstances, treats ownership by family members as personal ownership.[17]

In fact, most of the factors are covered by the parties' stipulation that following WECO's creation it had substantially identical management, ownership, business purpose, operation, supervision, equipment, and customers that WPA had before August 23, 1983 (Tr. 1:147). As discussed earlier, the parties also stipulated that Watt controls the labor relations policies of WECO as he also did at WPA before it became dormant on August 23 (1:60–61).

The fact that WECO operates from the same premises occupied by WPA has been noted. Moreover, the parties stipulated that the $3600 monthly lease payment made by WECO to WPA is not based on fair market value considerations but only on WECO's remaining mortgage obligations, that the arrangement is not an arm's-length transaction, and that the two firms are a single integrated business enterprise, with the qualification that WPA is dormant and exists only to service its mortgage obligations (Tr. 1:149–151).

Finally, and as previously discussed, Watt was quite candid at the hearing in testifying that the principal motivation, indeed, the only reason, in creating WECO was for the purpose of establishing a profitable company based on operating at wage and benefit[18] rates substantially less than those mandated by WPA's CBA. Watt testified that WPA was deactivated because it could not make the desired profit under a union contract (Tr. 1:164, 165). WECO was created to avoid WPA's financial obligations under the 1982–1984 CBA.[19]

Although Watt did not, I find, harbor any personal dislike, animus, or hate for the Union, the absence of such a motivation is not determinative. What does resolve the issue is the undisputed fact that the Watt family created WECO in an attempt to evade the CBA WPA was obligated to honor with Local 584.

Certain testimony by Gerald H. Edwards, Local 584's business manager, is illuminating here. Edwards credibly testified that on August 23, 1983, Watt informed Edwards that WPA was closing and WECO would open nonunion. Edwards inquired how Watt expected to benefit from this when his brother had been unsuccessful in an earlier attempt to operate a nonunion shop. Watt replied that when Jim Watt had tried to operate nonunion earlier, it was under the name "Diversified Electric," a name not known in the electrical business in Tulsa. By utilizing the name of Watt Electric Company, Watt explained to Edwards, Watt felt WECO could survive and make a profit (Tr. 2:343–344). In his subsequent testimony, Watt did not address the subject of "Diversified Electric" or the remarks (aside from the nonunion part) attributed to him by Edwards. I credit Edwards who testified with a persuasive demeanor.

A majority of the court in Denzil S. Alkire v. NLRB, 716 F.2d 1014 (4th Cir. 1983), held that an alter ego conclusion cannot be made unless it is supported by a finding that the employer "obtained, or reasonably expected"

[15] Walter N. Yoder & Sons, supra; E.G. Sprinkler Corp., 268 NLRB 1241 fn. 1, 1244 (1984); J. M. Tanaka Construction, 249 NLRB 238, 241 (1980), enfd. 675 F.2d 1029, (9th Cir. 1982).

[18] Watt testified that WECO does not provide any fringe benefits such as insurance (Tr. 3:94).

[19] Certain work rules, deemed restrictive, pertaining to such matters as the journeyman-apprentice ratio also figured in Respondent's motivation (Tr. 1:115–116; 3:93–94).

an economic benefit as a result of the transfer of its operations to the alleged alter ego. As with the Shoots family in Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001 (1984), and the Cordes family in Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976), here the Watt family anticipated the "reasonably expected" economic benefit that the alter ego (WECO) could be operated at a profit (because of no CBA) instead of the loss being sustained by WPA which was bound to a CBA.

Even with the added factor of a reasonably expected economic benefit, it is clear, and I find, that from its inception WECO has been the alter ego of WPA.[20]

Accordingly, I find that Respondent, by allowing WECO to fail to honor the 1982–1984 CBA with Local 584, has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Samuel Kosoff & Sons, 269 NLRB 424 (1984); Advance Electric, supra.

WPA's Employees Constructively Discharged

There is a sharp dispute over what Watt told Gerald H. Edwards, Local 584's business manager, either the early morning or early afternoon of August 23, 1983,[21] and the unit employees later that afternoon. The crux of the dispute is whether Watt, on informing them he was closing WPA on August 23 and would begin operating the next day as a different firm, also asserted that the new company would be nonunion. Watt contends that he said nothing about nonunion, whereas Edwards and four employee witnesses testified that he did. I credit Edwards and the employees, who testified persuasively, and I find that on August 23, Watt did tell them WECO would open as a nonunion shop. The employees, faced with the choice of having to forgo the benefits of their union contract, all declined Watt's offer that they could apply for work at WECO.

To the extent that it matters, I credit Watt's testimony that he did not awake one morning hating the Union (Tr. 1:167). I also credit his testimony that he had no objection to the men retaining their union membership while working for WECO. Admitting that he did not tell the men this latter fact, Watt asserts that he did not do so because they did not ask (Tr. 1:186). Such admission lessens the weight to be given his further testimony that he would welcome the men to WECO's payroll (Tr. 1:83). It is clear that, although Watt would like to have had the experience and reliability of these electricians at WECO, he made little affirmative effort to encourage them to apply. Whether Watt followed his course of lukewarm effort because of the men's negative reaction at working for a nonunion firm, or because Watt perhaps felt that there was no way he could convince union electricians to work for a nonunion shop, is not entirely clear.[22] Resolution of the question is not really important, for the determination of whether a constructive discharge occurred does not depend on a finding that Watt acted from union animus and discriminatory intent.

A constructive discharge is shown simply by the fact that Watt presented the electricians with a Hobson's choice: work for WECO without benefit of a union contract, or work elsewhere. By presenting its employees that choice on August 23, 1983, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Advance Electric, supra; Remodeling By Oltmanns, 263 NLRB 1152, 1162 (1982).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents WPA and WECO are employers within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. WECO is the alter ego of WPA.

3. IBEW Local 584 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. The following employees constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and part-time journeymen electricians, apprentices, and helpers employed by Watt Plumbing, Airconditioning & Electric, Inc., and by its alter ego Watt Electric Company, excluding office employees, guards, watchmen, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

5. At all times material herein, IBEW Local 584 has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

6. WPA effectively revoked the "Letter of Assent-A" on June 9, 1983, and therefore did not become bound to the 1-year extension of the expiration date provided for in the June 29, 1983 amendment to the 1982–1984 collective-bargaining agreement.

7. By negotiating a reduction in the pay scale at midterm directly with its unit employees in July 1983, WPA violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

8. By failing and refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate unit, by failing to honor the 1982–1984 CBA with respect to such employees and by failing to apply to such employees the terms and conditions of the 1982–1984 CBA, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

9. By constructively discharging Donald J. Andrews, Robert L. Silver, Johnny F. Taylor, and Jerry W. Wallace on August 23, 1983, by conditioning their employment on working for WECO without the benefit of the 1982–1984 CBA applicable between WPA and the Union, and below the wage rates and benefits called for in the CBA, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

10. These are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[20] The pleadings designate WPA as the alter ego of WECO. The difference is immaterial, for the alter and the ego are one and the same under the law.

[21] The hour is disputed, but I need not resolve the conflict.

[22] One of the electricians, Jerry W. Wallace, returned about January 1984 and discussed with Jim Watt the possibility of being hired by WECO (Tr. 1:187, 247; 2:259). Nothing developed from this interview and, although the cause is not fully explained in the record, it appears to be unrelated to Wallace's known union membership.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (5) of the Act, I shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The General Counsel makes no contention that John O. Watt is named in his capacity as an individual. It therefore appears that Watt is named only as an owner, representative, or officer of WPA and WECO. Accordingly, no monetary liability shall attach to Watt in his individual capacity. See generally Contris Packing Co., 268 NLRB 113 (1983).

In making the discriminatees whole in the manner established by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), Respondent shall pay interest on any backpay which is determined in the compliance stage to be due.[23] Interest shall be calculated in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Respondent shall expunge any reference to the constructive discharges from the personnel records of the discriminatees. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

As earlier discussed, the 1982–1984 CBA expired as to Respondent on May 31, 1984, and the 1-year extension of the CBA does not bind Respondent. However, Respondent cannot eat the cake without paying the baker. This means that Respondent, having revoked NECA's right to bargain on Respondent's behalf, could not avail itself of the deferred wage rate called for by the June 29, 1983 amendment negotiated by NECA, while at the same time decline to honor the 1-year extension. Respondent must therefore make contributions and backpay at the scale set forth in the 1982–1984 CBA without regard to the deferred rate negotiated by NECA in the June 1983 amendment.

Respondent was experiencing serious financial difficulty. In Watt's words, the (nonunion) competition was "fierce" and "cutthroat." (Tr. 3:18.) The course of action Respondent chose in creating WECO, however, was worse than futile. Respondent now not only must make whole the constructively discharged employees and reimburse them and the contractual benefit funds, but it also must make whole all those employees hired by WECO between August 23, 1983, and May 31, 1984, pursuant to the terms and pay scale set forth in the 1982–1984 CBA.[24] And it does not end there. Although the 1982–1984 CBA expired May 31, 1984 as to Respondent, it is well settled that terms and conditions of employment cannot be unilaterally changed following the expiration of a CBA, Stone Boat Yard, 264 NLRB 981 (1983), enfd. 715 F.2d 441 (9th Cir. 1983), although the rule does not hold for continuation of any dues-checkoff provision,[25] or for arbitration of a grievance arising after expiration of the CBA which is not over an obligation arguably created by the CBA.[26] Thus, Respondent's backpay liability continues until Respondent complies with the order set forth below.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and the on entire record, I issue the following recommended[27]

ORDER

The Respondent, Watt Electric Company, and its alter ego, Watt Plumbing, Airconditioning & Electric, Inc. and John O. Watt, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union, IBEW Local 584, as the exclusive representative of its employees in the appropriate unit with respect to wages, hours, working conditions, or other terms and conditions of employment of the employees.

(b) Bypassing IBEW Local 584 and dealing directly with its employees on wages, hours of work, or other conditions of employment.

(c) Discouraging membership in the Union, or any other labor organization, by constructively discharging its employees through the imposition of illegal conditions of employment, or by otherwise discriminating against any of its employees in regard to hire, tenure of employment, or other terms and conditions of their employment.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Donald J. Andrews, Robert L. Silver, Johnny F. Taylor, and Jerry W. Wallace immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, any employees hired on or after August 24, 1983, to fill any of said positions, and make such employees whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Comply retroactively with the terms and conditions of the 1982–1984 CBA, without regard to the modifications prescribed in the June 29, 1983 amendment, as those original terms would have applied through May 31, 1984, by making whole the Union for any and all

[23] Backpay shall be due not only for any loss of earnings resulting from their constructive discharge on August 23, 1983, but also resulting from the reduced wages Respondent unlawfully paid them from July to August 23, 1983. NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
>
> To form, join, or assist any union
>
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
>
> To act together for other mutual aid or protection
> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and bargain with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 584 as the exclusive representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and part-time journeymen electricians, apprentices, and helpers employed by Watt Plumbing, Airconditioning & Electric, Inc., and by its alter ego Watt Electric Company, excluding office employees, guards, watchmen, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT refuse to honor and abide by the terms and conditions of any collective-bargaining agreement (CBA) which we may have now or in the future with IBEW Local 584, or with any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT constructively discharge you by forcing you to quit rather than to work without the wage scale, benefits, and conditions of any CBA which we have with IBEW Local 584, or any other labor organization, and without representation by such labor organization where we have a legal obligation to recognize such union and honor the agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you with respect to your rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT bypass IBEW Local 584, or any labor organization which is your exclusive representative, and negotiate directly with you concerning wages, hours, or terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL, on request, recognize and bargain with IBEW Local 584 as the exclusive representative of all the employees in the appropriate unit concerning rates of pay, wages, hours of work, and other terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL make whole all employees employed in the unit at any time between July 1, 1983, and May 31, 1984, by transmitting, with interest, the contributions owed to various funds provided for in the 1982–1984 CBA; by reimbursing, with interest, such unit employees for any expenses they may have incurred by our failure to make the required contributions; and by paying to all employees employed at any time in the unit between July 1, 1983, and May 31, 1984, the difference, with interest, in wages actually paid and the wage scale specified in the 1982–1984 CBA.

WE WILL offer Donald J. Andrews, Robert L. Silver, Johnny F. Taylor, and Jerry W. Wallace immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest and WE WILL notify each of them that we have removed from our files any reference to his discharge and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

WATT ELECTRIC COMPANY AND ITS ALTER EGO, WATT PLUMBING, AIRCONDITIONING & ELECTRIC, INC. AND JOHN O. WATT

Southwestern Bell Telephone Company and Communications Workers of America, AFL–CIO, Local 6310. Case 14–CA–16558

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 27 September 1983 Administrative Law Judge Thomas D. Johnston issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found, and we agree, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act under NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975), by denying employee Daniel Reed's requests for union representation at an investigatory interview Reed reasonably believed might result in disciplinary action against him. As a remedy for the violation, the judge, applying Kraft Foods, 251 NLRB 598 (1980), recommended that the Respondent be required to make whole employee Reed for any loss of pay resulting from the Respondent's suspension of him for alleged misuse of company property. However, in our recent decision in Taracorp Industries, 273 NLRB 354 (1984), we overruled Kraft Foods and held that Section 10(c) of the Act precludes a make-whole remedy for Weingarten violations where the discipline of an employee is for cause.[3] Accordingly, consistent with Taracorp, we shall modify the judge's recommended Order to delete the make-whole and expunction remedies and shall order the Respondent to cease and desist from depriving any employee of his right to union representation at an investigatory interview which the employee reasonably believes might result in disciplinary action. We shall further order the Respondent to post an appropriate notice.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Southwestern Bell Telephone Company, Union, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Delete paragraphs 2(a), (b), and (c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT require our employees to participate in employer interviews or meetings where they have reasonable grounds to believe that the matters to be discussed may result in their being the subject of disciplinary action and where we have refused to permit them to be represented at such interviews or meetings by their labor organization.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

SOUTHWESTERN BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS D. JOHNSTON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at St. Louis, Missouri, on July 19, 1983,[1] pursuant to an amended charge filed on April 15[2]

[1] All dates referred to are in 1983 unless otherwise stated.

[2] The original charge was filed on March 15.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The judge concluded that the Board will not defer a case to arbitration which involves a violation of Sec. 8(a)(1). At the time of his decision, United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), which holds otherwise, had not yet issued. However, no exceptions were filed to this conclusion. In addition, no exceptions were filed to the judge's conclusion that the Regional Director did not abuse his discretion by refusing to approve a settlement agreement entered into by the parties.

[3] As further explained in Taracorp, discipline is "for cause" within the meaning of Sec. 10(c) if it is imposed for some reason other than an employee's protected concerted activities. Since it is clear in the present case that employee Reed was not disciplined for asserting his right to union representation in the investigatory interview, but for alleged misuse of company property, his discipline was "for cause" within the meaning of Sec. 10(c) and a make-whole remedy is therefore precluded.

by the Communications Workers of America, AFL–CIO, Local 6310 (the Union), and a complaint issued on April 19.

The complaint alleges that Southwestern Bell Telephone Company (the Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by denying employee Daniel Reed's request to be represented by the Union during an interview which Reed had reasonable cause to believe might result in disciplinary action, and suspended Reed as a result of information received from him during the interview and after his request for representation had been made, thereby interfering with, restraining, and coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

The Respondent in its answer, which was amended at the hearing, denies having violated the Act as alleged. While it admits it suspended Daniel Reed about January 18, it denies it suspended him as a result of information obtained from him during the interview or that Reed had requested representation or that such request had been denied.

The issues involved are whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discriminatorily denying Reed's request for union representation during an interview which he had reasonable cause to believe might result in disciplinary action and suspended him as a result of information received from him during the interview after he had requested such representation.

On the entire record in this case and from my observations of the witnesses and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent,[3] I hereby make the following[4]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Respondent, a Missouri corporation with an office and place of business located at St. Louis, Missouri, and with other places of business located in the State of Missouri, including a facility located at Union, Missouri, which is the only facility involved in this proceeding, is engaged in the telephone communications industry. During the calendar year 1982, a representative period, the Respondent in the course of its operations received revenues in excess of $100,000, of which revenues in excess of $100,000 were received for providing interstate telephonic communications to its customers.

Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Communications Workers of America, AFL–CIO, Local 6310 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[3] The Charging Party did not submit a brief.

[4] Unless otherwise indicated the findings are based on the pleadings, admissions, stipulations, and undisputed evidence contained in the record, which I credit.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Respondent is engaged in the telephone communications industry and has a facility located at Union, Missouri. Included among its supervisory personnel are District Manager of Outside Plant Construction Eugene Enright, Assistant Staff Manager of Security Francis Clark, and Network Service Supervisor Lawrence Prichard.[5]

The employees of the Respondent employed at that facility are represented by the Union.

Daniel Reed, the discriminatee, who has been employed by the Respondent for approximately 14-1/2 years, works as a lineman at the Union, Missouri construction facility. From 1976 to February 1983 he worked under the direct supervision of Supervisor Prichard. His duties include placing and removing pole lines and cable drops and his work involves the use of a company bucket truck which he uses daily. Reed is also a member of the union and has served as a union steward at the Union, Missouri facility for about 5 years representing the linemen and splicers.

B. Denial of Reed's Request for Union Representation and His Suspension

An anonymous unsigned letter purportedly from a telephone customer, dated July 9 and addressed to District Manager Enright, was sent to the Respondent accusing Reed, who it suggested be investigated, of ripping off the Company for years. It mentioned seeing him on numerous occasions using a company truck drilling post holes for his fencing, using the bucket truck for trimming trees, and unloading and stacking telephone poles he would bring in and later sell. The letter further stated Reed had a company ladder leaning against a tree, a new pole with an CB antenna attached, and mentioned that someone else believed Reed's electric fence posts were also company equipment. The letter further related the customer's telephone bills had kept increasing and the Company had said it needed more money for increased costs and suggested if the labor force was better controlled costs should and could decrease and indicated the letter might help.

District Manager Enright, who is a third-line supervisor and supervises approximately 223 employees including 36 first- and second-level managers, testified that on January 17 on receiving and reading this anonymous letter, which was postmarked January 13 but had been misdirected, he felt the allegations, if true (that Reed used Company trucks to dig post holes and to trim trees, and had obtained used poles to sell and had a company ladder and a new telephone pole for a CB antenna), would violate company rules.

Under the Respondent's policies, as expressed in its booklet entitled "A Code of Business Conduct," and the section pertaining to "Company Property," which had been in effect for at least 4 years, company property is not to be used for personal benefit, or any other improper purpose and, except with proper authorization, it should not be sold, loaned, given away, or otherwise disposed of regardless of condition or value. The booklet also indicates violations of such company policies can lead to disciplinary action, dismissal, and prosecution. The contents of this booklet are reviewed annually with the Respondent's employees and Reed, who admitted having read it, acknowledged in writing as required by Company policies that such review was last held with him on May 20, 1982.

That same day Enright contacted Assistant Staff Manager of Security Clark and informed him about the letter and the following day, January 18, they together drove out to Reed's farm and made a visual inspection from the road. According to both Enright and Clark they observed various items of company property or what appeared to be former company property on the farm which were items Reed would have had occasion to work with as a lineman. These included two sheave blocks; a stack of 25 to 40 poles varying in length from 25 to 40 feet; a lubricating or vehicle ramp constructed out of telephone poles; what appeared to be a new telephone pole by the house with a CB antenna attached; rope similar to that used by the Respondent hanging from a tree limb; a stack of poles 8 to 10 feet in length; an electric fence for cattle constructed out of 40 or 50 ground rods;[6] a fence and a fenced in area constructed of about 80 to 100 old used telephone poles; a loading dock constructed out of fairly good size class stubs from poles; a yellow fiberglass ladder with a stenciled-on crew number leaning against the house; and three dead-end arms[7] which appeared to be new.

Enright testified following their visit to Reed's farm he contacted Reed's immediate supervisor, Supervisor Prichard, read him the anonymous letter, and questioned him about its contents. After Prichard denied any knowledge of the allegations contained in the letter, Prichard stated that Enright instructed him to have Reed report to the central office at Union, Missouri, which he did.

That same day, January 18, District Manager Enright, Assistant Staff Manager Clark, Supervisor Prichard, and Reed met in the basement meeting room at the central office, which Reed described as a room which was used for grievance and disciplinary meetings where he had previously represented other employees as their union steward.

Reed testified Enright began the meeting by asking him if he had ever used company trucks to trim his trees at his house. According to Reed, having been asked this question, he thought he was in trouble because when he looked at Prichard, who he contends had given him permission to use the company truck to trim trees,[8] Prichard gave him a shrug like he did not know anything about it and he knew he was on his own, whereupon he then said he needed union representation. Enright responded by telling Reed that he was the union steward and that should be good enough. Enright then continued to question him about whether he had trimmed trees on his property with the company vehicle whereupon he admitted he had used the bucket truck once to trim the trees on his lunch hour 2-1/2 years ago, but he said he had permission to do so. Enright, after questioning Reed's assertion about doing the work on his lunch hour, explained he had a letter and what it accused Reed of doing and said he and Clark had gone out to Reed's home that morning where they saw a large pile of used poles and crossarms, a lot of discarded company equipment, and an old company ladder leaning against the house. Reed explained that equipment had all been given to him or he had taken it with permission and it was not stealing like Enright was trying to insinuate. On Enright's mentioning the ladder was worth over $150 and that constituted a felony, Reed explained he took it out of the junk pile at least 5 years ago and that the crew number stenciled on the ladder would verify how old it was.[9] After discussing the ladder, Reed stated he told them he thought they were headhunting and said he needed union representation. Enright responded by asking Read was he not the union representative for Union, Missouri. When Reed replied he was, Enright continued questioning him by asking him who authorized him to take the hugh pile of old poles which were stacked beside the road. His response was every first line foreman he had worked for let the linemen, telephone people, or the general public take poles out of the pole yard[10] when they were brought in and he explained he probably had first crack at them because he pulled them and knew when they came in and that he had permission and could still get foremen to testify to that. During the meeting Reed also admitted about 8 to 10 years ago he used a company post hole digging truck to place two poles in a vehicle ramp he built on his property.[11]

Enright then asked Reed for permission to seach his property and said since he had admitted taking the ladder, which constituted a felony, if Reed would not give him permission he would go to the county judge and get a search warrant and search his property. Although Reed first refused permission after Enright told him if he did not he would have to press criminal charges against him to get the search warrant because that was the only way he could get it and Reed would be up for a felony. Reed stated he decided that his best defense was to let Enright come down and see what was there because he did not have anything to hide.

Before signing a statement given to him to sign authorizing Clark and Prichard to search his property and vehicles,[12] Reed stated he again asked for union representa-

[6] Enright acknowledged the Respondent did not recover ground rods used in construction but instead drove them underground.

[7] This is the arm that dead ends the wire on the telephone pole.

[8] Prichard denied at the hearing that he ever gave Reed permission to use company property or equipment for his personal benefit.

[9] According to Reed, Clark later obtained the correct crew number on the ladder which verified it belonged to a man who had been gone for 5 years.

[10] Bill Konecnik, another employee, testified the past practice was that used telephone poles were up for grabs by anyone who wanted them and they would notify their supervisor, or the linemen would just take them home.

[11] According to Reed, his foreman at the time, John Palisch, who did not testify, had given him permission to use the truck on that occasion.

[12] The statement dated January 18, which was signed by Reed and witnessed by Enright, contained in pertinent part the following sentence: "No threats or promises have been made to force me to submit to this search for property of Southwestern Bell Telephone Company." Reed tion. When Enright replied that he would give him a minute to get his union representative there, Reed stated he went ahead and signed to let them search because there was no telephone in the room and he did not see any way he could get a representative there that fast.

Reed, during the hearing, denied, except for the two occasions he admitted during the interview, using the company trucks for his personal use and specifically denied using the company truck to set his antenna pole. Reed testified the approximately 100 ground rods used in constructing his electric fence had been obtained from dismantling jobs. These rods had been junked by the Respondent and he had asked all of his foremen whether it was all right to take them. His foremen had also given him permission to take the old telephone poles which he had also obtained in the process of wrecking out pole lines. Reed denied the antenna pole or any other poles or crossarms on his property were new and stated that the ladder was manufactured by the Louisiana Ladder Company about 1973 and he had obtained it about 1977. Reed explained that as he wrecked cables or transferred poles he took the used bolts that held the cables on the telephone poles home or put them in the trash at the Company from which they were then dumped and covered over with dirt by a trash hauler.

District Manager Enright gave a different version of this meeting. According to him he began the meeting by telling Reed what he had to cover with him was difficult because he had difficulty in understanding anybody who would write a letter and not sign his or her name. However, there were some allegations in the letter which bordered on company assets being so to speak manipulated and made inferences about Reed's conduct off the job and accused him of using company vehicles and having company property. He then, after also mentioning he had been out to Reed's farm that day, said he would like to cover some of the pertinent questions and would like to have Reed answer them. After looking at both Clark and Prichard, Reed commented it looked to him like he was in a little trouble whereupon he told Reed he did not regard it as trouble but said he needed answers to some questions. When Reed inferred that he would like to have some help he asked Reed was he not the union steward. On Reed replying he was the union steward but for construction he informed Reed that it was a construction matter that he would like to discuss with him. After Reed pondered awhile and shrugged his shoulders, he again asked Reed if he would answer the questions and Reed nodded affirmatively. Following this he mentioned there was some serious allegations in the letter that Reed had used certain materials and vehicles to perform work on his farm and he mentioned the letter had said on numerous occasions he was observed using a company truck to dig holes and to set poles and asked Reed if he had done that. Reed replied he had but said it was on his lunch hour. After questioning Reed about doing it on his lunch hour, he told Reed it did not make any difference whether it was on his lunch hour or not because it was unauthorized use of company property to perform work for his personal gain. However, on asking Reed whether he had permission Reed replied he had and looked at Prichard and said they knew about it. Prichard then denied he gave Reed or other employees permission to use company equipment.

Enright then mentioned the letter inferred Reed had used the bucket trucks to trim trees and asked Reed whether he had done that, whereupon Reed again admitted he had but said it was on his lunch hour. He again told Reed that he needed permission to do that and it was misuse of company property to perform work for his own benefit.

According to Enright, he did not think they ever identified when Reed said he used these vehicles.

Reed was then questioned about the ladder which he said was a discarded ladder he had obtained from the junk bin. He informed Reed that it was his recollection that fiberglass ladders had only been approved by the Company for 8 to 10 years and asked Reed whether they were allowed to take ladders and tools from the junk bin home which Reed said they were. Reed also, pursuant to Enright's inquiry, said the ground rods and crossarms were also obtained from the junk pile.

Enright stated he then asked Reed whether there was anything else on the farm they ought to know about. When Reed replied there might be some other articles out there, but nothing of any consequence, he asked Reed whether he minded if they went out and checked his farm to see whether there was anything else there that belonged to the Company. Reed, after hesitating and appearing reluctant, finally nodded affirmatively after Enright suggested that Clark and Prichard could accompany Reed and he would not accompany them. While Clark was preparing a statement for Reed to sign, Enright stated Clark was sitting there shaking his head and mentioning that only a few days ago he was accused of poorly representing two other employees[13] and now here he was in trouble. According to Enright, when this occurred, he told Reed if he felt he needed some additional help, now would be the time to get it. However, Reed's response was they had gone that far and for them to proceed. Reed then read the search form and signed it. Enright denied threatening to have Reed arrested if he did not sign the search form.

Enright denied recalling Reed saying he wanted union representation and stated he only made one request for help.

Assistant Staff Manager Clark substantially corroborated Enright's version of the meeting and denied that Enright threatened to press criminal charges against Reed to obtain a search warrant. While he also denied Reed asked for union representation, he stated that after Enright informed Reed there were allegations made against him in the letter which he wanted to discuss with him, Reed remarked it seemed like a pretty serious matter to him and maybe he needed some representation, where-explained at the hearing he had no recourse but to sign the statement even though it said no threats had been made to force him to sign because they had threatened to have him arrested for a felony or to be taken before the judge.

[13] Reed had earlier represented two employees who were dismissed for misconduct.

upon Enright then asked Reed was he not the union steward there. Under cross-examination Clark further stated that later in the meeting Reed again said he might need some representation, whereupon Enright told him he thought that had been settled and Reed was the union steward there, to which Reed agreed and consented to go on.

According to Clark, Reed also informed them in the meeting he had gotten the used telephone poles from the used pole pile and denied the CB antenna pole was a new pole.

Supervisor Prichard corroborated the testimony of both Enright and Clark in part. However, contrary to their testimony he testified that at the beginning of the meeting, after Enright had informed Reed that allegations had been made against him in an anonymous letter and what the letter said and asked him if any of it was true, Reed responded that it appeared to him that some serious allegations had been made and he might be in some trouble and stated he thought maybe he ought to have union representation in the meeting with him. He then stated Enright asked Reed if he was not the steward for the union complex and when Reed replied he was for the construction work crew, Enright mentioned it was a construction matter and he would like for him to respond to some questions he had pertaining to the letter. According to Prichard, when Enright then asked Reed if he would respond to those questions, Reed said he would. Prichard further stated when Enright sought Reed's permission to search his property Enright told Reed if he felt he needed union representation then would be the time to obtain it but Reed remarked he had gone that far and would not need union representation.

I credit the testimony of Reed concerning what transpired at this meeting rather than that of District Manager Enright, Assistant Staff Manager Clark, and Supervisor Prichard. Apart from my observations of the witnesses, not only did Prichard contradict the testimony of both Enright and Clark about whether Reed specifically requested union representation, but his testimony in this respect supports Reed's version that he did so.[14] Moreover, even the versions of both Enright and Clark that Reed had informed them he wanted some help or needed some representation, to which Enright responded by questioning Reed about his being the union steward, shows they would have been aware that he was seeking union representation.

Following this meeting Assistant Staff Manager Clark and Supervisor Prichard, accompanied by Reed, left the office and first searched Reed's company truck where, according to Clark, they found three screwdrivers marked company property. Reed described them as being old, rusty, and bent.

After searching Reed's company truck they went to the farm where they searched Reed's farm including his home, outbuildings, and his personal vehicles.

Clark described their search of the farm revealed the following: A voltage tester that Reed claimed was obsolete and had been discarded in the trash which Prichard confirmed; a set of hooks used by linemen to climb poles with the leather deteriorated which Reed said had been discarded and Prichard verified; 20 to 30 U-guards with the company emblem which Reed said had been salvaged and used by him to brace fence posts which Clark later observed; a pile of bolts which Clark commented appeared to be good bolts but which Reed said he had gotten from jobs which Prichard confirmed were not used anymore; a vehicle ramp constructed of used telephones which Reed said he had used the truck to drill the holes for; a pile of long telephone poles about 10 feet high which Reed, pursuant to Clark's inquiry, said he had transported there with his boat trailer; and a pole with the antenna which Reed said was used and Prichard inspected and indicated it looked like the identifying remarks had been removed.

According to Reed, he explained to them before searching the farm that he had a lot of company-discarded material there which he had been carrying home for 14 years. He described the bolts and crossarms as being ones which had been used and discarded. Reed stated that, on searching his personal truck, they also found an outdated first aid kit Prichard had given him a long time ago.

Following the search of Reed's property, Clark reported to Enright that same day what they had found. Enright testified Clark showed him the three company screwdrivers which appeared to be good to him and the first aid kit and reported the piles of bolts and U-guards and the discarded voltage tester. Although Reed stated Clark explained to Enright that it was nothing but a bunch of junk, Clark denied having made such statement. Enright testified that after receiving the report, he reiterated that under company policy the use of equipment for one's own personal use was not allowed and questioned Reed about how he had hauled the larger uncut poles and whether he had used the company truck which Reed denied, stating he hauled them on a boat trailer.

Enright, who alone made the decision, testified he then suspended Reed and informed him the reason was the unauthorized use of company vehicles to perform work on his farm, the digging of holes, the setting of poles, and the trimming of trees. Reed acknowledged that, following Clark's report, Enright, who also remarked that the three screwdrivers which had since gone bad but were good when Reed stole them, suspended him indefinitely.

Enright, under cross-examination, testified he suspended Reed for the unauthorized use of company vehicles and the evidence he had at the time consisted of Reed's admissions during the interview about using the trucks and the anonymous letter. However, he also acknowledged he would not have suspended Reed solely on the basis of allegations contained in the anonymous letter. On redirect-examination Enright, on being asked what he considered in suspending Reed, stated it was Reed's admissions to using a post hole digging truck one time and also his belief that the truck had been used on numerous times which was based on what was in existence on Reed's farm, including the fencing he had observed that would have been laborious work to hand dig, and the statements contained in the letter about numerous occasions a truck was used.

[14] The Respondent's counsel in a letter to a Board agent dated March 31, in which it provided a response to the charge in this case, described this interview and stated in pertinent part as follows:

> After the meeting had been in progress for some time, Mr. Reed made a comment to the effect that the matter sounded pretty serious and that maybe he needed some union representation.

The letter further reflects that, after additional questions and answers, Reed also stated, "Maybe I better get some union representation."

Reed's suspension on January 18 was without pay and lasted 2 weeks. According to Enright he had initially decided to suspend Reed for a week; however, after being informed about January 19 or 20 by Donald Cook, who is now the manager of outside construction in Sikeston, Missouri, that Cook had previously suspended Reed for using a company vehicle on company time to go to his farm, he decided on a 2-week suspension period.

Cook, who previously held the position of supervisor of construction and cable splicing and who supervised Reed, testified that in early 1975 he had disciplined Reed and docked his pay for 2-1/2 hours because he and employee Tim Plank had used a company truck and trailer to haul some poles To Reed's house during working hours. He also denied ever giving Reed permission to use company equipment and property to perform work on his farm. Reed, however, denied such an incident occurred involving him and Plank.

After the 2 weeks' suspension was up, Reed returned to work. His return to work was also conditioned on his returning all of the paraphernalia he had carted off which he did return including bolts, poles not in the ground, ground rods, U-guards, crossarms, and the ladder. According to Enright, the ladder was then destroyed in accordance with established company practice.

Reed filed a grievance over his suspension, which was later withdrawn. Warren Stecker, who is the union president, and Bill Konecnik, who is the union chief steward, both testified during the grievance meetings held on Reed's suspension, which were held after he returned to work. Respondent's representatives, Division Manager Dave Nylan and Ken Mayer, informed them Reed was suspended for misuse or unauthorized use of company vehicles which were the two incidents Reed had admitted and they denied that Reed's possession of other company property was part of the suspension. Reed also testified during the first grievance meeting Nylan stated he had been suspended for unauthorized use of company vehicles which involved the two incidents of using company trucks to dig holes and trim trees which he had previously admitted.[15]

C. Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel asserts the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discriminatorily denying Reed's request for union representation during an interview in which he had reasonable cause to believe might result in disciplinary action, and by suspending him as a result of information received from him during the interview after he had requested union representation. Contrary to these assertions, the Respondent denies having violated the Act as alleged or that Reed requested or was denied union representation or was suspended as a result of information obtained from him during the interview.

The Respondent further argues in its brief that the Board should defer to the parties' grievance and arbitration procedures regarding Reed's suspension[16] and also that the Regional Director abused his discretion by refusing to approve a settlement agreement entered into by the Respondent and the Union. Both positions lack merit and are hereby rejected. With respect to the deferral argument, the Board's Collyer[17] doctrine is not applicable in cases involving violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Loomis Courier Service, 235 NLRB 534, 536 (1978), enf. denied on other grounds 595 F.2d 491 (9th Cir. 1979); and General American Transportation Corp., 228 NLRB 808 (1977). Insofar as the settlement agreement is concerned the rights guaranteed under the Act are in the public interest rather than private rights and the Regional Director's refusal to approve a private settlement agreement by two of the parties would not constitute an abuse of his discretion. Schuylkill Metals Corp., 218 NLRB 317, fn. 1 (1975).

Under Section 7 of the Act[18] an employee has the right to have union representation at an investigatory interview which the employee reasonably believes might result in disciplinary action. NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975). The protection accorded employees covers both "investigatory" and "disciplinary" interviews except for those interviews, not applicable here, conducted for the exclusive purpose of notifying an employee of previously determined disciplinary action. Baton Rouge Water Works Co., 246 NLRB 995 (1979). The test for determining whether an employee reasonably believes the interview might result in disciplinary action is measured by objective standards under all the circumstances of the case rather than an employee's subjective motivations. NLRB v. J. Weingarten, cited supra at 257 fn 5. Further, to invoke this protection, the employee must request union representation.

The disciplining of employees as a result of interviews where they are unlawfully prevented from securing the assistance of their union representative is also unlawful. See AnchorTank, Inc., 239 NLRB 430, 431 (1978), enfd. in part and denied in part, 618 F.2d 1153 (5th Cir. 1980). Where an employer conducts an investigatory interview in violation of an employee's Weingarten rights and that employee is disciplined for conduct which was the subject of the unlawful interview, the appropriate remedy is a make-whole remedy unless the employer can demonstrate that its decision to discipline that employee was not based on information obtained at the unlawful interview. Kraft Foods Inc., 251 NLRB 598 (1980).

The findings supra establish that on January 18 Reed was notified to attend a meeting held at the Respondent's office by Respondent supervisory personnel District Manager Enright, Assistant Staff Manager of Security Clark, and his immediate supervisor, Supervisor Prichard. Enright began this meeting by questioning Reed whether he had ever used the company trucks to trim his trees at his house. When Reed responded by saying he thought he was in trouble and he needed union representation, Enright ignored his request by informing Reed that Reed was the union steward and that should be good enough and then continued to question Reed about whether he had trimmed his trees with company trucks, and used company trucks to dig holes on his property and other matters which Reed had been accused of doing in an anonymous letter regarding the misuse of company property and equipment by Reed. Later during the interview, when Reed repeated that he needed union representation, Enright again ignored his request by indicating Reed was the union steward and continued with his questioning of Reed. After having questioned Reed about his use of company equipment and property during which Reed, after his initial request for union representation had been denied, admitted having used a company basket truck on one occasion 2-1/2 years ago to trim trees on his property and using the company post hole digging truck on another occasion 8 to 10 years ago to place two posts in a vehicle ramp he built on his property, Enright attempted to have Reed sign a consent form to permit them to search Reed's vehicles and property. Although at that point, when Reed again renewed his request for union representation, Enright said he would give him a minute to get his union representative there, Reed went ahead and signed the form because there was no telephone in the room and he did not see how he could get a representative there that fast.

That same day, following a search of Reed's vehicles and property, he was suspended without pay and his suspension lasted 2 weeks. This suspension, according to Enright's own testimony, as well as statements made by the Respondent's representatives to Reed and the Union's representatives during grievance meetings concerning Reed's suspension was based on Reed's admissions during the January 18 interview that he had used the company's trucks on the two occasions related by him to perform work on his property. These admissions occurred during the interview after he had first requested and been denied union representation.

The evidence further shows that Reed, at the time he requested union representation at the January 18 interview, he had more than reasonable cause to believe the interview might result in disciplinary action being taken against him. This was because under company policy, of which Reed had knowledge, the use of company property for personal benefit or improper purposes could lead to disciplinary action, dismissal, or prosecution. When Enright began the conversation by questioning him at the office, where disciplinary meetings had been held, in the presence of two supervisors about whether he had ever used company trucks to trim his trees at his house, his supervisor, Prichard, who he said had given him permission, gave him a shrug like he did not know anything about it, which led Reed to believe he was in trouble and he so expressed himself during the interview at the time he made the request.

Based on this evidence, and for those reasons discussed and applying the applicable law, I am persuaded and find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by denying Reed's request for union representation at an investigatory interview he reasonably believed might result in disciplinary action against him and by suspending Reed for 2 weeks without pay which resulted from this unlawful interview.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Southwestern Bell Telephone Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Communications Workers of America, AFL–CIO, Local 6310 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By requiring that Daniel Reed participate in employer investigatory interviews without union representation, which had been requested by Reed and had been refused by the Respondent, when Reed had reasonable grounds to believe that the matters to be discussed might result in their being the subject of disciplinary action and actually imposing such disciplinary action on Reed by suspending him on January 18, 1983, for 2 weeks, without pay, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Accordingly, having found that the Respondent after denying Reed his Weingarten rights, suspended him for 2 weeks, without pay, based on information obtained from him at the unlawful interview itself, I shall order that the unlawful suspension be rescinded and all references to the suspension be expunged from his records and that he be so notified and that he be made whole for any loss of pay he suffered as a result of this unlawful suspension, with payment of interest [illegible] in the manner prescribed by Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[19]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[20]

ORDER

The Respondent, Southwestern Bell Telephone Company, Union, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Requiring its employees to participate in employer interviews or meetings without union representation where such representation has been requested and refused by the Respondent, when the employees have reasonable grounds to believe that the matters to be discussed may result in their being the subject of disciplinary action and actually suspend or impose such disciplinary action on its employees.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind the January 18, 1983 2-week suspension, without pay, of Daniel Reed and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the suspension with the payment of interest in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Expunge from its files all references to the suspension of Daniel Reed on January 18, 1983, and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful suspension will not be used as the basis for future personnel actions against him.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Union, Missouri facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges unfair labor practices not specifically found herein.

[20] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 4 November 1983 Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the administrative law judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

We agree with the judge's findings regarding the Respondent's failure to provide relevant material to the Union and its refusal to meet to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement. With regard to the Respondent's failure to supply relevant information, we note the following. On 3 March 1983 the union president wrote to the Respondent's counsel Robert Scolnik requesting, inter alia, wage and hour data for the 12 bargaining unit employees employed by the Respondent at its Seattle, Washington store. The information was requested by the Union under its newly acquired obligation to negotiate a bargaining agreement for these employees. In his first letter of response, Scolnik indicated he had referred the request to company headquarters. In his second letter he made no reference to the information request. In his third letter, mailed a month after the initial request for information, Scolnik offered to make the information available for inspection and copying at its payroll headquarters in Sacramento, California. Alternatively he suggested that the Respondent would compile the information and make copies of documents "at the Union's expense for clerical and administrative time and copying time expenses." This offer by the Respondent to make copies was conditioned on the Union paying copying and administrative expenses in advance, yet the cost of these expenses was not disclosed. The Union was therefore expected to commit itself in advance to paying an undisclosed amount for copying and administrative fees. If the Respondent were serious about sending the information, at the very least it would have said what the charges would be per page for copying and what the administrative fees would be based on an hourly rate so that the Union would have some objective basis on which to render a decision.

Our dissenting colleague cites United Aircraft Corp.[2] for the proposition that the union is obligated to pay for the expenses related to compiling the request information. The law is not so clearcut as the dissent would make it. Although in the cited case the union was obligated to pay, the information request there was extensive and the expenses amounted to over $50,000. Here, the Union requested information such as the names, addresses, and job classifications of only 12 employees, and their wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. The information sought was basic and encompassed matters which employers are required to provide to enable unions to bargain intelligently and to fulfill their obligations as the selected representative of the employer's employees.[3] The cost and burden of compliance ordinarily will not justify an initial, categorical refusal to supply relevant data.[4] "If there are substantial costs involved in compiling the information in the precise form at the intervals requested by the Union, the parties must bargain in good faith as to who shall bear such costs . . . ."[5] The Respondent expressed no willingness to bargain about costs. Additionally, the onus is on the Respondent to show that production of the data would be unduly burdensome. There is nothing in the record to substantiate such a claim. On the contrary, it can be inferred from the Respondent's failure to produce evidence of substantial cost in response to the Union's claim that the cost would be "de minimis," that the costs for compiling basic information on only 12 employees was indeed negligible. Mindful that each case

[1] Although we agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent attempted to construct artificial barriers around the bargaining process, in reaching our conclusion we disavow reliance on his determination that the Respondent conditioned bargaining on satisfaction of a lawsuit.

NLRB*, 644 F.2d 923 (1st Cir. 1981), another case cited by the dissent for the proposition that photocopying costs are to be borne by the union, it is significant to note that the union itself requested to pay the photocopying costs, which it had calculated would cost 10 cents a page. Rather than sanction an arbitrary figure, the Board ordered that the parties bargain over the reasonable cost.

[4] See Electrical Workers IUE v. NLRB, 648 F.2d 18 at 26 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

[5] Food Employers Council, 197 NLRB 651 (1972). Contrary to the assertion of our dissenting colleague, this case indicates that there is indeed a sound basis in the law for the Union's request that the Respondent demonstrate a burdensome financial impact before the Union would discuss costs.

of what constitutes good-faith bargaining must turn on its particular facts, it is clear that the Respondent's refusal to supply the information—while neither justifying its request for costs nor offering to bargain over the matter—was unreasonable. A lack of good faith can be inferred therefrom.

The Respondent's underlying motive was to forestall sending the requested information and thereby forestall actual negotiation until it knew what the bargaining chips were going to be. A recurring theme throughout the Respondent's correspondence was its request that the Union submit its initial contract proposals in advance. In his fourth letter to the Union, the Respondent's counsel declared,

> If . . . the Union is really desirous of bargaining, then I suggest you put the cards face up on the table and send me your written contract proposals so that the Company can see what is really involved here—in terms of the real substance—and see what the prospects are. If we are in the same ballpark, some telephone conversations, some exchanges of contract language, some correspondence, etc. will most likely be sufficient to wrap it up. Why play games? Why not get down to the guts of the matter? . . . . But why not get it out into the open? Put the real substantive issues on the table, instead of horsing around. If we can make a "deal" (in the honorable sense of the word, of course), we can do it by phone in short order, provided that we get started.

This letter speaks for itself as to the Respondent's recalcitrant reluctance to send the requested information. Thus, the judge was warranted in finding that the Respondent's insistence on advance payment for the requested information was a "phony issue."

The second issue is whether the Respondent unlawfully refused to meet with the Union to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement. The judge's rationale for discounting the Respondent's good faith is supported by the record. Since the affected employees and Union were located in Seattle, Washington, the Respondent's headquarters office and wage data were located in Sacramento, California, and the Respondent's attorney was located in San Francisco, California, it is clear that some travel might be involved in order to negotiate effectively a collective-bargaining agreement. By the mere fact that the Respondent suggested meeting halfway between Seattle and Sacramento (or San Francisco) at some undesignated location entirely unrelated to any of the parties it has in essence conceded that negotiations could in fact take place away from headquarters or the Respondent's counsel office. As noted by the dissent, "the record contains no evidence as to the extent to which Respondent's headquarters otherwise controls or deals with business matters arising within its Seattle store." If there were any overriding reason compelling negotiations to take place in Sacramento, the Respondent surely would have come forward with such a justification in its correspondence. Its failure to do so calls into question its intransigent insistence in refusing to consider negotiations in Seattle. Under these circumstances, the Respondent refused to make a reasonable and sincere effort to meet and confer with the certified representative of its employees. Applicable here is the court's observation in NLRB v. P. Lorillard Co:[6]

> The collective bargaining features of the statute cannot be made effective unless employer and employees cooperate in the give and take of personal conferences . . . the employer must make his representatives available for conferences at the plant where the controversy is in progress, and at reasonable times and places, so that personnel negotiations are practicable. [Emphasis added.]

The Board also has found that employers have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) when an employer has refused to meet near the locale of the represented employees.[7] The conditioning of the commencement of contract discussions on the Union's willingness to meet at a place over 700 miles from the store and employees involved does not meet the statutory test of good-faith bargaining.[8]

Finally, we disagree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated the Act by making pay adjustments in May 1983 without negotiating with the Union. The Respondent had a prior practice of granting regular periodic automatic and merit increases. In November 1982, the Union sent the Respondent a letter specifically requesting that it continue its past practice of wage increases and Christmas bonuses, and promising not to file unfair labor practice charges.

Contrary to the assertion made by the dissent, we do not, by any means, advocate a per se approach to deciding where bargaining should take place. Nor does Semperit Pacific, supra, stand for such a proposition. We have considered all the relevant circumstances bearing on the issue in this case and have concluded that all the factors, taken as a whole, lead to the conclusion that the Respondent was not bargaining in good faith, but was merely using this issue as a stratagem to delay or avoid bargaining.

In good-faith reliance on this request and representation, the Respondent granted May wage increases. Although the certification was issued in February 1983 thereby activating, under normal circumstances, the obligation to bargain about wage adjustments, the Union here specifically requested that the Respondent continue its past wage practices. This request was open ended, with no time limits specified, implying that the Respondent would be free to make these adjustments until a collective-bargaining agreement was reached. Under these circumstances we find that the Respondent's unilateral action, taken in reliance on the Union's representation, was lawful and not violative of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Queen Anne Record Sales, Inc. d/b/a Tower Books, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Delete paragaph 1(c) and reletter the remaining paragraph.

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.[9]

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

I agree with my colleagues' conclusion that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by making pay adjustments in May 1983 without negotiating with the Union. However, I cannot agree to adopt the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated the Act by failing to provide information to the Union and refusing to meet to negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement. In my judgment, the evidence favors a conclusion that the Respondent did not act unlawfully in its dealings with the Union.

The Respondent operates approximately 50 stores in various States and has its headquarters in Sacramento, California. On 7 February 1983[1] the Union was certified by the Board as the exclusive representative of the employees located at the Respondent's Mercer Street, Seattle, Washington store. On 3 March the Union, also located in Seattle, wrote to the Respondent's counsel in San Francisco, California, requesting certain information as to unit employees. This information included employees' names, job classifications, dates of hire, rates of pay, dates and amounts of lost wage increases, average number of hours worked during the previous 3-month period, and health insurance and retirement benefits. On 9 March the Respondent's counsel informed the Union that its request was being transmitted to the Respondent's headquarters where both the Respondent's labor relations offices and the requested information were located. On 15 March the Union acknowledged this response and requested that the data be provided no later than 24 March.

On 21 March the Respondent's counsel informed the Union that the Respondent considered the Board's certification to be invalid and that the Respondent was considering whether to "appeal" the certification by refusing to bargain. Noting that its negotiators were located in Sacramento, the Respondent's counsel referred to the expenses involved in either challenging the Board's certification through the Federal courts or bargaining in Seattle, Washington. He informed the Union that, as a matter of good-faith compromise, the Respondent would forgo a legal battle over the certification if a mutually satisfactory agreement could be worked out as to the time, place, and extent of negotiations. Toward that end, the Respondent's counsel proposed that negotiations be held either in Sacramento or San Francisco. He further noted since a great deal of the negotiating could be accomplished by the exchange of written proposals, revisions, and drafts, and in view of the geographical separation of the principals, face-to-face meetings on a monthly basis seemed appropriate and reasonable. The Respondent's counsel stated that he would give full consideration to any counterproposals the Union would offer and suggested that the Union might propose alternating negotiations between Seattle and Sacramento (or San Francisco), or conducting negotiations at a convenient place halfway between these cities. The letter invited the Union to contact the Respondent if it were interested in working out a mutually agreeable system of conducting negotiations in lieu of further litigation.

On 8 April the Union replied to the Respondent's letter, saying that the Union did not have the resources to meet with the Respondent in California and that the Respondent's proposal appeared to be an effort to frustrate bargaining. The Union proposed that the parties meeting "marathon" negotiations and offered to pick up the Respondent's negotiators at the Seattle airport. The Union also renewed its request for information.

On the same date the Union prepared the foregoing response, the Respondent's counsel wrote to the Union offering to provide the information requested in the Union's 3 March letter by making it available for inspection and copying at its payroll and labor relations office in Sacramento. He added that, as a gesture of good faith and, if the Union wished, the Respondent would compile the information and make copies of relevant documents and records but that the Union would be required to pay for the copying and administrative expenses in advance. The Respondent also noted that it had not yet received a response from the Union as to its 21 March letter and that the Respondent was anxious to move ahead on its decision regarding negotiations and needed the Union's position in a timely fashion.

On 15 April the Union replied to the Respondent's 8 April letter. The Union contended that as the monetary impact of providing the information was "de minimis," the administrative costs should be borne by the Respondent. The Union further contended that it had a fundamental right to the information regardless of cost, but that if the Respondent would provide "clear and convincing evidence" that the request would impose substantial financial impact, the Union would consider sharing the expenses.

On 23 April the Respondent wrote the Union rejecting its 8 April counterproposal as to the meeting place for negotiations and the concept of "marathon" negotiations. The Respondent proposed monthly meetings starting at 9:30 a.m., with a 2-hour caucus for lunch and review of documents, and concluding at 5 p.m. The Respondent offered to consider further proposals from the Union on these matters and suggested that the Union submit a contract proposal by mail which the parties could negotiate telephonically or by mail.

On 12 May the Union wrote to the Respondent expressing astonishment that the Respondent would not come to Seattle to negotiate. The Respondent replied on 17 May reaffirming its previous positions and emphasizing once more that it was not insisting on any particular proposal and had tried to remain as flexible as possible in its approach to negotiations. On 20 May the Union replied indicating that the Respondent's positions as to providing information and meeting in California were totally inappropriate. The Union said that negotiations by telephone were "terribly inconvenient" and that the Respondent should meet in Seattle as a show of good faith.

On these facts the judge concluded that the Respondent acted in bad faith in failing to provide information to the Union and in refusing to agree to negotiate in Seattle, Washington. In so doing, the judge concluded that the information requested by the Union and not provided by the Respondent was relevant and necessary to the Union's role as bargaining agent. The judge concluded that the Respondent's insistence on advance payment before supplying the information was a "phony issue," saying "whether or not the Union is obligated to pay for such information, Respondent never advised the Union how much the billing would be, despite a suggestion from a Union official that it would consider paying for the information if [Respondent's attorney] would do so." In addition, the judge concluded that the Respondent had unlawfully conditioned bargaining by agreeing to forgo a test of the Board's certification of the Union if the Union would meet in California, and had approached bargaining in bad faith by arbitrarily refusing to meet in Seattle. In the latter regard, the judge noted that the Respondent's suggestion that the parties meet at a location between Sacramento and Seattle was "preposterous," and revealed its lack of sincerity, as did the Respondent's suggestion that the Union provide it with an initial written contract proposal while at the same time refusing to supply information needed for bargaining. Because I believe that the judge misapplied both the facts and the governing law in reaching his conclusions, I would reverse the judge and dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

At the outset, I would note that the record here contains no evidence or suggestion that the Respondent delegated bargaining authority or misrepresented the location of its labor relations functions or information in an effort to impede bargaining. Thus, we are faced with a situation where preexisting circumstances have created a geographical separation between the principals involved in collective bargaining and the information relevant to the bargaining process. Moreover, the record contains no evidence as to the extent to which the Respondent's headquarters otherwise controls or deals with business matters arising within its Seattle store, or the nature of communications between the two.

While the judge found it unnecessary to decide whether the Union was obligated to pay for the information requested by it, the law is clear that the Union was so obligated. In United Aircraft Corp., 192 NLRB 382 (1971), enfd. in relevant part 534 F.2d 422 (2d Cir. 1975), the Board examined a contention that the employer, who was willing to allow the union access to its records, nonetheless violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to prepare at its own cost certain reports and information requested by the union. In rejecting the contention the Board said:

> An employer, if it is to fulfill its bargaining obligation under Section 8(a)(5), is required to furnish relevant information requested by the employee representative. But it does not follow that the union is entitled to such information in the exact form or on the exact terms requested. "It is sufficient if the information is made available in a manner not so burdensome or time-consuming as to impede the process of bargaining." "Good-faith bargaining requires only that such information be made available at a reasonable time and in a reasonable place and with an opportunity for the Union to make a copy of such information if it so desires." These are the terms upon which Respondent generally offered to make available the information requested by the Unions. Respondent was not required to duplicate or conform its records, at its own cost, for the convenience of the Unions. [192 NLRB at 389, footnotes and citations omitted.]

In addition, in American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 250 NLRB 47 (1980), enfd. sub nom. Communications Workers Local 1051 v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 923 (1st Cir. 1981), the Board was faced with the issue of whether the employer was required to furnish photocopies of documents requested by the union. While agreeing with the judge that absent unusual circumstances the employer was so required, the Board stated (250 NLRB at 47 fn. 2):

> We further note that the Administrative Law Judge ordered that Respondent furnish the photocopies to the Union "at a rate of no more than 10 cents a photocopy page." We shall modify this portion of the recommended Order to order Respondent to provide, or allow the Union to make, the photocopies, and to bargain over the reasonable additional costs to the Employer for furnishing the requested information. The reasonable additional costs shall be assumed by the Union. [Emphasis added.]

The foregoing cases make clear that an employer is not required to absorb the expenses of compiling and photocopying information and will not be found to violate Section 8(a)(5) so long as it acts reasonably in attempting to make relevant information available to the Union. In the instant case the judge concluded that the Respondent acted in bad faith because it failed to advise the Union how much the billing would be, despite the Union's suggestion that it would consider paying for the information if the Respondent did so. The judge's conclusion misstates the facts. The record reveals that the Respondent offered to make its records available to the Union in Sacramento, or to compile and forward the information if the Union would agree to pay the costs. The Union did not indicate a willingness to consider the Respondent's offer, but replied instead that it had a fundamental right to the information and that the Respondent should bear the costs of compiling the information unless it could demonstrate by "clear and convincing evidence" that the compilation process involved "substantial and/or burdensome financial impact," whereupon the Union would consider sharing the expenses. Under no construction of these facts can the Union be said to have indicated a willingness to consider paying the costs if informed of such by the Respondent. Moreover, there is no basis in the law for the Union to require that the Respondent demonstrate burdensome financial impact by clear and convincing evidence before the Union would discuss costs.[2] Accordingly, I would find that it was the Union's intransigence and not a lack of good faith which caused the Respondent to refuse to supply the information to the Union and I would therefore dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

Similarly, the judge relied on an erroneous construction of the facts to conclude that the Respondent refused to meet and negotiate with the Union. The complaint in the instant case alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act and that since 9 March 1963 it has refused to meet and bargain with the Union near the locale of [2] Food Employers Council, 197 NLRB 651 (1972), does not support the majority's contrary conclusion. In that case, the employer flatly refused to provide information requested by the union. The Board found a violation but noted that the employer had at an earlier time furnished some of the requested information to the union, albeit in a form other than desired by the union. The Board further noted the unsupported assertion of each party that an onerous burden would be placed on it should the Board require production of the requested information in a form desired by the adverse party. Unable to make a judgment on this issue, the Board ordered the parties to bargain "if there are substantial costs involved in compiling the information in the precise form and at the intervals requested by the Union." The Board added, however, "if no agreement can be reached, the Union is entitled in any event to access to records from which it can reasonably compile the information" (citations omitted). Id. at 651. Thus, even in the remedial posture of the case, the Board declined to require that the employer bear the costs of producing information, including that categorically denied the union. The existing law clearly permits an employer to unilaterally shift to the union the financial burden of compiling and reproducing information by allowing access to records from which the requested information may be gathered. Cincinnati Steel Castings Co., 86 NLRB 592, 593 (1949). Where circumstances are such that access to an employer's records will not reasonably satisfy the union's needs, an employer may be required to compile or photocopy information, but the union must bear the reasonable costs involved. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., supra; United Aircraft Corp., supra. In the instant case, the Respondent offered the Union access to its records, located in Sacramento, and offered to compile and forward information to the Union, if it preferred, on payment of costs. There is no indication that the Respondent's offer contemplated other than reasonable costs in this regard. Assuming that the Union's needs could not reasonably be met by access to records, located in Sacramento, it was obliged to bear the reasonable costs of the Respondent in compiling the information and forwarding it to Seattle.

the unit. In adopting the judge's conclusion, my colleagues expressly disavow reliance on his determination that "Respondent conditioned bargaining on satisfaction of a lawsuit." Presumably, this is a reference to the judge's conclusion that the Respondent conditioned a waiver of its right to contest the Board's certification of the Union, on the Union's agreement to meet in California. I agree with my colleagues that the Respondent did not condition bargaining on such a waiver, but I disagree that the evidence otherwise supports the finding of a violation.

In its communications to the Union, the Respondent made it clear that it was concerned with the high costs associated with conducting extensive face-to-face negotiations in Seattle, when the Respondent's negotiators were located in Sacramento. It proposed that all negotiation meetings be conducted in Sacramento and added:

> The Company will appreciate your response in the same (good faith) spirit and will give full and serious consideration to any and all counterproposals you wish to make. For example, you may feel that the location of negotiation meetings should be alternated, one time in Sacramento (or San Francisco), and the next time in Seattle. Or, you may feel that a better solution would be to meet at some convenient place halfway in between Seattle and Sacramento (or San Francisco). Or you may have some other proposal or proposals.

In addition, the Respondent informed the Union of its belief that the parties could reasonably conduct negotiations through a combination of written exchanges and face-to-face sessions:

> [T]he Company would like to know what proposals you wish to make concerning the frequency of meetings and the time periods for each meeting. Since a great deal can be accomplished by the submission of written contract proposals, counterproposals, revisions, drafts, etc., and in view of the distances involved, meetings once a month seem appropriate and reasonable as a general plan, subject to change by mutual agreement depending on the particular circumstances.
> Likewise, in view of the distances, scheduling each meeting for 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. (with an adequate lunch period for conferring, preparation, etc.) seems appropriate and reasonable, subject, again, to change by mutual agreement depending on particular circumstances.

At a later point, the Respondent urged the Union to begin the negotiation process by submitting a contract proposal by mail, which could have been further discussed by the parties telephonically, or by mail. At the same time, the Respondent indicated a willingness to consider any other proposals the Union would advance. For its part, the Union adhered to its position that the Respondent should agree to negotiate in Seattle, and that its refusal to supply the information requested by the Union made submission of bargaining proposals impossible.

The judge found that the Respondent's only contention in regard to the site for negotiations was that it would be "inconvenient" to negotiate in Seattle because the Company's records were in Sacramento. In addition, the judge found that the Respondent's suggested counterproposal of negotiating in a location between Seattle and Sacramento was "preposterous," and that the Respondent disingenuously contended that the Union's failure to provide an initial proposal prevented negotiations from beginning inasmuch as the Respondent refused to provide the Union with information necessary to construction of such proposal.

Without regard to whether the Union's refusal to submit an initial contract proposal is of significance in this case, for the reasons indicated above, I would not find that the Respondent unlawfully refused to provide information to the Union and do not believe the judge could rely on this allegation in support of his conclusion here. Further, the judge's rationale for otherwise discounting the Respondent's good faith is not supported by the record. As the facts above reveal, the Respondent immediately and clearly expressed its concerns over the financial impact of extended negotiations in Seattle and indicated its belief that great progress could be made through a procedure combining mail and face-to-face negotiations. In addition, there is absolutely no evidence on the record to support the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's suggestion of possible negotiations at a location between Seattle and Sacramento was not a viable alternative in terms of convenience or cost. Rather, it appears a literal attempt to meet the Union halfway. Finally, there is no evidence that the Respondent failed or refused to promptly and directly address itself to the Union's communications, or engaged in any other conduct which would support a finding that the Respondent refused to bargain in good faith. In these circumstances, I find that the Respondent could lawfully refuse to agree to the Union's proposal, as Section 8(d) of the Act does not require that it concede its position in negotiations.[3] As the Respondent was at all times willing to negotiate with the Union, I would dismiss this allegation of the complaint as well.

[3] I agree that an employer may violate Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain near the locale of the represented employees. However, unlike my colleagues, I am not willing to adopt the per se approach found in Semperit Pacific, 237 NLRB 478 (1978). Whether an employer's conduct constitutes a refusal to bargain in good faith is a matter which requires consideration of all relevant circumstances bearing on the issue. Rhodes-Holland Chevrolet Co., 146 NLRB 1304 (1964). In addition, Sec. 8(d) of the Act allows the parties discretion to seek the most advantageous bargain while also prohibiting the Board from requiring concessions in negotiations. Thus, the parties should be given considerable leeway in reasonably pursuing bargaining arrangements favorable to their respective interests. In the instant case, the Respondent had a reasonable basis for pursuing negotiations in locations other than Seattle. Over a relatively brief period, the Respondent sought the Union's agreement to negotiate in Sacramento, or to alternate negotiations between Sacramento and Seattle. The Respondent also expressed its willingness to consider other arrangements proposed by the Union and offered alternatives for the Union's consideration. While the Union rejected the Respondent's proposals, it was not prepared to begin negotiations until the Respondent provided information requested by the Union, and I have found above that the Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to provide the information. Under the circumstances, I do not find that the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain near the locale of the represented employees.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with the Union certified as the exclusive representative of employees at our store located on Mercer Street in Seattle, Washington.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with that Union, Retail Store Employees Local 1001, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO by refusing to supply it with wage and personnel data relevant to collective bargaining.

WE WILL NOT refuse to meet with the Union in or near Seattle to engage in good-faith collective bargaining in the appropriate unit.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL immediately supply to the Union the wage and personnel data sought by it on 3 March 1983.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All employees employed at the Respondent's facility located at 20 Mercer Street, Seattle, Washington, excluding all office clerical employees, deposit clerks, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

QUEEN ANNE RECORD SALES, INC.
D/B/A TOWER BOOKS

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES M. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. On June 6, 1983, the Acting Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board for Region 19 issued a consolidated complaint accusing Queene Anne Record Sales, Inc. d/b/a Tower Books (Respondent) of having violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). It is based on charges filed on April 4 and May 19, 1983, by Retail Store Employees Union Local 1001, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO (the Union). Although an answer was filed to the consolidated complaint, the parties on August 17–19 executed a stipulation of facts in lieu of hearing in which they agreed that there are no disputed issues of fact, waived a hearing, and further stipulated that the case be decided on the stipulations of fact as supplemented by the formal papers. Thereafter the General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs which have been carefully considered.

Issues

Whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by: (1) failing to provide the Union with material relevant to collective bargaining; (2) refusing to meet with union representatives for the purpose of negotiating a collective-bargaining contract; and (3) unilaterally, and without notice to the Union, making certain pay rate changes or whether the Union waived its right to complain of such changes.

Pursuant to the stipulation I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER

Respondent is a wholly-owned subsidiary of MTS, Incorporated, a California corporation headquartered in Sacramento, California, and from which it operates approximately 50 stores in California, Washington, Oregon, Nevada, Arizona, Hawaii, and New York. During the past 12 months, a representative period, Respondent's gross sales of goods and services exceeded $500,000 and during the same period it purchased and caused to be transferred and delivered to its facilities within the State of Washington goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from sources outside the State. The parties agree, therefore, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The parties stipulate, and I find, that the Union is and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The store in question is located on Mercer Street in Seattle, Washington. On January 15, 1982, the Board conducted a representation election among the employees at that store. Due to challenged ballots the results of the election were indeterminative. Thereafter Respondent filed objections to the Union's conduct affecting the outcome of the election. Later a hearing was held on February 11, 1982, to resolve challenged ballots and objections. The hearing officer issued a report on March 5 and on July 16 the Board directed the opening of one of the ballots. Respondent filed a motion for reconsideration which was denied on September 9. The challenged ballot was opened on September 20 and a revised tally issued that day showing that five employees had voted for union representation with four against. Respondent then filed an additional objection to the conduct of the election with respect to the marking of the opened ballot. The Regional Director issued a report recommending that the objection be overruled; Respondent again excepted. Finally, on February 7, 1983, the Board issued its decision and certification of representative in the agreed-upon unit.[1]

B. The Refusal to Supply Information

On March 3, 1983, approximately 3 weeks after the certification of representative was issued, the Union's president, Steve Gouras, wrote Respondent's counsel, Robert J. Scolnik, advising him of the Union's desire to negotiate a labor agreement. He asked for the following information so that he could prepare for negotiations: The name of each bargaining unit employee, his or her job classification, hire date, rate of pay, date, and amounts of last wage increase, average number of hours worked in the last 3 months and copies of "health insurance or retirement benefits available to your bargaining unit employees."

On March 9, Respondent's counsel stated that all of the information which the Union sought was located in Respondent's Sacramento headquarters and that he was transmitting the request to the appropriate officials there. On March 15, another union official, Grievance Director Fred Rosenberry, wrote Scolnik acknowledging the response and asking that the material be provided no later than March 24.

By letter of March 21, Scolnik advised the Union of his client's position. Although he raised a number of matters which will be discussed in the section of this decision dealing with the refusal to meet, section III, C, infra, he did not transmit any of the information which the Union sought. By letter dated April 8 Rosenberry again sought the material. Also by letter dated April 8 Scolnik wrote the Union offering to provide the information to the Union by making it available for inspection and copying at its payroll and labor relations office in Sacramento. He said as a "gesture of good faith" the Company, if the Union wished, would compile the information and make copies of the documents and records but that the Union must pay for the copying and administrative expenses in advance. He did not suggest what the cost would be.

By letter dated April 15, another union official, Louis T. Spignesi, asserted to Scolnik that the monetary impact of providing the information was "de minimis" at best and that the administrative costs should be borne by the Employer. Although he contended the Union had a "fundamental right" to the information regardless of cost, he said Respondent would provide "clear and convincing evidence" that the request would impose "substantial and/or burdensome financial impact," the Union would consider sharing the expenses.

By letter dated April 20, Scolnik asserted the Union was refusing to come to Sacramento and refusing to bear the cost for assembling and sending the information. He said assuming he was correct, the parties were "at an impasse concerning these procedural issues," i.e., both the information request and other matters. He suggested the reason implied in the Union's April 8 and 15 letters for refusing to accept or consider the Company's "proposal" was "the Union's claimed inability to pay." He then demanded a large amount of financial data from the Union. However, he did not transmit any of the material sought. By letter dated May 12, Rosenberry advised Scolnik the Union still needed the information listed in Gouras' March 3 letter. In his reply of May 17, Scolnik said Respondent "specifically reaffirms its position with respect to the information you have requested." He referred to his April 8 and 20 letters. He said, "We seem to be in an impasse on that subject as well."

One of the themes which is found throughout Scolnik's letters is that before agreeing to meet with the union officials, the Union should provide him with its initial contract proposals. The Union's standard reply in each case was that to formulate an initial proposal it needed the information sought in its March 3 letter. At no time did Respondent ever provide the information; neither did it tell the Union the nature of the work needed to assemble it or its cost.

[1] Although Respondent argues to me that it was an error for the Board to have issued the certification, I am bound by the Board's action and do not consider any attack on it.

The Supreme Court has consistently held that Section 8(d) of the Act imposes an affirmative duty on an employer to supply the union with information relevant to collective bargaining. A breach of that duty is a violation of Section 8(a)(5). See NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979). Furthermore, it has long been held that wage data is presumptively relevant to collective bargaining. Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61 (3d Cir. 1965). Indeed, the underlying Board decision in Curtiss-Wright, 145 NLRB 152, 157 (1963), clearly holds that there is a presumption of relevance when the sought-for data covers employees in the bargaining unit, as it does here. Thus the Union seeks the names of unit employees, their job classifications, dates of their hire (i.e., seniority, their pay rates, the amount of their last pay increase, the average number of hours worked in the most recent 3-month period and copies of the health and pension plans available to them. Respondent has made no effort to rebut the presumption of relevance.

Moreover, the case law is contrary to Respondent here. The Board decision in Curtiss-Wright, supra, specifically dealt with a similar refusal to turn over job classification data and wage information. Indeed wage histories were early required to be divulged. Aluminum Ore Co. v. NLRB, 131 F.2d 485, 487 (7th Cir. 1942). Both the request for the last pay increase and the average number of hours worked fall into that category. Moreover, health and retirement plan information have also been deemed relevant whether as wages or as a term and condition of employment. NLRB v. Feed & Supply Center, 294 F.2d 650 (9th Cir. 1961). Finally, although mentioned first by the union, the names of the unit employees must be disclosed to permit the union to perform its statutory duty of representation. Magma Copper Co., 208 NLRB 329 (1974). See also Harvey's Wagon Wheel, 236 NLRB 1670 (1978).

The simple fact is Respondent never supplied any of the information. Its only advance reason for refusing to do so was that it wished reimbursement, in advance, for the cost of providing it. Whether or not the Union is obligated to pay for such information, Respondent never advised the Union how much the billing would be, despite a suggestion from a union official that it would consider paying for the information if Scolnik would do so. Scolnik never did.

I hold that Section 8(d) of the Act obligated Respondent to provide the information sought in the March 3 letter and that by failing to do so it violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. I also find Scolnik's insistence on advance payment without advice regarding the actual cost to be, simply put, a phony issue. If it had been a legitimate issue he would have, at the very least, given the Union some sort of means of estimating the cost. Moreover, it seems likely that all the information would have been at the fingertips of either the personnel or payroll offices and easy to marshal.

C. The Refusal to Meet

In his letter of March 15, Union Grievance Director Rosenberry had asked that the wage data be provided by March 24. Scolnik in his reply of March 21 responded that the Board certification was "invalid." He pointed out that Respondent was considering appealing the certification by refusing to bargain, the standard manner by which Board certifications are challenged. He then compared the expense of litigating that question with the expense of negotiating a contract in Seattle observing that the appropriate company officials were located in Sacramento. He asserted:

> The company is willing, as a matter of good faith compromise of a dispute concerning the validity of the NLRB's decision and certification, to waive its rights to challenge that decision and certification and to go through the various legal steps and procedures leading to judicial review in the United States Court of Appeals, if a mutually satisfactory arrangement can be worked out with your union concerning the time and place of negotiation meetings and frequency and extent of such meetings.

Supposedly attempting to work out such an arrangement, Scolnik proposed "all" negotiations be conducted either in Sacramento or San Francisco. He said he would "give full and serious consideration to any and all counter-proposals [the Union wished] to make." He suggested the Union might wish to propose alternating the California cities with Seattle or some "convenient place half-way between Seattle and Sacramento (or San Francisco)." (Parenthesis in original.) He also wanted to know what the Union proposed with respect to the frequency of the meetings and the time period for each meeting. He said, "Since a great deal can be accomplished by the submission of written contract proposals, counter-proposals, revisions, drafts, etc., in view of the distances involved, meetings once a month seem appropriate and reasonable as a general plan . . . ." (Emphasis supplied.) He also suggested meetings take place from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. with an adequate lunch period for conferring, preparation, etc.

He concluded saying, "If you are interested in working out a mutually agreeable system of conducting bargaining negotiations, in lieu of further litigation, please let me know." (Emphasis added.) Rosenberry replied by letter of April 8, saying the Union did not have the resources to meet with Respondent in California. He also said Scolnik's proposal appeared to be an effort to frustrate the bargaining process. Even so, Rosenberry offered to pick up the Employer's representatives at the Seattle airport. With respect to the frequency of meetings, Rosenberry suggested "marathon negotiations" and observed that bargaining should be a relatively easy process since the store was less than a mile from the Union's office.

Scolnik's April 8 letter stated his client was "anxious to make a decision concerning collective bargaining negotiations." He said that no decision had been made or could be made until the Union's position had been ascertained. Thus, he said, he was repeating his offer to negotiate rather than litigate if the expenses of negotiating were less than litigating.

The Union's April 15 letter did not refer to the question of where to meet or the frequency of meetings. But Scolnik's April 20 letter rejected the Union's "counterproposal" which the Union wished to make. He also rejected the concept of "marathon negotiations." Instead, he proposed "monthly meetings starting at 9:30 a.m., with a 2-hour caucus for lunch and assessment of positions, review of documents and materials presented during the meeting, and recessing at 5 p.m. until the next meeting." He said he would consider further counterproposals. Also in this letter he asserted that the parties were at an impasse regarding these "procedural issues" but said he was not declaring an impasse.

In his May 12 letter Rosenberry expressed astonishment that Respondent would not come to Seattle to deal with the representative of its Seattle employees.

Scolnik in his May 17 letter "renew[ed his client's] position" as stated in his previous letters and "specifically reaffirm[ed] them" saying that it was "prepared to waive its right to contest the Board's certification if bargaining negotiations can be conducted in any mutually agreeable, reasonable times and places." He claimed Respondent was not insisting on any particular proposal. He later said Respondent had "tried to be as flexible as possible. In my [Scolnik's] opinion, but for the Union's adamant insistence on its position we could have and would have made substantial progress by now." No further correspondence occurred.

Section 8(d) of the Act obligates the parties "to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment." The question therefore is whether or not Respondent's conduct here was in good faith or whether it was an outright refusal to meet.

In this case I find myself most unimpressed with the conditions imposed on bargaining by Mr. Scolnik. He has conditioned collective bargaining by offering not to litigate the certification question if the Union would agree to meet in California. Assuming that negotiating the procedures for collective bargaining is a mandatory subject of bargaining, it is quite clear that conditioning bargaining on satisfaction of a lawsuit is unlawful for that is a nonmandatory topic. Peerless Food Products, 231 NLRB 530 (1977); Kit Mfg. Co., 142 NLRB 957, 971 (1963), enfd. 335 F.2d 166 (9th Cir. 1964). Thus, Respondent has approached bargaining here by constructing an artificial barrier around the bargaining process. Moreover, while imposing the barrier, Scolnik asserts that Respondent is ready, willing, and able to bargain with the Union, but only if the Union agrees to the procedures he has proposed, his disclaimers notwithstanding. Finally, his only explanation for refusing initially to meet with the Union in Seattle is that it was "inconvenient." There is no real explanation of why it is inconvenient other than the fact that the company headquarters and records are in Sacramento. That hardly seems to be an insurmountable problem considering the fact that Respondent no doubt routinely deals with the Seattle store on other business matters. Indeed, his suggested union counterproposal to meet halfway (somewhere in Oregon?) is a preposterous one. Why would any negotiator wish to meet at a place where neither party could consult with its principals? Finally, I note that Respondent claims one of the reasons it should not travel to Seattle is the Union's failure to provide it with an initial proposal. Considering the fact that Respondent has unlawfully refused to provide the information the Union sought, such a contention is purely disingenuous. Accordingly, I find Respondent has approached bargaining in a bad-faith manner and that its refusal to negotiate in Seattle is a breach of the obligation set forth in Section 8(d). Samperit Pacific, 237 NLRB 478 (1978), and the cases cited at 488. Compare Case, Inc., 237 NLRB 798 (1978), wherein an administrative law judge found that an offer to negotiate by conference call or by mail was an impediment to good-faith bargaining. I also note that Respondent's proposal with respect to the manner of bargaining here is designed to frustrate the process. Its proposal to meet 1 day a month with 2-hour lunch periods cannot be construed as reasonable. See General Motors Acceptance Corp., 196 NLRB 137, 138 (1972), where the employer allowed only 10 half days for bargaining during a 6-month period.

D. The Unilateral Wage Change

It will be recalled that the election was held on January 15, 1982. On November 18, some 11 months after the election, the union official responsible for the organization drive, Mike Orth, wrote a letter to William Fratzke, Respondent's store manager. The letter reads as follows:

> It has been brought to my attention that you intend to freeze or withhold all wage increases for your employees, including the past practice of providing Christmas bonuses for fear of charges being filed by this local union.
> The National Labor Relations Board prohibits the employer from:
> > "Promising or granting promotions, pay raises, or other benefits, to influence an EMPLOYEE'S VOTE, by a party capable of carrying out such promise."
>
> As you are aware, the N.L.R.B. secret ballot election has already been concluded and for that reason I request that you continue your practice of providing periodic wage increases as well as maintaining your Christmas bonuses for all of your employees.
> You have the word of this local union that we will not file charges against Queen Anne Record Sales, Inc., d/b/a Tower Books for providing wage increases and other benefits that will provide a better way of life for your VALUED employees.

As previously found the Board's certification of representative was issued on February 7, 1983. The parties stipulated that on or about May 1, 1983, Respondent adjusted the wages of unit employees and did so without previous notice to the Union or affording the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain as the employees' exclusive representative. The salary adjustments included three automatic step increases and six discretionary merit increases. According to the stipulation, Respondent's policy and practice with respect to automatic step increases was "25 cents per hour after 5, 8, and 12 months." After the final automatic step increase, performance reviews are made semiannually, generally January and July. Increases based on merit are generally effected in February and August of each year. The stipulation also states the delay until May 1983 was the result of an accidental misfiling of Orth's letter. A divisional manager of Respondent, Heidi Keller, did advise the Union, by letter dated May 6, 1983, that Respondent had "adjusted some of the salaries" of the Seattle employees "to be in keeping with the wage policies in our other stores." She did not give any other details.

The parties further stipulated that Respondent in good faith believed Orth's letter was intended to apply to any wage increases but that the Union intended it to apply only to automatic step increases, not merit increases.

Clearly the tenor of the letter was to ask Respondent not to freeze or withhold routine wage increases or Christmas bonuses out of fear that the Union filed charges over them. The organizer, in the apparent belief that the Act only prohibited an employer from attempting to influence the election via wage increases, said that since the election was over, the Company could continue its practice of providing "periodic wage increases as well as maintaining . . . Christmas bonuses for all of your employees." He said if that was done the Union would not file unfair labor practice charges.

Whatever legal questions might be raised with respect to wage increases, whether discretionary or nondiscretionary, given after the November 18 letter, the significant fact is the certification of representative was issued on February 7, 1982. The wage increases which are the subject of complaint were granted in May, 3 months later. While the letter may well have insulated Respondent from any unfair labor practice charges with respect to nondiscretionary increases prior to the certification and arguably may have insulated it from those dealing with nondiscretionary increases, the efficacy of the letter expired with issuance of the certification, for it ended the election process. Once the certification was issued Respondent no longer had the exclusive authority to make wage changes. It was obligated to first deal with the Union on all questions of wages. It did not do so. Thus, the fact that it in good faith relied on the letter (even though it had misplaced it) to grant the increases is no defense. The Board's certification is the controlling document. Allstate Insurance Co., 236 NLRB 193 (1978).[2] The unilateral wage increases are clearly barred by the Act in that circumstance. Katz v. NLRB, 369 U.S. 736 (1962); Sav-On Drugs, 261 NLRB 1168 (1982), enfd. 716 F.2d 574 (9th Cir. 1983); Master Slack Corp., 230 NLRB 1054 (1977), enfd. 618 F.2d 6 (6th Cir. 1980) (unilateral change issue not pressed on appeal).

Accordingly, I find that the May 1983 wage increases, both discretionary and nondiscretionary, were given without notice to the Union and without giving the Union the opportunity to bargain over them. In that circumstance Respondent is guilty of making unilateral wage changes in breach of the good-faith bargaining obligation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in various acts and conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1), I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. The affirmative action shall include an order requiring Respondent to provide, at its expense, the information the Union sought in its letter of March 3, 1983, and that it be ordered to bargain in good faith with the Union, at the Union's request, at a reasonable location near the Seattle store. The cease-and-desist order shall be construed so as not to deprive any employee from any wage or salary increase he or she may have received by Respondent's unlawful unilateral increases.[3] In addition, I shall recommend that the Certification of Representative be extended until such time as Respondent begins to bargain with the Union in good faith. See Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S 817.

On the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record in this case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Queen Anne Record Sales, Inc. d/b/a Tower Books is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Retail Store Employees Union Local 1001, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute an appropriate unit for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees employed at Respondent's facility located at 20 Mercer Street, Seattle, Washington; excluding all office clerical employees, deposit clerks, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. Since February 7, 1983, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the appropriate unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. On the dates shown in the foregoing decision Respondent has failed to bargain in good faith with the Union and has therefore violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by:

[2] Allstate also governs whether or not Respondent may refuse to bargain pending a challenge to the Certification of Representative. Clearly it may not.

[3] Keystone Steel & Wire, 248 NLRB 283 (1980).

(a) Refusing to honor the Union's request to provide information relevant to the performance of its duty as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in the appropriate unit.

(b) Refusing to meet with the Union for the purpose of engaging in good-faith collective bargaining.

(c) Making unilateral wage increases to the employees in the bargaining unit without first bargaining with the Union.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, Queen Anne Record Sales, Inc. d/b/a Tower Books, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Retail Store Employees Union Local 1001, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO by refusing to supply it with wage and personnel data relevant to collective bargaining in the appropriate unit.

(b) Refusing to meet with the Union in or near Seattle Washington to engage in good-faith collective bargaining with respect to the wages, hours, and terms and conditions of the employees in the appropriate unit.

(c) Unilaterally and without notice to the Union changing the wages of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(d) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.[5]

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Immediately supply the Union with the material it sought in its letter of March 3, 1983; the expense of providing such information to be borne by Respondent.

(b) On request, bargain in good faith with the Union at a reasonable location near its Seattle, Washington store with respect to a collective-bargaining agreement covering employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(c) Post at its Mercer Street location in Seattle, Washington, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the Board should order the Certification of Representative extended as discussed above in the Remedy portion of this decision.

---

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[5] In view of the fact that Respondent's conduct here constitutes a rejection of the principle of collective bargaining, a broad order is appropriate. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 23 July 1982 Administrative Law Judge Jerry B. Stone issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel and the Charging Party also filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The Respondent has excepted to the judge's conclusion that the Union's expressly unconditional offer to return to work on behalf of the unfair labor practice strikers was not in fact conditioned nor was it qualified by the Union's later statements. The Respondent argues that by making the offer on behalf of "each and every" striking employee in response to the Respondent's position in settlement negotiations that it would not reinstate 10 strikers because of their strike misconduct, and by later statements, the Union "insisted as part of its offer" that the Respondent take back every striking employee.

We have found that 6 of the 10 contested strikers did forfeit their entitlement to reinstatement and backpay under the Act by their misconduct during the strike. Had the Union made an offer on 2 March 1977 providing that the strikers would return to work only if all strikers were reinstated, none of the strikers would be entitled to backpay from that date because the offer would have been conditioned, in part, on the reinstatement of those strikers we have found the Respondent was not legally obligated to reinstate and the Respondent therefore would have been privileged to reject it. See Sawyer Stores, 190 NLRB 651 (1971); American Beauty Baking Co., 171 NLRB 700 (1968). The judge found, however, no evidence that the Union either implicitly or explicitly made such an "all or none" offer. On careful review, we find the judge's conclusion to be supported by the record and therefore adopt it.

An offer to return to work on behalf of "each and every" employee, standing alone, does not raise the inference that no striker will return unless all are reinstated. See Homes Insulation Service, 255 NLRB 311, 312 fn. 8 (1981). The Respondent urges that the Union's offer on behalf of each and every striker does have such import here because it was made in "response" to the Respondent's position in settlement discussions that it would not reinstate 10 of the strikers. The Union's witnesses testified that the Union did not learn of the Respondent's position concerning the 10 strikers until after the offer was made. Even assuming, however, that the Respondent's version of the sequence of events is correct, the record shows that the Union's offer both

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Member Hunter would not adopt the judge's finding that employee Harriet Ruffen was working a 40-hour week at the time of the Union's 19 October 1976 strike and was not reinstated to an equivalent position in June 1977. Ruffen was given a performance evaluation on 25 May 1976 which carried a notation from her supervisor that Ruffen would work a 40-hour week until 2 October 1976. Ruffen testified that she was told that she could work full time until the Respondent no longer needed her services because of the Respondent's practice of hiring Northwestern University students to work as nurses aides. It is undisputed that about 2 weeks before the 19 October 1976 strike a Northwestern University student was hired to do the same work Ruffen was doing. In addition, Ruffen testified that her regular work schedule called for 7–8 hour days on Saturday and Tuesday through Friday of each workweek. On such a schedule, Ruffen would have worked between 42 and 48 hours over the portion of the pay period occurring before the 19 October 1976 strike. Instead, Ruffen's payroll record reveals that she worked only 32 hours during this period, a number consistent with the Respondent's contention that Ruffen was placed on a 3-day/24-hour workweek before the strike began. While Ruffen testified that her schedule was not changed before the strike, the judge did not specifically credit this testimony and elsewhere discredited Ruffen. Under the circumstances, Member Hunter finds that Ruffen was working a 3-day/24-hour workweek before the strike and that the Respondent therefore reinstated Ruffen to an equivalent position in June 1977.

[2] We adopt as consistent with our holding in Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984), the judge's conclusions that striking employees Erde, Pinero, Reeves, Walker, and Matson forfeited their entitlement to reinstatement and backpay under the Act by their strike misconduct. In addition, we find merit in the Respondent's exception to the judge's conclusion that striking employee Rena Baskin did not likewise disqualify herself from reinstatement. Strike misconduct warrants denial of reinstatement and backpay if, under the existing circumstances, it reasonably tends to coerce or intimidate. Clear Pine Mouldings, supra. We find that by grabbing a nonstriking employee walking along the sidewalk on her way to work by the elbows and shaking her and by taking an incoming patient by the arm and steering her away from the Respondent's clinic, Baskin clearly engaged in intimidating and coercive conduct. We therefore conclude, contrary to the judge, that Baskin is not entitled to backpay and have modified the recommended Order accordingly.

In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent failed to carry its burden of demonstrating that employee Harmon did not engage in misconduct warranting a denial of reinstatement, Member Hunter relies solely on the judge's finding under Blue Flash Express, 109 NLRB 591 (1954), that the Respondent did not produce persuasive evidence that Harmon had engaged in the misconduct alleged.

by its terms and the form and circumstances of its delivery is separable from the exchange of positions comprising the contemporaneous settlement discussions. The Respondent's witnesses testified that the settlement negotiations were conducted by the presiding judge at the unfair labor practice hearing, who relayed each party's position or response to the other while the parties were sequestered in separate rooms. On the other hand, it is uncontested that the Union's offer was in the form of a signed and dated document expressly stating that it was an unconditional offer to return to work which was delivered directly to the Respondent by the Union in the hallway outside the hearing room during a scheduled break in the negotiations. The evidence proffered by the Respondent establishes at most that the Union was aware of the Respondent's position on the 10 strikers before making its offer. That the Union nevertheless made the offer on behalf of each and every striker does not compel the inference that the offer was conditioned on the return of all.

Also, we are not persuaded that the Union's statements following the offer to return to work, cited by the Respondent, conditioned the offer on the reinstatement of every striker. The record indicates that the Union's statement to the presiding judge at the hearing and to counsel for the General Counsel that the Respondent should drop the strike misconduct allegations and that all strikers had to be reinstated pertained to the Respondent's proposal in settlement discussions that the parties engage in some form of expedited litigation or arbitration to determine whether the listed strikers were entitled to reinstatement. The Respondent chiefly relies on union attorney Domesick's testimony that, in response to the statement by the Respondent's attorney Leon Kowal that the list of 10 strikers represented those employees whom the Respondent would not take back under any circumstances but that the Respondent was prepared to discuss the return of the others, Domesick told Kowal that "we were not going to engage in discussions which were premised on our agreement that these ten under no circumstances would be returned." It cannot be conclusively determined from the record whether this exchange concerned the future course of settlement discussions or the fulfillment of the Respondent's legal obligation to reinstate the strikers triggered by the offer to return to work. Even assuming that Domesick's remarks concerned reinstatement of the strikers pursuant to the Union's offer, his expression of the Union's disagreement with the Respondent's position on the 10 strikers does not amount to a statement that, unless these strikers were reinstated, no employee would return to work.

The Respondent also contends in its exceptions that on 2 March 1977 it made a valid unconditional offer of reinstatement to the striking employees both by its expressed willingness in settlement discussions to take back all the listed strikers without condition and by Leon Kowal's above-mentioned statements to attorney Domesick that the Respondent was prepared to discuss the return of the other strikers or as to them did not have the same objection as it did to the strikers on the list. We find no merit in this contention. To toll the backpay period, an employer's offer of reinstatement must be unequivocal, unconditional, and sufficiently specific to apprise employees that they are being offered their former jobs, or if these jobs no longer exist, equivalent positions. L. A. Water Treatment, 263 NLRB 244 (1982); Standard Aggregate Corp., 213 NLRB 154 (1974). The Respondent's statements that it would "take back" certain of the strikers or was "prepared to discuss" their return lack the required specificity to constitute a valid offer of reinstatement and toll the backpay period. Cf. Moro Motors, 216 NLRB 192 (1975) (employer's statement to employee that he would like to have employee back not valid offer of reinstatement). For the foregoing reasons, we agree with the judge's conclusion that the Union made a valid offer to return to work on 2 March 1977 and that the backpay period runs from that date.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Preterm, Inc., Brookline, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Strike the name Rena Baskin from the list of backpay recipients.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JERRY B. STONE, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding to determine backpay, if any, due certain unfair labor practice strikers, pursuant to the remedial order issued by the Board on February 9, 1979 (reported at 240 NLRB 654), and by stipulation conceded to be in all respects a valid and proper order, was held on November 16–20, 1981, and January 25–28, and February 1–2 and 8–10, 1982, at Boston, Massachusetts.

The issues essentially concern (1) whether the Union made an unconditional offer on March 2, 1977, for the striking employees to return to work, (2) whether certain employees engaged in serious strike misconduct removing them from the remedial protection of the Act, (3) whether certain employees engaged in due and diligent search for employment, (4) whether certain interim earnings are correct as alleged, and (5) whether there has been inexcusable delay on the part of the General Counsel from September 13, 1979, until April 2, 1981, in issuance of the backpay specifications so as to prohibit interest as part of the backpay for such period of time. By and large, the formula and computations are not in dispute.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to participate in the proceeding. Briefs have been filed by all parties and have been considered.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. The Issue of Inexcusable Delay

The facts reveal that the Board's remedial order in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding issued on February 9, 1979, and that the Respondent entered into a stipulation conceding that said remedial order was a valid and proper order about September 13, 1979.

The Respondent contends that there was an inexcusable delay on the part of Region 1 of the NLRB in taking from September 13, 1979, until April 2, 1981, to issue the backpay specifications, and that therefore "interest" is not properly owed by the Respondent for such period of time.

The remedial order in the underlying proceeding is directed to the Respondent. No evidence was presented to reveal that the Respondent, on its own, could not have made all the computations and determinations necessary for compliance with such order. Accordingly, the lack of evidence to establish that the Regional Office withheld facts from the Respondent or made it difficult for the Respondent to see witnesses or records relating to interim earnings, search for employment, or expenses would require a rejection of the Respondent's contentions without further consideration of the Region's compliance efforts.

However, such evidence as was presented concerning the Region's compliance efforts[1] also fails to establish any basis for the relief requested by the Respondent. Thus, the facts clearly reveal that the Region, prior to the underlying decisional order, had commenced efforts in 1977 to obtain information necessary for the determination of backpay. It is clear therefore that as of September 13, 1979, the Region had some of the information relating to the backpay claims. The precise type of information to determine what employees would have earned had they worked for the Respondent during the backpay period normally has to be determined from the Respondent's records. The facts clearly reveal that shortly after September 13, 1979, efforts were commenced by the Region to obtain such records from the Respondent and that such records were only received as of July 3, 1980.

Although the Region clearly had some information from employees relating to backpay questions as of September 13, 1979, such information as was specifically discussed or presented into the record had been obtained in 1977. It is obvious that information relating to a backpay period commencing in 1977 and continuing as of September 1979 would require further completion or updating of information within the knowledge of the Respondent and/or backpay claimants. No evidence was presented to reveal in detail steps taken by the Region or problems presented. Nor was evidence presented to reveal in detail the communications between the Region and the Respondent from July 1980, to April 1981. The proceeding revealed much dispute as to backpay issues up and to the trial in this proceeding. Many issues were narrowed, but many issues remained unsolved. In sum, the facts fail to establish that there was unreasonable or inexcusable delay, for which the Region should be deemed responsible, with respect to the issuance on April 2, 1981, of the backpay specifications in this case. Accordingly, the Respondent's contention that interest should not be computed on the backpay for such period of time until April 2, 1981, is rejected.

B. The Unconditional Offer to Return to Work

On March 2, 1977, the Union executed a document purporting to be an unconditional offer to return to work by striking employees. Such document was worded as follows:

> District 1199 Mass. National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, a division of RWDSU/-AFL–CIO, on behalf of each and every employee employed by Preterm, Inc. as of October 18, 1976, whose work ceased thereafter as a consequence of a labor dispute with Preterm, Inc., unconditionally offers to return to work at Preterm, Inc.
> Dated: March 2, 1977
> /s/ Elliot Small
> Elliot Small, President

On March 2, 1977, representatives of the Union met certain representatives of the Respondent and handed the above-referred-to document to the Respondent's attorney Kowal.

The Respondent objected to the receipt of such document in evidence on the alleged basis that the document or offer to return to work by strikers was a part of settlement negotiations. The document clearly purported to be an unconditional offer to return to work by the striking employees and for such reason was received into the evidence.

The Respondent was allowed to litigate the question of whether in fact such offer was an unconditional offer to return to work by the striking employees.[2]

[1] Although compliance with an order is the responsibility of the Respondent, the Board tenders its aid in effectuating compliance, and determines whether compliance is proper and, if disputed, has procedures to resolve such dispute.

[2] The evidence presented with respect to the negotiations for settlement has value limited to the specific issue of whether or not the March 2, 1977, offer was an unconditional offer to return to work by the strikers.

Nothing in the evidence presented reveals that the Union withdrew such offer, or made any statements qualifying such offer. Nor does the evidence presented reveal that such offer was a mere position or was qualified in any way.

The facts relating to the "negotiations" for settlement reveal that the administrative law judge for the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding attempted to aid the parties in the settlement of the unfair labor practice proceeding and that an aspect of such settlement involved a strike settlement and a question of the returning to work of striking employees. There had been settlement efforts by the parties and the administrative law judge prior to March 2, 1977, the date of the referred-to offer to return to work.[3] There were settlement efforts after the referred-to offer. Excluding the events wherein the March 2, 1977 offer to return to work was made, settlement efforts involved each party having discussions of its own, having discussions with the administrative law judge, making statements to the administrative law judge for transmission to the other party, and receiving statements from the administrative law judge purportedly transmitted from the other party.

In effect prior to the March 2, 1977 unconditional offer to return to work by the strikers, there had been some indication that the parties should build step by step to a settlement and that a solution as to the end of the strike and return to work of striking employees was needed before settlement could ensue.

An unconditional offer to return to work by strikers is more than a position, it is an actual act. Positions, as viewed with respect to evidentiary questions of settlement negotiations, may be said to be tantamount to conditional offers.

The evidence relating to settlement efforts does not reveal that the Union ever abandoned its act of an unconditional offer made on March 2, 1977. The evidence, however, reveals that prior to such offer and afterward, the Respondent took the position that certain of the strikers were not to be returned to work because of misconduct during the strike. The Union's position in settlement discussions consistently was to the effect that any settlement would have to be on the basis that all striking employees be returned to work.

There is a distinction between the Union's act, the March 2, 1977 unconditional offer for striking employees to return to work, and its position. As to the Union's act, absent a settlement, the Respondent was obliged to take the striking employees, excepting those disqualified by misconduct from statutory protection, back immediately if such enployees were unfair labor practice strikers, and immediately if not replaced or whenever a position became available, if such employees were economic strikers. The Union's position that all strikers had to be reemployed had only a bearing as a part of negotiations for settlement.

The evidence presented as to negotiations for settlement merely reveals that the Respondent participated in settlement negotiations and considered settlement with the return of strikers other than ones considered to have engaged in misconduct, despite the fact that many, if not all, strikers had been replaced. The evidence reveals that the Respondent's position at the unfair labor practice trial was that the strike was an economic strike and not an unfair labor practice strike.

At some point in the negotiating discussions with the administrative law judge, apparently toward the end of such attempts to settle, one of the Respondent's attorneys indicated to the administrative law judge that the Respondent would "accept" back the strikers other than certain strikers who had allegedly engaged in misconduct. There is no evidence to reveal that such remarks were transmitted to the Union. Nor is there any reason to infer that an administrative law judge would communicate such remarks or that the parties should believe that he would. The administrative law judge's interest is in aiding the parties to develop a proper settlement and, if not, to conduct a proper trial. Remarks, not related to "negotiations" of this nature, are of the type that the parties themselves should communicate to other parties. Moreover, evidence of later communications reveals that the effect of such remarks involved an understanding that the Respondent was treating such striking employees as "economic" strikers who would be accepted back when a vacancy occurred.

The sum of the evidence, relating to the unconditional offer of March 2, 1977, and to "negotiations" for settlement, persuades and I conclude and find that the Union's offer of March 2, 1977, constituted an unconditional offer to return to work by all striking employees.[4]

Since the facts reveal that the Union's offer of March 2, 1977, constituted an unconditional offer to return to work by all striking employees, the evidence relating to settlement negotiations must be considered rejected for all other purposes.

C. The Backpay Determination

1. Employees as to whom the only issue involved the "unconditional offer" question

As to the below-referred-to employees, the only issue as to backpay or entitlement concerned the validity of the March 2, 1977 unconditional offer to return to work. As indicated beforehand, the March 2, 1977 unconditional offer to return to work by the strikers constituted a valid unconditional offer.

Based on the findings and conclusions relating to the March 2, 1977 unconditional offer by the Union for the strikers to return to work and the pleadings and admissions therein, it is concluded and found that the net backpay due the individuals set forth below is as follows:[5]

2. Employees for whom no backpay is alleged to be due Fradkin and Simmons

The General Counsel's backpay allegations included allegations relating to backpay computations for employees for whom there was in effect no ultimate loss in backpay under the formula. Further, as to some individuals, the formula sets forth amounts of backpay due for some quarters and not for other quarters during the backpay period. There would appear to have been no dispute between the General Counsel and the Respondent on such point. No issues thereto have been raised by the pleadings. And no issues have been raised by the parties or potential intervenors in interest during the public proceedings held to determine the backpay issues. Thus, I note that the issues litigated in this proceeding are the issues raised by the pleadings. Accordingly, I conclude and find that the facts relating to the backpay computations for Sharon Fradkin and Betty Simmons are those alleged in the specifications and admitted in the pleadings, and that no backpay is due either Fradkin or Simmons.

3. Backpay claimants—unavailable as witnesses—Claudia Bostick and Azariah Phipps

There are two alleged backpay claimants, Claudia Bostick and Azariah Phipps, who were unavailable as witnesses at the backpay trial. As to these claimants, the resolution of the "unconditional offer" issue leaves only potential issues as relate to search for employment, interim earnings and expenses. There is no dispute as to the backpay period or as to gross earnings to be utilized in the computations of backpay for each alleged claimant. Thus, it is clear that the General Counsel has met his initial burden of establishing backpay due to such backpay claimants.

It is the Respondent's burden to establish offsets to the gross backpay due claimants. Thus, the Respondent has the burden of establishing that the claimants had interim earnings not utilized in the backpay computations and to establish willful loss of earnings as by failure to seek employment. The Respondent's answer avers that it is without knowledge of whether there were no "interim earnings" or whether the backpay claimants sought interim employment. It is not necessary to determine the adequacy of such pleadings in this case. The parties expressed agreement at trial for a determination of backpay due with provisions for payment into escrow funds of the amounts determined and for provision for future litigation, if necessary, as to the "interim earnings" and "search for employment" issues.

On consideration of the determination that the Union made a valid and unconditional offer on March 2, 1977, for the striking employees to return to work, the facts relating to gross backpay as established by the pleadings, the lack of evidence relating to "interim earnings" or willful loss of earnings, and the agreement by the parties as to further procedures to be used pending location of the backpay claimants, I conclude and find that the backpay due, with interest, to the below listed backpay claimants is as set forth, but with certain rights accorded to the parties for further litigation, if necessary, concerning backpay determinations.[6]

4. Certain miscellaneous issues excepting as relate to misconduct—Dawe, Jones, Present, Poole, and Ruffen

a. Janice Dawe

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Excepting for the question of determination of average weekly earnings as a basis for computing gross earnings, there are no other issues concerning backpay due Dawe.

The General Counsel's formula averred and the General Counsel contends that Dawe's gross earnings should be based on a projection of average earnings for an 18-1/2-hour week. The Respondent contends that Dawe's gross earnings should be based on a projection of average weekly earnings of $49.26 as determined from Dawe's earnings of the second and third quarters of 1976.

The General Counsel presented testimonial evidence by Regional Compliance Officer Beal to the effect that the backpay computations for Dawe were based on a consideration of an affidavit by Dawe and the Respondent's payroll records. Beal testified that normally he had utilized the earnings for employees for the second and third quarters of 1976 in determining average earnings for computing gross earnings;[7] that, however, Dawe's affidavit indicated that she had worked approximately 12-1/2 hours a week until the end of September or beginning of October 1976, that a change in employment occurred around such time and that Dawe commenced working 5 hours on Saturday in addition to a schedule of 4-1/2 hours on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of each week. Beal testified that he spoke with Dawe and ascertained that the change and added hours resulted from an employee named Alice Fine (Springer) dropping Saturday work. Beal testified that an examination of Fine's affidavit corroborated Dawe's affidavit in such respect. The testimony of Beal was objected to as regards proof of facts other than the method or asserted basis of computation. Neither Dawe nor Fine was presented as a witness. Payroll records for Dawe and Fine were presented into the record.

[6] In accordance with the procedures set forth in Mastro Plastics Corp., 136 NLRB 1342, 1348 (1962), the Respondent shall place a sum of moneys, equal to the backpay determined due said backpay claimants, in escrow accounts. Further, on location of one or both of the backpay claimants, existence of an estate or heirs if a backpay claimant is deceased at such time, or establishment of state of jurisdiction of one or more of the backpay claimants, if deceased, if the Respondent has evidence to present relating to issues concerning "interim earnings" or willful loss of earnings, the Respondent shall be entitled to a reconsideration of the order relating to backpay to such claimant and to litigation of the issue of "interim earnings" and "willful loss of earnings." If there exists no evidence relating to such issue, the escrow funds shall be paid to such claimant, estate or heirs of such claimant, or the person otherwise entitled to such assets, as the case may be. In the event of additional evidence relating to the issues referred to, disposition of the backpay awards shall be in accordance with the procedures in the Mastro Plastics case. Further, the Regional Director shall report the status of these backpay claims to the Board when these matters are resolved and in no event later than 1 year from the date of the Supplemental Decision and Order for such further orders as may be necessary.

[7] It is noted that the unfair labor practice strike commenced on October 19, 1976.

Beal testified to the effect that an examination of Dawe's payroll record and her affidavit, including reference therein to a vacation during the last week of September, indicated an 18-1/2-hour workweek.

In and of themselves, the payroll records relating to Dawe and Fine are not sufficient to establish an 18-1/2-hour workweek for Dawe during the period of time just preceding the strike. Beal's testimony of a hearsay nature, objected to, and received on a limited basis, does not supply the necessary evidence to establish that Dawe's workweek immediately prior to the strike was that of an 18-1/2-hour workweek.

This being so, the preponderance of the evidence only warrants a finding, as alleged by the Respondent, that Dawe's average earnings should be based on the work history for the second and third quarters of 1976, and that the average weekly earnings, properly to be used for computation of gross earnings, should be $49.26 per week as of the commencement of the backpay period on March 3, 1977.

Accordingly, the computations for Dawe's backpay should be as follows:

Calendar Quarters	Weeks	Gross Backpay	Net Interim Earnings	Net Backpay[8]
1977-I	4.2@ $49.26	$206.89	0	$206.89

b. Carolyn Jones (LaFleur)

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. There remains issues as to whether (1) Jones resigned on October 21, 1976, and (2) the Respondent made a proper offer of reinstatement on June 8, 1978. Further, the Respondent's pleadings set forth a denial that Jones had "no interim earnings" because the Respondent was without knowledge as to whether Jones had sought interim "Saturday" employment.

(1) The resignation issue

The evidence relating to the "resignation" issue consists of the following letter.

3 Adams Street
Charlestown, Mass. 02129
October 21, 1976

Preterm Massachusetts
1842 Beacon Street
Brookline, Mass. 02146

To Deborah Feinbloom:

It is my understanding that my picketting [sic] on October 19, 1976 from 6:30 am to 9:00 am aligns me with the strikers at Preterm. As a result of this fact and of my decision not to cross the picket line to work my usual part time Saturday schedule as of October 23, I also understand that I have been permanently replaced at Preterm.

I have remained in this area in hopes that I could have added some constructive element to a very worthy cause. It is very obvious to me that such constructive efforts are of little benefit when both sides are willing to take extreme measures to win. I acknowledge with frustration and sadness that more respect was not shown for some very dynamic women and that no one at Preterm was able to respond at the onset with the kind of leadership that maintains good communication and prevents polarization.

For both personal and professional reasons it is time for me to seek full time employment in another region. Enclosed are my usual forms which I will need by Tuesday, October 26.

Sincerely,
/s/ Carolyn Jones
Carolyn Jones

An unfair labor practice striker has a statutory right to reinstatement on an unconditional offer to return to work. Board law consistently has held that the waiver or relinquishment of a statutory right must be clear and unequivocal. Considering the above letter under such standards, it is clear that Jones did not give up her statutory right as an unfair labor practice striker that she be reinstated upon an unconditional offer to return to work.

I do not find in such letter any statement of resignation of employment. Rather, such letter asserts that Jones continues to support the strike by a determination not to cross the picket line. The letter reveals that, although Jones continues to support the strike, Jones intends to seek full-time employment. It is noted that such actions, however, are postulated on the understanding that Jones had been replaced. Absent evidence that the Respondent, around such time, advised Jones that she had not been replaced, the evidence warrants a finding that the Respondent had "replaced" Jones. As a matter of law, however, the Respondent could not replace an unfair labor practice striker. Thus, it is further clear that Jones' letter could not constitute a clear and unequivocal waiver of Jones' rights as an unfair labor practice striker.

[8] With interest as set forth later.

[9] Dawe would have received a 5-percent wage increase on June 6, 1977.

[10] Dawe would have received a 5-percent anniversary wage increase on September 26, 1977.

In sum, I conclude and find that Jones' letter of October 21, 1976, does not constitute a letter of resignation of employment.

(2) The June 8, 1978 reinstatement offer

On June 8, 1978, the Respondent transmitted the following letter to Carolyn Jones.

June 8, 1978

Ms. Carolyn Jones
331 Shawmut Avenue
Boston, MA 02118

Dear Carolyn,

I understand from the NLRB that your letter of October 21, 1976, to Deborah Feinbloom (wherein you said "For both personal and professional reasons it is time for me to seek full-time employment in another region.") was not a letter of resignation.

I am writing to say that your former position of Saturday Counselor is available if you wish to unconditionally return to your former job.

Please advise me whether you can return to work the week of June 26, 1978. I must know by June 14, 1978, in order to make the necessary arrangements.

Sincerely

The above letter does not reveal itself to be a clear "unconditional" offer to reinstate Jones to her former position. Rather, the letter indicates that the job is available. In any event, the Respondent's decision to offer Jones her old job position was in fact conditioned on Jones' receiving a certain amount of retraining. Following the June 8, 1978 letter, referred to above, the Respondent's agents had communication with Jones concerning such retraining during weekdays (not on Saturday). Later, on June 30, 1978, the Respondent transmitted the following letter to Jones:

June 30, 1978

Ms. Carolyn Jones
331 Shawmut Avenue
Boston, MA 02118

Dear Carolyn,

This is to confirm our telephone conversation of Friday, June 30, 1978.

I understand that at present you have a commitment during the week which makes it impossible for you to come into the clinic on week days to re-orient. As I mentioned to you, it is not feasible for you to come back without going through an orientation period. I further understand that the first week you would be available to come back to work is at the end of August. As we discussed, unless you can make a commitment for "on call" in the fall, it may not make sense to re-orient at the end of August. I further understand from you that you want to have a chance to think about this issue.

Please advise me whether you will be returning to Preterm by July 7, 1978. If we do not hear from you by July 7, 1978, we will assume you will not be returning to work.

If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to call me.

Sincerely,

Deborah H. Feinbloom, Ph.D.

Contentions and Conclusions

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent, by its letter of June 8, 1978, did not make a proper offer of reinstatement to her old job to Jones. In such regard the General Counsel argues that the "offer" was conditioned on Jones' receiving retraining. The Respondent appears to argue that there was a need for "retraining" because of the passage of time and that, in such context, such offer was proper. I find merit in the General Counsel's contentions. Thus, on or about March 3, 1977, the Respondent had an obligation to reinstate Jones to her old position. Although as of June 1978, there might be some merit to a contention that some retraining might be necessary, such would not necessarily be true as of March 3, 1977. The need for any retraining as of June 8, 1978, has either been caused by the Respondent's failure to reinstate Jones in March 1977, or at least greatly aggravated by such failure. Further, the 1976 strike was caused and prolonged by the Respondent's unfair labor practices. Under such circumstances, it is the wrongdoer's responsibility to take such acts as are necessary to enable it to carry out its remedial responsibilities. Thus, the Respondent has the burden of making accommodations to enable it to ensure necessary training of employees connected with the reinstatement of employees. In the instant case, if necessary, the Respondent had the obligation to arrange for "retraining" on Saturday. Accordingly, I conclude and find that the Respondent's June 8, 1978 offer of reemployment to Jones included a restrictive condition resulting in such offer being an invalid offer.[11]

(3) Interim earnings

The Respondent's answer asserted, "Respondent is without knowledge whether Carolyn Jones ever sought interim 'Saturday' employment during her alleged backpay period and therefore denies that there are no interim earnings."

It is the Respondent's burden of proof to establish "interim earnings" or willful loss of earnings. No evidence [11] I do not find it necessary to pass on whether a need actually existed for retraining for Jones. I note, however, it would appear that if such need existed, the same would have been specifically adverted to in the June 8, 1978 letter. Further, the June 30, 1978 letter almost suggests an insincerity in the Respondent's actions.

has been presented as to "interim earnings" or willful loss of earnings other than certain admissions of interim earnings set forth in the backpay computations.

(4) The backpay due Jones

In accordance with the backpay specifications and pleadings, the disposition of the issues as previously set forth, it is clear that the backpay due Carolyn Jones for a backpay period (3/3/77-9/1/79) is as follows:

CALENDAR QTRS.	NET BACKPAY[12]

c. Amy Present

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. It is clear that Present's backpay period ran from March 3 to May 3, 1977, that Present's average weekly earnings for the purpose of computing backpay was 33.44 per week, that Present had no interim earnings during the backpay period, that gross backpay (subject to the question of whether backpay should be disallowed because Present did not seek employment during the backpay period) was $140.44 for the first quarter of 1977, and $147.13 for the second quarter of 1977.

The critical issue is whether Present should be disallowed backpay because of her failure to search for work.

There was a paucity of evidence presented with respect to the issue as to Present's failure to seek work. Thus, the evidence consists of (1) a questionnaire and statement (attachment to a letter), utilized by Compliance Officer Beal with respect to his determination of "backpay" due Present, and (2) testimony by Beal as to conversations with Present.

Beal's testimony was to the effect that the questionnaire and statement were prepared by him, sent to Present, and received back in completed form. Considering a presumption of regularity, one must conclude, absent contrary evidence, that the signature on such documents purporting to be that of Present, was in fact the signature of Present, the backpay claimant.

The questionnaire completed by Present and executed on June 30, 1980, contained the following questions and answers excerpts.

[12] With minor corrections concerning inadvertent erroneous computations and with interest as indicated later.

III. After March 2, 1977, when Preterm failed to reinstate strikers upon the Union's request, how long did you continue to picket?

Not sure exactly.

When did you begin to search for another job? I did not as I was in graduate school at that time.

For the period between March 2, 1977 and the date Preterm offered you reinstatement to your former or substantially equivalent position (as reflected in section II above):

(a) please describe efforts you made to obtain other work (include names, and locations of places at which you applied for work, and when you did so):

see above

If you did not look for work, please explain fully why? see above—I was in graduate school & working a non-paying internship 3 days/week & in class one other weekday, leaving only weekends free for paid employment.

Were you unavailable for employment for any reason (sickness, maternity, absence from area or country, attendance at school, etc.) at any time during this period? (If so, please give specific reason and dates of unavailability).

I was in graduate school at that time tho remained available to work the hours I had been working at Preterm (i.e. Saturdays)—note such a work schedule is nearly impossible to come by at comparable wages, I decided not to seek out comparable employment.

The statement, executed by Present on October 13, 1981, contained the following question and answer excerpts:

Did you file for unemployment compensation after going on strike at Preterm? No.

If so, how long did you collect? from _____ to _____ at which office?

If you did not file for unemployment compensation, why not? (Please be as specific as you can in your answer).

I would have been ineligible at that time as I was then in graduate school.

. . . .

On what basis did you conclude that it would be nearly impossible to find comparable, or even suitable, work on Saturdays only? Please explain fully.

I was in contact with various people in similar agencies to find that such part-time positions (i.e. one-two Sats/month) were not available (if such positions existed at all.)

. . . .

Why did you not thereafter begin looking for another position?

As stated above, I could find no leads even to begin to pursue that would suit my unusual time specifications.

It is clear that it is the Respondent's burden to establish that there should be a diminution of damages with respect to the ascertainment of backpay due Present. Thus, the Board set forth in Mastro Plastics Corp., 136 NLRB 1342, 1346 (1962):

> In this connection the Board reaffirms its long-standing rule that while the general burden of proof is upon the General Counsel to establish the damage which has resulted from Respondent's established discriminatory discharge, i.e., the gross backpay over the backpay period, the burden of proof is upon the Respondent as to diminution of damages, whether from the willful loss of earnings by the failure to either look for or keep a substantially equivalent job or from the unavailability of a job at Respondent's plant for some reason unconnected with the discrimination. [Footnote omitted.] As for the "willful loss of earnings" we note that that principle rests not so much on the common law theory of mitigation of damages as on a public policy of "promoting production and employment."[12] In the utilization of the principle the Supreme Court left the matter to the wide discretion of the Board to keep the matter within reasonable bounds and avoid remote and speculative claims by employers. Absent a showing by Respondent that the individual claimant acted unreasonably or willfully or that a job would not have been available had the discrimination not occurred, the General Counsel has established a prima facie case.

[12] Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N.L.R.B., supra, 197–200. Even as to the common law theory of mitigation, the generally accepted rule is that the burden of proof for an employer's breach of an employment contract is upon the defendant to show that the plaintiff either found, or, by the exercise of proper industry in the search, could have procured other employment of an approximately similar nature, and that in the absence of such proof the plaintiff is entitled to recover the salary fixed by the contract. Williston, Contracts, § 1360. Also note that in the Reed & Prince case, supra, footnote 10, while the court states that the burden of proof in a contempt proceeding is upon the Petitioner, the burden of proving no contempt on the specific ground that the job would not have been available is upon the defendant. See also Southern Silk Mills, Inc., supra

Considering the evidence presented by the Respondent, one must find that the Respondent has not established that Present's gross backpay should be offset by a diminution based upon either an abandonment of availability for the work market or a deemed constructive willful loss of earnings because of failure to search for work. Thus, the Respondent has not established that Present was not available and willing to be employed for the same work hours that she had been employed by Preterm. Nor has the Respondent established that Present's failure to search for work was done with willful intent to cause a loss of earnings. Rather, the Respondent's evidence reveals in effect that the failure to search for Saturday comparable work was based on a belief that it was virtually impossible to find such work. The presentation of Present's signed questionnaire and statements clearly did not satisfy the Respondent's burden of proof in establishing in effect a willful loss of earnings by Present. Perhaps evidence could have been presented to establish that Present did not believe that it was impossible to secure suitable Saturday employment comparable to her Preterm employment. Perhaps evidence could have been presented to reveal that there was in fact available suitable Saturday employment comparable to Present's Preterm employment and that Present's failure to search for work was unreasonable. Nevertheless, such evidence has not been presented, and the Respondent otherwise has not met its burden of establishing that Present had willfully caused a loss of earnings during her backpay period.[13]

The backpay due Present

In accordance with the backpay specifications and pleadings, the disposition of the issues previously set forth, it is clear that the backpay due Amy Present is as follows:

CALENDAR QTRS.	NET BACKPAY[14]
1977–I	$140.44
1977–II	147.14

d. Gloria Poole

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. It is clear that Poole's backpay period ran from March 3 to May 10, 1977, that Poole's average weekly earnings for the purpose of computing backpay was $165 per week, based on a 5-day week, that Poole was able to work only 3 days per week during the backpay period, that her average weekly earnings for the purpose of computing backpay on a 3-day week basis was $103.95 per week, that Poole had no interim earnings, that gross backpay (subject to the question of whether backpay should be disallowed because Poole did not seek employment during the backpay period) was $436.59 for the first quarter of 1977, and $540.54 for the second quarter of 1977.

The only issue with respect to whether or not Poole should receive backpay is whether Poole incurred a willful loss of earnings by failure to seek interim employment during the backpay period. The only evidence relating to such issue consists of Beal's credited testimony that Poole stated to him that she had not sought interim employment during the backpay period. By the eliciting of such evidence, the Respondent met its burden of going forward with evidence relating to the question of an offset to gross earnings. The burden of going forward with evidence on such issue shifted to the General Counsel and/or the Charging Party. Such evidence as needed to overcome the Respondent's evidence relating to a willful loss of earnings was not presented.[15]

[13] See Cornwell Co., 171 NLRB 342, 343 (1968).

[14] With minor corrections concerning inadvertent erroneous computations and with interest thereon as indicated later herein.

[15] The evidence relating to Poole's failure to seek interim employment differs from the evidence relating to Present's failure to seek employ-

Continued

The evidence relating to Poole's failure to seek interim employment during the backpay period reveals a failure to attempt to mitigate a loss of earnings and warrants a finding that there was a willful loss of earnings by Poole during the first and second quarters of 1977. Accordingly, the backpay allegations of net backpay due Poole shall be recommended to be dismissed.

e. Harriet Ruffen

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. It is clear that Ruffen's backpay period commenced on March 3, 1977. It is disputed as to whether Ruffen's backpay period was tolled on June 4, 1977, or continued until December 4, 1977. The determination of this issue depends on whether or not Ruffen was entitled to be reinstated to a 5-day workweek instead of the 3-day workweek she was reinstated to on June 4, 1977. Further, there is an issue as to whether Ruffen should be disallowed backpay because she failed to diligently seek employment during the backpay period. And there is an issue of the appropriate average earnings to be used for the computations of Ruffen's backpay.

(1) The search for employment

The evidence relating to Ruffen's search for employment consisted of Ruffen's testimony and an executed questionnaire and attachment submitted to the Regional Compliance Officer during the investigation of the backpay issues as relating to Ruffen.

Suffice it to say that I credit Ruffen's testimony to the effect that she made application for work in late 1976 to the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital and to the Boston City Hospital. I discredit her testimony to the effect that she made telephone calls to various nursing homes after the strike commenced in October 1976.[16]

The facts relating to Ruffen's failure to search for work during her backpay period establish in effect conduct tantamount to a willful loss of earnings. Accordingly, gross backpay for the period of time March 3 to June 2, 1977, shall be dismissed.

(2) The reinstatement issue; the 5-day workweek schedule

The facts reveal that on or around May 18, 1976, the Respondent put Ruffen on a 40-hour week schedule. For 1 day (8 hours) on Saturday, Ruffen was employed in a position described as an "autoclave" position. For 4 days (32 hours) Ruffen was employed as a nurses aide. This 40-hour week schedule was set up to last until October 2, 1976. However, as of October 19, 1976, the time of the commencement of the strike, Ruffen was still employed on a 40-hour week basis. No explanation was presented into evidence to reveal why Ruffen was continued on a 40-hour week basis. Absent evidence to reveal otherwise, it is reasonable to presume that Ruffen's employment for 40 hours per week would have continued beyond October 19, 1977.

Respondent's obligation to Ruffen, an unfair labor practice striker, on March 3, 1977, and thereafter, was to return her to the job she held prior to the October 1976 strike. Such job consisted of work for 40 hours per week, 8 hours as an autoclave employee on Saturday, and 32 hours as a nurses aide during the rest of the week. Instead, on June 2, 1977, the Respondent offered Ruffen a job in a vacancy in her "former" position of Saturday autoclave technician. Ruffen was reemployed for such autoclave work on Saturday, June 4, 1976. Later, exactly when is not clear, Ruffen was given 2 more days (16 hours) of autoclave work per week.[17]

It is clear that the Respondent did not assign Ruffen work for a 40-hour week until December 4, 1977. It is undisputed that Ruffen was fully reinstated as of December 4, 1977.

Considering all of the foregoing, I conclude and find that the Respondent, on March 3, 1977, and thereafter, was obligated to reinstate Ruffen to a job having the equivalency of a 40-hour workweek. Thus, reinstatement of Ruffen was not complete and proper until December 4, 1977.

(3) The average earnings

The facts set forth with respect to the reinstatement issue reveal a reasonable basis for belief that Ruffen's hours of employment per week would have continued on the basis of 40 hours per week in the backpay period. This being so, a formula using average earnings based on a representative time period of similar employment is more reasonable than one using a mixed history of less than 40 hours per week with earnings based on 40 hours per week or on a workweek of less than 40 hours a week. I find the General Counsel's formula of average earnings based on a 40-hour week as represented by earnings in the third quarter of 1976 to be reasonable.

(4) The computations

Based on the foregoing and the pleadings and admissions therein, the computations for Ruffen's backpay are as follows:[18]

[16] Ruffen's questionnaire executed on November 12, 1980, and the "attachment" executed on September 18, 1981, is contradictory of her testimony that she sought work other than at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital and the Boston City Hospital.

[17] This work was created by a problem relating to Gloria Poole, another autoclave employee.

Introduction

This case involves an unfair labor practice strike which commenced on October 19, 1976. The strike was caused and prolonged by the Respondent's refusal to negotiate with the Union in good faith.

The testimony of witnesses for the Union and the Respondent demonstrated that the strike evoked hostility from both sides and that a great residue of such hostility still existed at the time of the backpay trial herein. Essentially, the overall facts reveal that the Respondent had refused to bargain with the Union, "replaced" strikers, attempted to operate throughout the strike, utilized buses and police protection, and had some strikers arrested. The facts reveal that there was much usage of insulting and profane language by some strikers, personal confrontation with employees and supervisors, picketing at individual homes, and some violence. As to some of the violence, the facts are insufficient to attach blame on the Union or individual strikers.

The critical events as to alleged misconduct occurred around 5 years before the trial of this backpay proceeding. Around the time of the events, the Respondent and the Union were represented by counsel, and all parties should reasonably have been aware of the importance of the question of misconduct as affecting the rights of strikers to be reinstated. It should also be noted that soon after some of the incidents, unfair labor practice charges were filed against the Union, and later a 10(j) injunction was sought. Since the underlying unfair labor practice case was being processed around the same time, all of the ingredients for an investigation of most of the salient incidents involved and a preservation of written statement for aid in pinpointing timing of events were clearly possible.

Despite the above-referred-to aids available for utilization in the narrowing of issues and in the presentation of evidence precisely related to time and detail, much of the evidence and testimony of many of the witnesses was presented in a generalized and conclusionary manner.

[19] Because Ruffen engaged in a willful failure to seek work (loss of earnings) during the period of time March 3 to 31, 1977, backpay is disallowed for such period.

[20] Because Ruffen engaged in willful failure to seek work (loss of earnings) during the period of time April 1 to June 2, 1977, backpay is disallowed for such period. Ruffen's gross backpay for June 2, 3, and 4 was at the rate of $24.70 per day.

a. Rena Baskin

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Excepting for the question of whether Baskin engaged in serious misconduct during the strike (removing her from the remedial protection of the Act) and whether there should be an offset to gross backpay in the nature of equivalent interim earnings because of the value of a room furnished to her in interim employment, there are no other issues concerning backpay due Baskin.

(1) Misconduct by Baskin

During the events of 1976 and 1977 relating to the question of reinstatement of Baskin, Jane Levin was director and Diana Richards was assistant to the director of Preterm. The Respondent presented evidence relating to the Respondent's refusal to reinstate Baskin because of misconduct which was considered in arriving at a decision not to reinstate Baskin as of March 2, 1977. Thus, Levin and Richards testified to incidents of misconduct by Baskin, incidents either personally observed by them or reported to them.

The testimony of the witnesses relating to reports is largely conclusionary and wherein not amplified by other evidence is not sufficiently probative to warrant a finding of good-faith belief of disqualifying misconduct.

The evidence referred to above relating to misconduct by Baskin may be broken down as follows:

a. Levin credibly testified to the effect that on the first day of the strike (October 19, 1976) she observed Baskin at 9 a.m. engage in misconduct. Levin's testimony was as follows:[21]

> Q. What did you specifically see Miss Baskin do at 9 a.m. on the corner of Beacon and Englewood?
>
> A. It was a little like a boxing session. The person would try to move in one direction and then she would move in that direction, and then when she finally grabbed the person below the elbows and just sort of going like this. And I called down—
> Q. Can you describe in words the grabbing aspect that you are gesturing?
>
> A. She sort of took the person's arms right about here—
> Q. What is here? You have to describe it in words.
>
> A. Below the elbow, it was sort of trying to stir the person.
> Q. This person, was this a non-striking employee, was this a patient, was this a bystander?
>
> A. It was a non-striking employee.
> Q. And do you know who it was, do you recall?
> A. No, I don't remember.

[21] I discredit Baskin's denial of the described incident. Many of the denials elicited from the General Counsel's witnesses were elicited by questions phrased in part with verbiage of "do you recollect" or "do you recall." Denials elicited by such questions are not accorded great weight.

I sent a word down to the first floor to ask the police to please take note of what was happening. It was not in the immediate area where the police were, and the police intervened and escorted the staff person.

b. Levin credibly testified to the effect that several weeks later she observed Baskin with a patient, that Baskin "took the patient under her arm and was trying to steer her away," that the patient started to cry. Levin further described the situation as is revealed by the following credited excerpts from her testimony:

Q. Did you see her pull her some way or push her some way, or what?

A. She didn't push her, she sort of pulled her. It wasn't terribly hard, but the person was terribly frightened. It wasn't as much of a resistance, a resisting situation as the first incident, because the person didn't really resist that much. She just didn't understand what was happening.

Q. In what direction was she being pushed?

A. Down away from the clinic.

Levin testified to a belief that Baskin was "steering" the patient to a car that Levin believed was being used by strikers to take patients to another clinic.

c. Richards and Levin credibly testified to a number of incidents wherein Baskin screamed and shouted statements to Richards, Levin, or Coordinator Feinbloom as they entered or left Preterm's parking lot.[22]

One of the incidents testified to by Richards concerned an event occurring around November 1 to 19, 1976, wherein Baskin screamed at Coordinator Feinbloom and told her in effect that she (Feinbloom) had sold out women and was rotten and undesirable. Baskin's language included some words having sexual connotations.

Another incident, testified to by Levin, concerned an event occurring around November 1 to 19, 1976, when Baskin screamed and yelled at Levin. During such screaming and yelling, Baskin used terms of a profane, vulgar, or obscene nature and also set forth the following as is revealed by the following excerpts from Levin's testimony:

Q. Anything else you remember?

A. "Running that god damn murder clinic. You are murdering all the patients. You are running it without nurses and doctors. You are stealing money, paying everything to yourself and you are not paying anything to the staff."

. . . .

Q. Okay. Anything further about this incident?

A. Yes. She threw small objects through the grating.

Q. Did she throw a couple items, two dozen items—

A. No, I would say three or four.

. . . .

Q. With regard to these small objects that were being thrown through, I never heard you identify, for example, the small objects that Rena Baskin was throwing through the grate. Do you have any memory of what they were?

A. I believe they were all pretty much the same thing.

Q. What was what?

A. There are pebbles right near the area and leaves and paper, and I believe it was all the same type thing.

Richards, Levin, and others testified to other incidents wherein Baskin used profane or vulgar language directed to them or others.

Some of the testimony of Levin and Richards was to the composite effect that there were reports of misconduct by Baskin which constituted a part of the basis for their decision not to reinstate Baskin. Suffice it to say that the generalized testimony as to such reports lacked probative value to support the Respondent's burden of showing a basis for good-faith belief of such alleged misconduct. In any event, I find Baskin's denial of such incidents as referred to in such reports to be more credible than the naked unsupported reports and so credit Baskin's denial.

The General Counsel filed a petition for a 10(j) injunction with the Federal district court wherein certain allegations of conduct, of a serious misconduct nature, by Baskin were alleged. Baskin testified in denial that she engaged in such conduct as alleged in such petition. In the state of the record as presented, I find Baskin's testimonial denial credible and credit such denials.

Contentions and Conclusions

The Respondent's pleadings averred and the Respondent contended at trial and in its brief, in effect, that the Respondent did not reinstate Baskin on and after March 3, 1977, because Baskin engaged in serious misconduct of the type which removed her from the remedial protection of the Act. The Respondent further contends that the Respondent's underlying unfair labor practices did not constitute justification for Baskin's misconduct. The Respondent's presentation of evidence of contended misconduct or basis of belief of misconduct consisted of direct evidence relating to certain incidents of alleged misconduct, reports of misconduct, and of the allegations in a 10(j) petition.

The General Counsel and the Charging Party contend that Baskin did not engage in serious misconduct, and that the misconduct alleged to have been engaged in would have been justified by virtue of the Respondent's underlying unfair labor practice.

As to the "reports" of misconduct, the facts establish that such incidents, as "reported" but not supported by direct evidence, did not occur. As to the existence of a certain allegation of misconduct in a 10(j) petition, the facts similarly establish that such conduct did not occur.

[22] I discredit Baskin's denial of these incidents. I found Levin's and Richards' testimonial demeanor while testifying to such incidents more frank, forthright, and truthful appearing than I did Baskin's testimony in denial thereof.

As to the contention of supportive justification or lack of justification for misconduct by virtue of the Respondent's underlying unfair labor practices, the facts reveal that the underlying unfair labor practices consisted of a basic type refusal-to-bargain violation essentially unaccompanied by "unilateral" changes, "threats" or related unfair labor practices. There is, of course, some difference in the consideration of whether some leeway or justification should be accorded misconduct for an unfair labor practice striker as compared to an "economic" striker. In the instant case I am not persuaded that great leeway or justification should be accorded employees who engaged in misconduct. Essentially, the question of serious misconduct is to be viewed in the normal sense of the word.

The Respondent contends and the General Counsel and the Charging Party deny that Baskin used profanity toward Director Levin and others. Similarly, the parties dispute whether the usage of "profanity" or obscenity in a strike situation constitutes serious misconduct of the type to remove Baskin from the protection of the Act.

The facts reveal that Baskin did use insulting, profane, and vulgar language in remarks to Levin, Richards, and others. Such language certainly is not commendable and is to be deplored. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court of the United States in Linn v. Plant Guard Workers Local 114, 383 U.S. 53 (1966), and Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264 (1974), has in effect determined that usage of insulting, profane, and vulgar language, in a strike context, is to be tolerated. The question as to "language" of such a nature or of a disparaging nature concerns whether the same was made with malice or with reckless disregard. Included in such assessment is whether a hearer or reader would understand the same as rhetoric or not.[23] I am persuaded that the Linn and Austin cases have obliterated the validity of American Tool Workers Co., 116 NLRB 1681 (1956), as a holding that "profanity" in a strike situation is not to be tolerated. In sum, I find that the usage by Baskin of vulgar and insulting language did not constitute serious misconduct removing her from the remedial protection of the Act.[24]

The Respondent contends that Baskin's remarks to Levin about a "murder clinic," about "murdering all the patients," and the other remarks were disparaging remarks of the type to constitute serious misconduct.

Although the language as referred to is not commendable, I am persuaded that Levin knew that Baskin's remarks were made only as strike rhetoric. For the same reasons as set forth above with respect to the argument about "profanity," I am persuaded that the above described language used by Baskin to Levin comes under the umbrella of the Linn and Austin doctrine and does not constitute serious strike misconduct when directed only at or heard by the employer's agents.

The Respondent contends that Baskin's throwing of objects at Levin constituted an act of misconduct. The facts reveal that some small objects, like pebbles, were thrown at Levin by Baskin. The sum of the facts reveal that no harm was done and that the incident was inconsequential in nature and clearly did not constitute serious misconduct by Baskin.[25]

The Respondent contends in effect that Baskin's encounter with a staff employee, described above, constituted an assault on a nonstriking employee. The Respondent contends that Baskin's encounter with said staff employee and with a patient set forth in the facts beforehand, constituted serious misconduct of the type to warrant removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Baskin. The facts relating to these incidents, if revealing of misconduct, reveal an insignificant degree of misconduct.[26]

In sum, the evidence does not reveal that Baskin engaged in misconduct (during the unfair labor practice strike) of such a nature as to remove her from the protection of the Act. It follows and I conclude and find that the Respondent was obligated to reinstate Baskin on March 3, 1977, following the Union's unconditional offer for her return to work.[27]

(2) Interim earnings

Baskin's backpay period ran from March 3, 1977, to May 26, 1978. During the backpay period Baskin became employed by the Boston Conservatory of Music in September 1977, and worked as a dormitory director throughout the remainder of her backpay period. Baskin received a salary of $100 a month as dormitory director. Baskin also received certain other wages in addition to the $100 monthly salary during the year 1978. As dormitory director, Baskin was required to stay in a school dormitory during the first and second semesters. Baskin's employment with the school was postulated on the basis that she would receive room and board as normally received by one who paid a residence fee. Such fee was $1250 for the first semester and $650 for the second semester. The board consisted of certain meals furnished by the school. Baskin entered into an arrangement with the school whereby she received $89 per month in lieu of meals. The school, for income tax purposes, reported the above-referred-to $89 as income. The school was not required to and did not report any equivalent value, for income tax purposes, for the furnishing of the dormitory room.

The backpay specifications set forth for Baskin's interim earnings a sum equal to the total of her salary and $89 per month for meals.

The Respondent argues that those who enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act construe the furnishing of a room to an employee as wages. The General Counsel argues that the Internal Revenue Service does not construe the furnishing of a room to an employee required to stay in such a room to be wages.

The Internal Revenue Service is concerned with the question of taxation and what should be taxed. There is and probably always will be dispute on the equitability of tax laws. The Fair Labor Standards Act is concerned with whether employees are treated fairly by the employer. The National Labor Relations Act, and the administration of the Act by the National Labor Relations Board, with respect to remedial orders and backpay determinations, is concerned with making the employee whole for loss of wages and benefits suffered as a result of discrimination. I am persuaded that the receipt of a furnished room, by an employee from an employer, may or may not be an item of constructive earnings to be computed in interim earnings. The receipt of such furnished room may be of value, may be of no value, or may be of less value to the backpay claimant than the same would be to someone else. Thus, if a backpay claimant lived at a family home nearby the site of the furnished room and had no cost, or substantially less costs than attributed normally to such room, the value of such room for constructed interim earnings would have to be adjusted or not accorded at all.

In the instant case, there is limited data to aid in determining the value of the room furnished Baskin by the Boston Conservatory of Music. The overall facts, indicating that Baskin stayed at the school and used the dormitory room after the backpay period and during the summer months of 1978 after the school year, preponderate for a finding that the dormitory room had value for Baskin. Baskin's statements submitted to the National Labor Relations Board indicated a belief that the total of the residential fees ($1900) prorated on a monthly basis for the entire year revealed a monthly value of $158 for the room. Baskin's statement indicated that she believed that $158 was a fair value for one room. I note that this determination ignored the fact that the $1900 residence fee covered both room and board. The record indicates that a reasonable fair market value of the meals (covered by the $1900 residence fee) was $89 per month. Further, the $1900 residence fee covered the first semester (4 months) and second semester (5 months). Baskin's statement to the Board reflected a reasonable basis of why the school charged a higher fee for the first semester. I find it reasonable and appropriate that the residence fee should be prorated for the 9-month period. Thus, $1900 (meals and room per residence fee) prorated for the 9 months equals $211 for meals and room per month. The evidence in the record reveals that $89 represents a fair market value for meals per month. It follows that $122 represents a fair value on a monthly basis for the room furnished Baskin. The referred-to $89, fair market value for meals, has already been included in the interim earnings for Baskin. Since the room had value to Baskin, and no offsetting considerations have been presented, the amount of $122 for the value of such room per month should be added to the interim earnings of Baskin for the backpay period from September 1977 to May 26, 1978.

[28] The facts persuade that Baskin had worked at the Boston Conservatory of Music for 1 month during the third quarter of 1977, had received $100 in pay, received $89 for meals, and that $122 should be included as interim earnings for the value of the room furnished by the school.

[29] The facts persuade that Baskin had worked for 3 months at the Boston Conservatory of Music during the fourth quarter of 1977, had received $300 in pay, had received $267 for meals, and that $366 should be included as interim earnings for the value of the room furnished by the school.

(3) Net backpay

In accordance with the foregoing, the computations of Baskin's backpay should be as follows:

Calendar Quarters	Gross Back-pay	Net Interim Earnings	Net Back-pay
1977–I	549.40	0	$549.40
1977–II	1726.69	0	1726.69

b. Anne Erde

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Excepting for the questions of whether Erde's backpay period should be tolled as of August 1, 1977, when she moved to New York, New York, from Boston, Massachusetts, and as to whether Erde engaged in serious misconduct during the strike which removed her from the remedial protection of the Act, there are no other issues concerning backpay due Erde.

(1) Erde's misconduct

a. The strike commenced on October 19, 1976. During the first 3 or 4 weeks of the strike, Erde "pounded" (with her fist) on two cars taking employees to work, as the cars were near the rear of the Preterm building. During the same period of time, but at another specific time event, Erde also pounded on the side of a school bus used to transport employees to work. On both the [30] The facts persuade that Baskin had worked for 3 months at the Boston Conservatory of Music during the first quarter of 1978, had received $535.12 in salary or certain benefits, had received $267 for meals, and that $366 should be included as interim earnings for the value of the room furnished by the school.

[31] The facts persuade that Baskin had worked for 8 weeks for the Boston Conservatory of Music during the second quarter of 1978, during the backpay period, that her wages and certain other earnings for such period of time was $448.88, that she received $164.30 for meals (8/13 x $267) and that $225.23 (8/13 x $366) should be added to interim earnings for the value of the room furnished to Baskin. The above calculations are based on fair inferences drawn from the record as a whole. In any event, it is clear that $225.23 should be added to the interim earnings of $613.18, previously set forth in the pleadings and that the resultant net backpay is $315.35.

referred-to occasions, Erde was with a number of other strikers.[32]

b. During the first 2 weeks of the strike, Erde, around 8:30 a.m., stood in front of a car and when the car then passed by her, used some type of object to scratch the car on two door panels.[33]

c. On a number of occasions Erde made insulting or vulgar remarks at Director Levin.[34]

d. Levin testified concerning the usage by Erde and some other striking employees (in the presence of patients) of the terminology of "Murderers, don't go in there, there are murderers there." Considering the presentation of such testimony, I am persuaded that I must find that it simply lacks sufficient persuasiveness of objectivity or preciseness to have probative value for a finding of "misconduct." Levin's testimony in large part was generalized and conclusionary, reflected an intenseness and a difficulty in being related to specific incidents. It appeared more a blurred summary of overall recollection of similar incidents. I do not find it to have probative value. Accordingly, I do not find the evidence sufficient to establish that Erde made the remarks alluded to by Levin on a specific occasion.

e. Early in the strike, between 8:30 and 9:30 a.m., Erde told Yvonne Sullivan, a black Preterm supervisor, as she was entering the front of the Preterm building, that she (Sullivan) was a disgrace to her race.

f. The General Counsel's 10(j) petition alleged that "on or about October 23, 1976, picketers Anne Erde and Rena Baskin followed two nonstriking employees away from the picket line and threatened to kill the two nonstriking employees." No evidence was presented to affirmatively establish that such threats were made. I have previously credited Baskin's denial of such alleged threats. I also credit Erde's denial of such alleged threats.

Conclusions

Considering all of the foregoing, I am persuaded that Erde's scratching of the door panels on a car constituted serious misconduct removing her from the remedial protection of the Act. It follows that the Respondent's obligation to reinstate Erde had been eliminated as of March 2, 1977, and that Erde is not entitled to receive backpay.[35] Accordingly, it is determined that the Respondent owes no backpay to Erde.

I would not find that the three incidents of Erde's "pounding" on cars or buses sufficient to constitute serious misconduct warranting her removal from the remedial protection of the Act. The usage of the word "pounding" in describing conduct is conclusionary in nature. It is clear that some incidents of "pounding" might constitute serious misconduct and other incidents of pounding might not constitute serious misconduct.

I do not find other contended incidents of misconduct to have been established. Thus, I do not find the incident of Erde's usage of insulting or vulgar remarks to Levin to constitute serious misconduct warranting the removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Erde.[36] I do not find the facts to establish a properly litigated incident of Erde's having used the terminology of "Murderers, etc.," in front of pickets. Erde's remarks to Sullivan to the effect that Sullivan was a disgrace to her race does not remotely approach conduct of a serious misconduct nature. Further, the facts establish that Erde did not threaten to kill two nonstriking employees.

(2) The question of tolling of the obligation to reinstate

The Respondent's answer averred that Erde's backpay period ended on August 1, 1977, when Erde moved to New York City from Boston.

The sum of the facts clearly reveals that Erde diligently sought work during the backpay period while in the Boston area and while in the New York area. It is clear that Erde did not remove herself from the job market so as to disqualify her for the receipt of constructive backpay on the theory of a willful loss of earnings.

The Respondent's contention, however, may be viewed as a contention that Erde's removal to New York from the Boston area constituted in effect a constructive removal from her Preterm job or potential Preterm job reinstatement.

The facts are clear that Erde and her husband had been separated for 2 years prior to August 1977, that Erde continued to live in the Boston area from October 1976 to August 1977, that her husband lived in New York and was trying to start a video tape production business, that Erde and her husband decided to reconcile, that at the time (of such decision to reconcile) Erde and her husband discussed whether she should move to New York City or whether he would return to the Boston area, that Erde and her husband decided that she would move to New York since she did not have a job at Boston, and that Erde moved in August 1977 to New York.[37]

It should be noted that (absent the question of disqualifying serious misconduct) Erde had a statutory right as an unfair labor practice striker on and after March 3, 1977, to be reinstated to her former job at Preterm. In my opinion, the principles of waiver are applicable to the assessment of whether Erde abandoned her right of rein-

[32] The facts are based on aspects of the credited testimony of Richards. I discredit Erde's testimony inconsistent with the facts found. I have carefully considered the credibility of all of the witnesses and the presentation of the evidence. Much of Richards' and Levin's testimony was presented in a generalized and conclusionary manner. Much of said testimony was supplemented after leading questions were used. Consequently, the weight of such testimony is not overwhelming. Nevertheless, I found the facts as indicated to be more persuasive than Erde's denials. I do not, however, find the conclusionary testimony as to the "blocking" of cars to be of sufficient probative value and do not find such "blocking" of cars to have been established. Nor do I find the testimony that Erde and other pickets pushed and shoved against a police line to have real meaning as regards the question of misconduct.

[33] The facts are based on Levin's credited testimony. Erde's denial is discredited.

[34] The facts are based on Levin's credited testimony. Erde's denial is discredited.

statement to her Preterm job when she moved to New York City. Thus, the facts must reveal a clear and unequivocal waiver of such right. The facts in the instant case at most reveal a question of ambiguous inferences. For all the facts, concerning the nature of Erde's husband's employment, it is speculative as to whether Erde or her husband would have remained in New York City rather than returning to Boston had there been a reinstatement offer at any time prior to May 26, 1978. Accordingly, if it were assumed that Erde's conduct had not removed the remedial protection of the Act from her, it must be found that her backpay period extended to May 26, 1978.

c. Nancy Harmon

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. There is an issue as to whether or not Harmon engaged in strike misconduct which removed the remedial protection of the Act from her. There is also an issue as to whether Harmon engaged in a willful loss of earnings.

(1) The alleged misconduct

The Respondent contends that its reason for refusal to reinstate Harmon was based on acts of misconduct by Harmon believed or known by the Respondent to have occurred.

Thus, Levin testified to having considered certain reports from staff or patients relating to misconduct by Harmon. Levin's testimony was self-revealing as to its generalized nature and as to questions of reliability as regards such reports. Even without Harmon's denials of such alleged events, I would not find Levin's testimony as to such reports to have probative value to establish a good-faith belief basis for such alleged misconduct. I note that Levin's testimony alluded to a report, possibly by "Rabbit" (apparently a reference to employee Ravech). Harmon credibly denied having engaged in misconduct as referred to in Levin's testimony of reports of misconduct. Ravech did not testify as to having made such reports or as to such alleged misconduct by Harmon. In sum, the misconduct, or belief thereof, as set forth in Levin's testimony as to reports about misconduct by Harmon, is insufficient to establish an objective good-faith belief that Harmon engaged in misconduct, and the overall facts warrant a rejection of any contention, based on "reports," that Harmon engaged in misconduct removing the remedial protection of the Act from Harmon.

There are three alleged incidents of misconduct that merit consideration with respect to whether Harmon engaged in serious misconduct warranting the removal of the protection of the Act from her.

The first incident involves the question of whether or not Harmon used a rock and broke out a side window of a schoolbus which was transporting employees to work on Saturday, November 20, 1976. The witnesses presented with respect to this issue were Levin, Makaretz, Ravech, Harmon, and Erde. The overall record reveals that there was an incident on Saturday, November 20, 1976, where someone damaged a windshield on a schoolbus, and someone damaged a side window on the same schoolbus which was transporting employees to work.

Levin testified to the effect that Harmon, on the occasion concerning damage to the bus, smashed a window on the schoolbus (which was transporting employees) by hitting the same with a rock. Levin's testimony is revealed in effect by the following excerpts from her testimony:

> Q. And when you returned what specifically did you see?
> A. Nancy Harmon with a white mittened hand had a rock and smashed it against the window. The glass went flying around in that area of the bus. Some of the members of the staff got hysterical, started to cry. I started to take glass out of some people's hair, it was hanging over their eyes.
> . . . .
> Q. And can you describe the size of the rock?
>
> A. It wasn't too big, that's the best way I could describe it.
> Q. You are holding up one hand—
>
> A. Size, that's right.
> Q. Your testimony is it was a rock that she could and did hold in one hand?
>
> A. One hand, it was not with two hands.
> . . . .
> Q. And I think I asked you how that particular window was broken, if you know?
> A. That was when I saw Nancy Harmon, with a mitten and a rock; and she was sort of tapping. It was brought to my attention before it actually happened, because she was sort of tapping with this rock on the window. And then the next thing I knew it was—and the staff who were—you see the bus area, the side comes down very low on this bus—

Makaretz testified to the effect that Harmon smashed a window on a schoolbus transporting employees by hitting the same with a rock. Makaretz' testimony is revealed in effect by the following excerpts from her testimony:

> Q. Anything else that you recall about this incident?
> A. As I was sitting in the bus and watching what was happening in front, Nancy Harmon ran to the side of the bus where I was sitting with a rock in her hand, and she smashed the window at the side where I was sitting, and the glass cracked in the window.
> . . . .
> Q. She had a rock in her hand?
>
> A. Yes.
> Q. How large was this rock?
>
> A. I would say about 4 inches in diameter.
> Q. Do you recall which hand she had it in?
> A. Right.

> Q. Could you describe the action or the motion that she used to smash the window, to the best of your memory?
> A. She just hit the window with the rock.
> Q. Was she still holding onto the rock?
> A. Yes. She was holding onto the rock.
> Q. She didn't throw it?
> A. No.

Makaretz further testified to the effect that a person had kicked in the windshield on the bus before Harmon had smashed the side window with a rock. Levin testified with respect to a "photography" of a bus and of someone apparently kicking at the windshield on the bus. Levin's testimony was to the effect that the side window had been smashed before the windshield had been damaged. The sum of the evidence persuades that Markaretz' testimony as to the events is not reliable.

Harmon testified to the effect that she was present on a Saturday when the windshield on a bus was damaged. Harmon's overall testimony was to the effect that her recollection of the events was not good. Harmon did, however, testify in denial that she had broken a side window of the bus with a rock. Harmon testified to the effect that she was 4 feet 9 inches tall, was left-handed, and normally did not use her right hand.

Harmon testified to the effect that she did not recall who she was with at the time of the events, that she might have had her child with her, that she did not remember Anne Erde's being present.

Anne Erde testified to the effect that she and her child were with Harmon and her child at the scene of the bus incident and that she did not see Harmon hit the bus side window with a rock.

The credibility resolution in this case presents a difficult task. The events occurred around 5 years prior to the time of the witnesses' testimony, and there is no indication that the parties have had the advantage of an investigation around the time of the events or of a preservation of investigatory type affidavits.

I have found Makaretz' testimony as to the bus incident to be unreliable.

Considering all of the events and Erde's testimony as a whole, I also find little value and attach virtually no weight to Erde's testimony as to the resolution of the dispute as to the facts relating to Harmon's alleged misconduct. The resolution of the dispute boils down to a consideration of whether to believe Levin or Harmon.

It is self-evident that a witness would have better recall of positive and special incidents as compared to negative type incidents. If Levin had seen Harmon smash a window with a rock, it is reasonable that she would recall the same. If Harmon had not smashed a window with a rock, it is reasonable that she would not recall nonexciting type of details as to who else was present at the time of a contended event. The demeanor impressions given by Levin and Harmon were equally good. Levin could be testifying truthfully that she saw Harmon use a rock and smash the side window. On the other hand, Levin could believe that Harmon smashed the window with a rock and as a result of rationalization be convinced that she saw Harmon use a rock and smash the side window. Harmon could either be testifying truthfully or untruthfully about the events. The burden is on the Respondent to establish a good-faith belief of or the fact of serious misconduct on the part of Harmon. Simply speaking, the Respondent has not met this burden by presenting persuasive evidence that his witnesses are testifying more credibly to facts to support the contention of serious misconduct by Harmon than Harmon is testifying in denial of such conduct.[38]

Levin also testified to the effect that on the same occasion on November 20, 1976, Harmon made certain remarks to her as she and others left the schoolbus to go into the Preterm building. Levin's testimony as to these remarks was as is revealed by the following excerpts from Levin's testimony:

> Q. Let me stop you. Is this after the window has been broken?
> A. That's right. And we formed a chain link, everybody held someone's hand and we proceeded to walk very quickly into the building. And at that time Nancy Harmon came up very close to me and shrieked, "We are going to get you. This is just the beginning."

Harmon testified in denial of having made such remarks as attributed to her by Levin. For the same reasons as previously set forth, I do not find Levin's testimony to appear more credible than the testimony of Harmon. Accordingly, the Respondent has failed to meet the burden of persuasion of credibility of witnesses and consequently has failed to establish the facts needed to prove the alleged misconduct. However, were the facts to be established as testified to by Levin, I would not find such remarks, allegedly made by Harmon, to constitute serious misconduct warranting the removal of the protection of the Act from Harmon.[39]

Levin also testified to the effect that Harmon was part of a large number of pickets that blocked and impeded a car, in which she was riding, on an occasion around 3 weeks after the strike started on October 19, 1976. Levin testified to the effect that Harmon made threats to her on this occasion. Levin's testimony as to what occurred is revealed by the following excerpts from the record:

> It was probably about three weeks after the beginning of the strike.
> . . . .
>
> And that was trying to enter into the garage in a car.
> . . . .

[38] Blue Flash Express, 109 NLRB 591 (1954). I note that the record reveals the presence of a number of policemen on the scene and that Harmon was not arrested for the damage to the side window. It would appear that if a policeman saw Harmon smash the window with a rock, an arrest of Harmon would have been made. An arrest not having been made, in view of the overall facts, is indicative that great commotion existed at the time, and that there could be honest confusion as to what occurred.

[39] Such remarks do not appear to constitute a serious threat. Capitol Rubber Co., 201 NLRB 715, 722 (1973); Firestone Tire Co., 187 NLRB 54, 56 (1970).

We were having trouble negotiating taking the corner and I guess the reason for it is that there were large numbers of people—

. . . .

You have to make a very sharp turn, no matter which way you are coming from you have to take a sharp turn.

. . . .

I believe there were a group of people that were close by and we were having trouble making the turn.

. . . .

Off of the sidewalk, close into the driveway. The driveway was totally blocked, but it was hard to maneuver the car around, which happened often.

. . . .

Q. Okay. And what then specifically happened at this incident involving Nancy Harmon?

A. She came up against the window where I was and banged very hard on the window and said, "We are going to show you. We are going to get you. We are going to finish Preterm."

Harmon testified in denial of the above incident. For the same reasons as previously set forth, I do not find Levin's testimony to appear more credible than the testimony of Harmon. Accordingly, the Respondent has failed to meet the burden of persuasion of credibility of witnesses and consequently has failed to establish the facts needed to prove the alleged misconduct. However, were I to find Levin's testimony more credible than Harmon's, I would not find the testimony to be reliable to establish that the pickets were blocking the passage of the car in which Levin was allegedly riding. Much of Levin's testimony was conclusionary. I am not persuaded that Levin's testimony, if believed, has essential reliability and sufficient probative value to establish that the car was blocked. If, however, the pickets blocked the car in which Levin was riding, such blocking of the car and such alleged remarks by Harmon do not constitute serious misconduct of such nature to warrant the removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Harmon.[40]

(2) The interim earnings issue (the search for work)

Prior to September 1976, Harmon had worked at Preterm on the basis of a 4-day (32-hour) week. Around September 1976, Harmon enrolled in the New England School of Law. Around this time Harmon changed her hours of employment from a 4-day (32-hour) to a 2-day (16-hour) week at Preterm.

After the commencement of the unfair labor practice strike on October 19, 1976, Harmon sought employment at hospitals and abortion clinics. Harmon credibly testified to contacting a large number of hospitals and abortion clinics and to having filed written applications for employment. Harmon credibly testified that she continued to check newspaper advertisements and to talk to people in other abortion agencies concerning job opportunities during the backpay period. Harmon only was able to obtain work of a law clerk type.

The sum of the above evidence clearly reveals that Harmon made due and diligent search for work during the backpay period. Having filed applications for employment with various potential employers, Harmon's efforts to secure employment otherwise clearly reveal that she was not attempting to cause a willful loss of earnings.

Harmon credibly testified to the effect that she had the responsibility for her child, needed a good paying job, and that she would have accepted other work than as a law clerk if such job were available at good wages. The sum of such evidence reveals that Harmon had not abandoned the abortion counseling type work to concentrate on legal type work. Further, Harmon's employment in legal type work reveals that Harmon was not engaged in a willful loss of employment.[41] At most, the Respondent's contention that Harmon had voluntarily removed herself from the job market is a speculative contention.

The sum of the facts does not reveal that Harmon engaged in a willful loss of earnings during the backpay period.

(3) Backpay due Harmon

Considering the foregoing findings, and the pleadings and admissions in this case,[42] it is concluded and found that the backpay due Harmon, plus interest, is as follows:

CALENDAR QTRS.	NET BACKPAY
1977–I	$305.63
1977–II	960.57
1977–III	317.33
1977–IV	578.47
1978–I	620.49
1978–II	381.84

d. Lucy Matson

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. There are issues as to whether Matson engaged in strike misconduct which removed the remedial protection of the Act from her.

The incidents of misconduct or alleged misconduct by Matson are as follows:

1. On the first day of the strike Matson impeded the progress of three to four automobiles attempting to enter the rear Preterm parking lot by physically standing in front of the automobiles and pounding on the hoods of the cars.[43] The automobiles would stop and then start up slowly and proceed onward within an estimated 5 to 10 minutes. There is no evidence that Matson damaged any of the cars by her pounding on the hoods.

[40] See fn. 39.

[41] See Ozark Hardwood Co., 119 NLRB 1130, 1133 (1957).

[42] With minor correction concerning inadvertent erroneous computation.

[43] The facts are based on the credited testimony of Richards. The credibility resolution is close. However, I found Richards to appear to be slightly the most credible witness as to such incident.

Considering the above incident, in context with all of the facts, I am persuaded that such conduct, by Matson, did not constitute serious misconduct warranting the removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Matson.

2. Richards testified to the effect that employee Pinero, during the early weeks of the strike, kicked and pounded on cars, and obstructed the progress of cars. Richards testified that Matson did exactly the same thing. Such testimony was generalized and conclusionary in nature. The Respondent did not elicit any specifics from Richards as to Matson's kicking of cars. Matson denied that she kicked cars. Considering the probative value of the testimony, I found Matson's denial to be more credible and believable than I did Richards' testimony as indicated.

3. On a morning in November 1976, Matson and around 10 to 12 pickets ran up the front steps at Preterm and in effect crashed or ran into the door.[44] There is no evidence that any damage was done to the door.

Considering the above incident, in context with all of the facts, I am persuaded that such conduct, by Matson, did not constitute serious misconduct warranting the removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Matson.

4. On an occasion, around 3 weeks after October 19, 1976, around 4:30 to 6 p.m., Matson yelled through the grating, near the garage, to Levin who was getting in her car. Matson told Levin that she had better take the strikers back or she would be sorry, that what had happened to her then was nothing compared to what was going to happen to her later.[45]

There was some evidence presented as to serious problems that had occurred at Levin's home and of activities directed toward Levin. It suffices to say that the evidence as a whole is insufficient to reveal that Matson's remarks related to such events.

Considering the facts as a whole, the remarks of Matson are insufficient to establish that such remarks in and of themselves, or in the context of other events, constitute serious misconduct warranting the removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Matson. At most, such remarks appear no more than talk and do not appear to reveal a serious threat.[46]

5. In February 1977, on three occasions, Matson and Levin had encounters involving patients who were entering into Preterm's premises. On such occasions Matson moved or placed herself in such a position as to attempt to block Levin's access to the patients. On one occasion Matson spoke to the patient and told the patient in effect not to believe anything that came from Levin's mouth, that it was not safe to go into the clinic, that Preterm had hired people who were not properly trained. On another occasion Matson told a patient that it was dangerous to go into the clinic, that the patient could be seriously hurt and that Preterm did not know what it was doing.[47]

Considering the foregoing facts, in context with all of the facts, I am persuaded that Matson engaged in serious misconduct of the type which removed her from the remedial protection of the Act. In making such determination, I do not find that the temporary blocking of Levin to constitute serious misconduct. I do find, however, the statements to the patients that it was not safe to go into the clinic, that it was dangerous to go in the clinic, that the patient could be seriously hurt, and that Preterm did not know what it was doing, constituted serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove Matson from the remedial protection of the Act.

In determining that such conduct constituted serious misconduct outside the protection of the Act, I have considered the latitude to be allowed strikers in their rhetoric and whether such statements were with malice or with reckless disregard of the truth. The instant strike involved abortion counselors. There is no basis from the overall facts to reveal that Preterm was not prepared to furnish proper professional services by doctors and similar professionals for those who desired abortions. There is no evidence to reveal a sincere or reasonable belief that any patient was being placed in danger by the services offered by Preterm. Nor do the facts reveal that "patients" would reasonably construe Matson's remarks as mere rhetoric. Rather, patients attempting to enter an abortion clinic reasonably could be expected to have concern for whether anticipated surgical procedures were unsafe or dangerous. It is further clear that Matson and the other strikers should have been aware of such concerns. Under such circumstances, Matson's remarks reveal a reckless disregard for the truth and to be outside the protective ambit of tolerance to be accorded to strike speech. In sum, the facts reveal Matson's remarks, relating to dangerous and unsafe conditions, to constitute serious misconduct removing Matson from the remedial protection of the Act.

6. In early November 1976, on a morning between 7:30 and 8 a.m., Matson encountered nonstriking employee DeAngelis on a subway train. Matson, in a loud voice, told DeAngelis that she was a scab, that she stole employees' jobs, that Levin was "in it for the money," and that DeAngelis was a fool and naive.[48]

Considering the above facts, or any contended presented version of facts about the incident, I find the facts do not reveal serious misconduct by Matson warranting the removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Matson.

7. In December 1976 Matson and a nonstriking employee named Grace Stead had an altercation on a street in Cambridge, Massachusetts. It is clear that the incident was triggered by the individuals' actions, remarks, and respective views relating to the Preterm strike. Stead re-

[44] The facts are based on Richards' credited testimony. To the extent that Matson's testimony is contradictory to the facts found, such testimony is discredited.

[45] The facts are based on the credited testimony of Levin. To the extent that Matson's testimony is a denial of this incident, such testimony is discredited.

[46] Capital Rubber Co., supra; Firestone Tire Co., supra.

[47] The facts are based on the credited aspects of Levin's testimony. Matson's testimony, inconsistent with the facts found, is discredited.

[48] The facts are based on the credited aspects of DeAngelis' testimony. There is little dispute between DeAngelis' and Matson's testimony. The ultimate findings of facts would not be affected if either were to be credited in whole or in part or not at all.

ported the incident to Levin and told Levin in effect that Matson was the aggressor and had hit her.

Matson credibly testified to the effect that an altercation with Stead occurred and that Stead was the agressor.

Considering the foregoing facts, the report to Levin by Stead constituted evidence to support a good-faith belief of serious misconduct by Matson. Matson's credited testimony, however, reveals that in fact she had not engaged in such serious misconduct as alleged. Accordingly, the incident, as a report or not, does not constitute serious misconduct warranting the removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Matson.

In sum, it has been found that Matson engaged in certain conduct, specifically found herein to constitute serious misconduct removing her from the remedial protection of the Act. Such conduct occurred prior to the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer for the strikers to return to work. It follows that the Respondent's obligation to reinstate Matson at such time had been eliminated by such serious misconduct and that, therefore, no backpay is due Matson by the Respondent.

e. Lillian Pinero

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Considering the foregoing and the pleadings and admissions therein, it is clear that Pinero's backpay period ran from March 3, 1977, to May 26, 1978, if certain alleged misconduct had not removed the remedial protection of the Act from Pinero.

(1) Misconduct

a. Richards testified concerning alleged incidents wherein Pinero blocked cars, pounded on cars, and kicked the sides of cars, attempted to kick employees, kicked two employees, and shouted vulgar remarks to persons who were entering the front entrance to Preterm.

The above testimony of Richards did not reach the necessary degree of probativeness to meet "due process" standards necessary for constituting that a specific incident had been litigated. The events allegedly involved occurred 5 years before the trial. Richards' testimony as to the alleged incident was generalized, conclusionary, and lacked preciseness as to details. The facts are insufficient to establish that Pinero engaged in specific incidents of misconduct as suggested by such testimony.

b. On an occasion on the first day or two of the strike, Pinero, around 8:30 a.m., encountered a nurse named Rappaport who was attempting to report to work. What occurred is revealed by the following credited excerpts from Levin's testimony:[49]

> Q. What did you see?
> A. One of our new, younger nurses was coming down the street across, this is right near the street, and Lilliane put herself in front of the nurse. And the nurse kept trying to get by her. She was very slight.
> Q. Who was the nurse you are referring to?
>
> A. I think her name was Rappaport, Laurie or something Rappaport.
> Q. Okay. You said Lilliane Pinero put herself in front of this nurse?
>
> A. And there was a lot of jockeying and gesticulation and talk, but obviously I don't know what the talk was except that the nurse really tried to move around and Lillie wouldn't let her, and finally grabbed her and shook her.
> Q. Who grabbed whom? I am not certain.
> A. Lillie grabbed the nurse and shook her. And the nurse started to cry, and at that point I was about to call downstairs to ask someone to get a police person and a policeman intervened and separated them—or, I should say, asked Lilliane to leave.

Considering the above facts, in context with all of the facts, I conclude and find that Pinero, in the described incident, engaged in serious misconduct of such a nature that said misconduct removed the remedial protection of the Act from Pinero.

c. One morning, early after October 19, 1976, Pinero damaged a car as it went through or by the picket line. On such occasion, Levin was a passenger in such vehicle. As the car passed Pinero, Pinero kicked the side of the car and dented the side to such an extent that it had to be repaired.[50]

Considering the above facts, in context with all of the facts, I conclude and find that Pinero, in the described incident, engaged in serious misconduct of such a nature that said misconduct removed the remedial protection of the Act from Pinero.

d. On another occasion, within the first 3 weeks after October 19, 1976, Pinero damaged another car as it crossed the picket line. On this occasion, DeAngelis was a passenger in such car. Pinero was on the right side of the car and kicked the right side of the automobile as it passed. As a result Pinero caused a dent in the side of the car.[51]

Considering the above facts, in context with all of the facts, I conclude and find that Pinero, in the described incident, engaged in serious misconduct of such a nature that said misconduct removed the remedial protection of the Act from Pinero.

e. On the first day of the strike, October 19, 1976, Nora Watts, a Preterm nurse, was in a car, around 5

[49] The facts are based on the credited aspects of Levin's testimony. As to this incident, I found Levin to appear a more frank, forthright, and credible witness than Pinero.

[50] The facts are based on the credited aspects of the testimony of Levin. As to this issue, Levin appeared a thoroughly frank, forthright, and truthful witness. Pinero's testimonial denial of this incident did not have the persuasiveness of truth. I credit Levin's testimony over Pinero's testimony where in conflict.

[51] The facts are based on credited aspects of the testimony of DeAngelis. I credit DeAngelis' testimony over Pinero's, as to the facts found, where there is dispute. DeAngelis also credibly testified to the effect that Pinero engaged in strike rhetoric at the time. I do not find DeAngelis' testimony to be of probative value to establish that Pinero blocked cars or that other similar incidents occurred.

p.m., leaving work. On such occasion, Pinero and a number of pickets surrounded the car and impeded its progress for several minutes. Pinero pounded on the window of the automobile and screamed.[52] Watts was "frightened" that the window would break.

Considering the above facts, I am persuaded that the evidence is insufficient to establish that Pinero, as to the described incident, engaged in serious misconduct warranting the loss of remedial protection of the Act. Similar to much of the testimony in this case, the evidence is of insufficient probativeness to determine that misconduct, if it occurred, reached the degree of serious misconduct warranting loss of remedial protection of the Act. Watts and other witnesses used general descriptive terms of blocking, pounding, and screaming. The overall testimony does not reveal that the car was blocked for more than an insignificant amount of time. There is no evidence that the pounding caused any damage. And there is no indication that the screaming was more than strike rhetoric.

f. The Respondent appears to have presented another alleged incident in support of its contentions that Pinero engaged in serious misconduct which was considered in its refusal to reinstate Pinero. Thus, the Respondent presented testimony by Makaretz relating to an alleged incident on the first day of the strike.

Makaretz testified to the effect that she and several nurses, including a nurse named Sandra White, were in a car on October 19, 1976, around 7:30 a.m., that Pinero jumped on the hood of the automobile as it entered into Preterm's back parking lot, that Pinero started pounding on the windshield, and that Pinero was yelling "scab" and "son of a bitch."

The general and conclusionary quality of the testimony has insufficient probative value to reveal that the conduct of jumping on the hood and pounding on the windshield constituted serious misconduct. It is clear that the alleged language did not constitute serious misconduct.

Assuming the facts to reveal serious misconduct by Pinero, the facts are insufficient to reveal that the Respondent considered such alleged misconduct in its failure to reinstate Pinero from March 3, 1977, to May 26, 1978. Makaretz testified to the effect that she reported this incident to Richards. Richards' and Levin's testimony, however, is of such a nature that the necessary tie in of the incident as a reason for the Respondent's failure to reinstate Pinero has not been made.

Finally, Makaretz' overall testimonial appearance was of such a nature that it is not more persuasive as to the establishment of facts than Pinero's denial.

Considering all of the foregoing, the facts do not reveal that Pinero, in the described alleged incident, engaged in serious misconduct of such a nature that said misconduct removed the remedial protection of the Act from Pinero.

g. Richards and Levin credibly testified in composite effect that, in determining not to reinstate Pinero, they took into consideration a published article wherein Pinero had stated that at Preterm she was forced to encourage Spanish-speaking women to be sterilized.

This article appeared in a Spanish-American Newspaper entitled Community News, in a March 1977 issue. A story, "A Preterm Worker Explains the Strike," contained an interview with Pinero. The story quoted Pinero as saying:

> On two different occasions I was asked to push sterilization on Spanish-speaking women. Once this had been suggested by an administrator, who hadn't even seen the individual woman's chart. I guess it was assumed Spanish-speaking women just had too many children. I was outraged.

The facts reveal that the Respondent's policy is not to push sterilization on Spanish-speaking women and that Pinero was aware that it was not the Respondent's policy to push sterilization on Spanish-speaking women.

Testimony was presented by Pinero and by Rosoff as to the Respondent's policy and as to the apparent basis or lack of basis for support of the facts asserted in the article. Suffice it to say, I am persuaded that the overall facts reveal that Pinero made the statements asserted, that they were incorrect, that they were not, however, made with malice or reckless disregard.

Considering the tolerance to be allowed strike rhetoric, the fact that the article was clearly set forth in a strike context, I am persuaded that the facts do not reveal that Pinero, by such statements, engaged in serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove the remedial protection of the Act from her.[53]

(2) Conclusions

In sum, it is concluded and found that Pinero's engagement in certain specific serious misconduct, as previously set forth, removed the remedial protection of the Act from her, and the Respondent was not obligated to reinstate Pinero on March 2, 1977, and thereafter, because of such misconduct, and that such misconduct and the Respondent's reliance thereon tolled any backpay period as of March 2, 1977.

f. Elizabeth Reeves

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Considering the foregoing and the pleadings and admissions therein, it is clear that Reeves' backpay period ran from March 3, 1977, to May 19, 1978, if certain alleged misconduct had not removed the remedial protection of the Act from Reeves.

(1) The misconduct

a. The strike commenced on October 19, 1976. On one of the first days of the strike, Reeves ran into the reception area family room. At the time there were around 15 persons in the room. Some of these persons were employees, patients, and friends or families of patients.

[52] The facts are based on the credited testimony of Watts. I credit Watts' testimony over Pinero's where such testimony is in conflict.

[53] See Firestone Tire Co., supra; Capital Rubber Co., supra.

Reeves told those who were there that they should get out and leave, that it was a dangerous place to be, that there was no one capable of handling any kind of medical care.[54]

Considering the foregoing facts, I conclude and find that such conduct constituted serious misconduct which removed Reeves from the remedial protection of the Act. For reasons expressed with regard to similar misconduct by another striker, such conduct constituted a reckless regard for the truth and took such speech outside the ambit of tolerance normally utilized in evaluating strike speech.[55]

b. Levin testified to the effect that she was present on another occasion when Reeves made similar remarks to patients. Levin also testified to the effect that she also received some reports from patients that Reeves had made similar remarks.

From my consideration of Levin as she testified and her testimony as a whole, I am persuaded that her testimony referred to above is not reliable to establish a specific incident. Accordingly, such evidence is insufficient to establish serious misconduct of the type to remove Reeves from the remedial protection of the Act.

c. On a morning within a month after October 19, 1976, an employee named Ravech rode to the Preterm premises in a bus. After arriving at Preterm, Ravech and other employees left the bus and proceeded to walk through the picket line. What occurred is revealed by the following credited excerpts from Ravech's testimony.[56]

> Q. Okay, what happened then?
> A. As I walked past Becky Reeves, who was in the front row, she put out her foot as if she—she was trying to trip me. And she did not trip me, but she ended up really kicking me in the shins very hard.
> Q. Did the kick leave any mark or anything?
> A. I was quite black and blue after that.

Ravech later reported this incident to Levin and Richards. Some of Levin's and Richards' testimony seems to suggest that they discussed all employees, their personal recollection of misconduct, and reports from staff and patients as to misconduct of strikers. Their testimony, however, is extremely muddled and appears to be in answers to questions about specific strikers. I am not persuaded that the evidence as a whole warrants a finding that Levin and Richards considered the incident of Reeves kicking Ravech as an incident of serious misconduct as part of the reasoning to refuse to reinstate Reeves.

The issue of serious misconduct and the refusal to reinstate Reeves was litigated on the basis that the Respondent was relying only on the serious misconduct which constituted a part of the reasoning for the refusal to reinstate Reeves. This being so, the Respondent has not established that the incident involving the kicking of Ravech had a bearing upon the failure to reinstate Reeves. Since I find that Reeves has engaged in serious misconduct of another type, removing her from the remedial protection of the Act, I do not find it necessary to determine whether this misconduct, the kicking of Ravech, warrants the denial of backpay to Reeves.

d. On three or four occasions during a 2- or 3-week period, Reeves impeded the movement of cars entering the Preterm parking lot. On such occasions, Reeves stood in front of the cars. Such cars either stopped or slowed almost to a standstill and then inched slowly ahead. As the cars moved slowly ahead, Reeves pounded on the hoods.[57]

Considering the foregoing facts, in context with all of the facts in this case, I do not find that the facts as to these incidents reveal serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove Reeves from the remedial protection of the Act.

(2) Conclusions

The sum of the facts relating to Reeves' misconduct during the strike reveals serious misconduct relied on by the Respondent in denying reinstatement to Reeves and that such misconduct during the strike constituted serious misconduct which removed Reeves from the remedial protection of the Act.[58] Such conduct occurred before the March 2, 1977 unconditional offer by the Union for the strikers to return to work. Therefore, the Respondent's remedial responsibility to Reeves of reinstatement and backpay had been eliminated by such misconduct. Accordingly, it is determined that the Respondent owes no backpay to Reeves.

g. Louise Rice

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Considering the foregoing and the pleadings and admissions therein, it is clear that Rice's backpay period ran from March 3, 1977, to May 27, 1978, if certain alleged misconduct had not removed the remedial protection of the Act from Rice.

(1) The alleged misconduct

a. Levin and Richards testified in composite effect that they relied on reports from staff concerning misconduct by Rice in denying reinstatement to Rice. These reports related to Rice's picketing of employees' homes, following employees home in her car, and transporting patients to other clinics and making defamatory remarks about the Respondent's clinic. In connection with the conduct referred to in the above "reports," the unfair labor practice complaint against the Union and the 10(j) petition [56] I found Ravech to appear to be a more credible witness than Reeves and credit her testimony over Reeves' where there is conflict.

[57] The facts are based on the credited aspects of the testimony of DeAngelis. I discredit the testimony of Reeves to the extent inconsistent with the facts found. I found DeAngelis to appear to be a more frank, forthright, and truthful appearing witness as compared to Reeves.

filed by the General Counsel averred that Rice and others had, on October 27, 1976, followed nonstriking employees to and from work in their automobiles. The only direct evidence presented with respect to alleged misconduct by Rice was the testimony of Makaretz.

Makaretz testified to the effect that she had an encounter with Rice on a Saturday, several weeks after October 19, 1976, that she was with a Dr. Borman and a Dr. Levy, that Rice was with a group of strikers at the Preterm back entrance. Makaretz testified that Rice yelled to her and the physicians. What Rice allegedly said is revealed by the following excerpts from Makaretz' testimony:

> Q. What specifically happened in that incident involving Louise Rice?
> A. We were walking through the back parking lot and we were sort of heading toward the second—the one to the back entrance, and there was a group of strikers at the first entrance, and Louise Rice was at the head of them. She yelled very, very loudly to us, "You must be very proud of that, what you are doing." And the remark was directed to the doctors. "You call yourselves doctors, and you must be proud to be the murderers."
> Q. That last statement, can you tell me—let me make sure I have it right. "You call yourselves doctors. You must be proud—?"
> A. "—proud of what you are doing to be murderers."

Rice credibly testified that she (1) had not engaged in the misconduct as had been reported to Levin and Richards, (2) had not followed employees as they entered or left Preterm's premises, (3) had not picketed employees' or supervisors' homes during the strike, and (4) had not made the remarks to Makaretz and the physicians as attributed to her by Makaretz.[59]

(2) The net backpay

Considering the foregoing, the pleadings, and the admissions therein,[60] I find the backpay due Louise Rice to be as follows:

CALENDAR QTRS.	NET BACKPAY
1977-I	$ 534.79
1977-II	1680.73
1977-III	1744.65

h. Catherine Walker

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Considering the foregoing and the pleadings and admissions therein, it is clear that Walker's backpay period ran from March 3, 1977, to May 26, 1978, if certain alleged misconduct had not removed the remedial protection of the Act from Walker.

(1) The misconduct

a. On the first day of the strike, October 19, 1976, Walker spat on Susan Kell, the assistant to the treasurer at Preterm, as Kell went through the picket line when leaving work. Thus, on the first day of the strike, around 4:15 p.m., Kell, and two others connected with Preterm, left work and were walking by or near Catherine Walker and 15 or 20 pickets on the front sidewalk. On such occasion, Walker yelled at Kell, called her a "scab," and asked how she could keep working there. Walker spat at Kell and hit Kell on the right cheek and chin and across the front of her jacket.[61]

Considering the above facts, in the context with all of the facts relating to Walker's misconduct, I conclude and find that the spitting on Kell constituted serious misconduct removing Walker from the remedial protection of the Act. I would not find the language or remarks used by Walker to constitute misconduct. Nor would I find that one instance of spitting at a person by a striker to constitute serious misconduct warranting the removal of the remedial protection of the Act from Walker. However, considering the overall facts, I am persuaded that the act of spitting was not a spontaneous act and was not an exercise of animal exuberance. Rather, the facts reveal other instances of spitting at employees or personnel of Preterm by Walker. Thus, in total context, I conclude and find that the act of spitting on Kell constituted serious misconduct which removed the remedial protection of the Act from Walker.[62]

b. One morning around 8 a.m., on a day in mid- to late-November 1976, Walker, while picketing with others, spat at but did not hit Donna DeAngelis, a nonstriking employee. At the time DeAngelis had been going to work and was on the front steps of Preterm.[63]

Considering the above facts, I conclude and find that Walker engaged in serious misconduct which removed the remedial protection of the Act from Walker. Considering the overall facts, I am persuaded that the act of spitting was not a spontaneous act and was not an exercise of animal exuberance. In context with the other acts of spitting at employees or personnel of Preterm, I conclude and find that Walker's spitting at DeAngelis con-

[59] I credit Rice's testimony over Makaretz' as to whether Rice made the remarks attributed to her by Makaretz. The overall facts revealed Makaretz to be less than objective and an unreliable witness. As to the other alleged incidents, the testimony as to reports was extremely general and conclusionary. Considering the quality of all the facts, I found Rice's testimony to have the ring of truth. Rice's testimonial demeanor was that of a forthright, frank, and honest witness.

[60] With minor corrections concerning inadvertent erroneous computations and with interest as indicated later.

[61] The facts are based on a composite of the credited testimony of Kell and Richards. I credit Kell's and Richards' testimony over that of Walker on this point. Kell's testimony was also to the effect that later she was lightly bumped by Walker as she went through the picket line. It is clear that such touching was accidental. I do not believe that Walker, who was pregnant, would use her stomach as an offensive weapon.

[62] Cf. Sea View Industries, 127 NLRB 1402 (1960).

[63] The facts are based on credited testimony of DeAngelis. I credit DeAngelis' testimony over Walker's where in conflict.

stituted serious misconduct which removed the remedial protection of the Act from Walker.

c. DeAngelis testified to the effect that there were other incidents of spitting by Walker, one of which occurred several weeks after the one set out above. It is sufficient to say that I do not find DeAngelis' testimony as to such incidents to reveal such sureness of detail as to warrant a finding of a specific incident.

d. On a morning during the first couple of weeks after October 19, 1976, Walker spat on Leslie Bernstein, a supervisor, as she went through the picket line around 7:30 a.m. Bernstein had been transported to work in a private schoolbus. When Bernstein left the schoolbus to go to the front door of Preterm, Walker was with other pickets. Walker yelled to Bernstein that she was stealing her job. Walker spat at Bernstein. Bernstein had put her hand up, and the spit hit Bernstein's hand. Bernstein pushed Walker in the face with her hand.[64]

For reasons previously set forth, I conclude and find that the above incident constituted serious misconduct of such a nature that the remedial protection of the Act was removed from Walker.

e. In October 1976, the Respondent was considering the employment of Janice Irvine as an assistant to the coordinator of counseling. Feinbloom, the coordinator of counseling, did not want to make a decision about the assistant to her position. As a result, Irvine was hired as a consultant and commenced answering the telephone and interviewing people for work.

After the strike started, on October 22, 1976, around 5:30 p.m., Irvine was leaving from work and headed for her automobile. Walker and Weinberg approached Irvine and yelled at her. Irvine turned around and headed back to the Preterm clinic. Around this time Weinberg placed her hand on Irvine's arm.[65]

Assistant Director Richards saw the above incident. Later, Richards, Irvine, and a lawyer appeared to have discussed the events. It appears that several days later Irvine signed a statement relating to the incident referred to above. In any event, around November 18, 1976, Irvine signed a sworn statement containing the following:

> On Oct. 22, approx. 5:30 p.m., I left Preterm to walk to my car. A few people yelled "scab" and "how does it feel to be training scabs?" I kept walking, and when I got to the curb, Katherine Walker ran up to me and grabbed my arm. She asked me if I was working at Preterm. I ignored her and tried to keep walking but she wouldn't let me go. Another woman (Susan Weinberg) came up to me and grabbed my other arm. They both started shoving me and yelling "scab" and various obscenities. After 3-4 minutes a policeman came up and told them to leave me alone. He began to walk me to my car and the two women walked along yelling that "they would find me and get me." They continued threatening me and I decided not to go to my car. I informed the policeman that I would not go to my car with the women following me. They (the women) said that they would wait six months if they had to. We began to walk back to the clinic and they kept yelling at me. I had to leave the clinic by car.

It also appears that some sort of legal complaint was filed relating to the incident, some type of hearing (informal or otherwise) was held, and the complaint was dropped.

Considering the testimony of the witnesses and all of the facts, the facts are insufficient to reveal that Walker or Weinberg engaged in misconduct during this alleged incident. The only evidence of any real value as to this incident consists of those facts previously set forth as based on the testimony of Irvine, Richards, Walker, and Weinberg. I note that Richards initially testified that Weinberg physically took hold of Irvine. Later, a leading question was propounded on the postulation that Weinberg had physically restrained Irvine. Richards' further testimony was simply that Weinberg had her hands on Irvine's arms. I also note that Irvine appeared to have a sufficient recall of the events. I am not persuaded that her failure to testify in more detail is a result of loss of memory. It would appear that Irvine either did not want to testify to the events because she, at the time of the trial, had become friendly with the former strikers, or did not want to testify to the events because the alleged facts in the written statement were not true. In any event, the statement prepared for litigation has an aura of unreliability. Further, even if the statement as written were true, I am persuaded that the facts as to this incident do not reveal serious misconduct of a nature to remove the remedial protection of the Act from Walker or Weinberg.

f. The Respondent in its brief asserts facts as revealed by the following excerpts from the Respondent's brief.

> Ms. Levin testified that on four or five occasions during the first several weeks of the strike, Ms. Walker yelled obscenities like "go to hell, fuck you, you're a piece of shit" at her through the garage grating. She also threatened her that "we'll get you" and "you'll be sorry." [Tr. 1079–81.]
> Ms. Levin testified that toward the end of October, 1976, she observed Ms. Walker in the front of Preterm one morning tell a patient who was trying to enter Preterm that Preterm was not providing any patient care. When the patient still tried to > enter, Ms. Walker physically blocked her progress, to the point of pushing her back. Finally, when the patient became upset, a policeman intervened and escorted the patient in. [Tr. 1082–88.]

[64] The facts are based on a composite of the credited aspects of Bernstein's, Richards', and Walker's testimony. I discredit the aspects of any of the testimony of the witnesses inconsistent with the facts found.

It suffices to say that I did not find Levin's testimony in support of these contended facts to appear objective or reliable to establish litigated incidents.

g. In February 1977, Walker was involved in an incident with Levin and Lansky on the subway. What occurred is revealed by the following credited excerpts from Levin's testimony:[66].

> She came over, stood over us, started to yell and scream and say how irresponsible we were and what a disgrace the clinic was. Aren't we ashamed to be seen in public, what a terrible thing we were doing to womankind. Don't we have any sense of responsibility, how long do we think we can get away with this.

Considering the tolerance in rhetoric in strike situations, the above facts do not reveal serious misconduct of a nature to remove the remedial protection of the Act from Walker.[67]

h. In addition to the above incidents, the Respondent alludes in his brief to certain conduct alleged to have been engaged in by Walker as asserted in a complaint issued by the General Counsel. Walker denied having engaged in such misconduct. I find Walker's denial to be credible in such denial of allegations unsupported by testimony of evidence otherwise. Further, evidence as to such incidents is not sufficiently tied up so as to be revealed to constitute a part of the Respondent's refusal to reinstate Weinberg during the period of time March 3, 1977, to May 26, 1978.

(2) Conclusions

In sum, it is concluded and found that Walker's engagement in certain specific serious misconduct, as previously set forth, removed the remedial protection of the Act from her, and the Respondent was not obligated to reinstate Walker on March 2, 1977, and thereafter, because of such misconduct, and that such misconduct and the Respondent's reliance thereon tolled any backpay period as of March 2, 1977.

i. Susan Weinberg

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Considering the foregoing and the pleadings and admissions therein, it is clear that Weinberg's backpay period ran from March 3, 1977, to May 27, 1978, if certain alleged misconduct had not removed the remedial protection of the Act from Weinberg.

(1) The alleged misconduct

a. The incident of the alleged misconduct involving Janice Irvine has previously been set forth and discussed in the section concerning alleged misconduct by Walker. Suffice it to say, for the reasons previously set forth, the facts do not reveal that Weinberg engaged in misconduct in such incident.

b. There is a pharmacy, not a part of the Respondent's enterprise, located in the same building as the Respondent (Preterm). One morning Richards was in the pharmacy. Weinberg came into the pharmacy. Richards testified to the effect that Weinberg screamed and yelled at her. Richards' testimony as to what was said appeared to be largely a characterization of what was said rather than what actually was said. Such testimony was essentially as is revealed by the following excerpts from Richards' testimony:

> Q. Would you please describe, therefore, to the best of your memory, what she said to you?
> A. I don't remember the precise words.
> Q. Do you remember the topic of her conversation, if you will?
> A. Well, it was, as I said, that I was an idiot, and basically a rotten person; and screaming. There were other people in the pharmacy. I was up at the counter. She came up to the counter, so that I felt some physical intimidation, in terms of the manner in which she was doing this.

It suffices to say that I did not find Richards' testimony to be of probative value so as to offer a basis for real factfinding. Assuming the details to be as indicated, however, such facts do not reveal serious misconduct by Weinberg. The premises were not Preterm's premises. The language used, considering the tolerance given to strike rhetoric, clearly does not reveal serious misconduct. In sum, the incident is not established to be serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove the remedial protection of the Act from Weinberg.

c. Levin testified to a number of occasions wherein Weinberg allegedly yelled profane and vulgar remarks at her, threw pebbles or paper wads at her and belittled the clinic. Levin also testified to certain reports concerning Weinberg.

Levin's testimony as a whole, relating to the "misconduct" by Weinberg, did not appear objective or specific. In effect, I am not persuaded, under standards of due process, that specific incidents could be said to have been litigated. However, assuming specific incidents to have been litigated, the facts do not reveal serious misconduct by Weinberg. The language used is not to be admired. However, considering the tolerance accorded strike rhetoric, Weinberg's remarks do not reveal serious misconduct.

There were "reports" concerning Weinberg and the harassment of employees by usage of the telephone. I credit Weinberg's denial that she made the alleged harassing telephone calls.

d. A few weeks after October 19, 1976, Weinberg and DeAngelis, a nonstriking employee, had an encounter in [66] The facts are based on credited aspects of Levin's testimony. I credit Levin over Walker as to this incident.

[67] W. C. McQuaide, Inc., 220 NLRB 593 (1975).

Preterm's back parking lot.[68] DeAngelis had ridden to work with another employee named Flink. After Flink had parked her automobile, DeAngelis got out of the automobile and started to leave. At such time, DeAngelis encountered Weinberg who was standing between Flink's automobile and the automobile which was parked adjacent to DeAngelis' automobile. Because of the location of the automobile and a fence, Weinberg's position was directly in the way that DeAngelis had to go in order to proceed to work. Weinberg, in a loud and yelling tone, argued with DeAngelis about DeAngelis' continuing to work during the strike. DeAngelis, in effect, asked Weinberg to move and let her pass by. Weinberg did not move and continued to argue with DeAngelis. DeAngelis asked Flink to go to get someone. Flink left and returned shortly with a security guard. The security guard spoke to Weinberg and then escorted Weinberg away. The total encounter covered only 5 or 6 minutes.

Considering all of the foregoing, I conclude and find that the described incident did not constitute serious misconduct of the type that removed the remedial protection of the Act from Weinberg. There is no evidence of physical touching or threats. Rather, the facts indicate a degree of animal exuberance in communications.[69]

(2) Conclusions

In sum, the facts do not establish that Weinberg engaged in serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove the remedial protection of the Act from her. Considering the determination of the issues herein, the pleadings and admissions therein, it is clear that the backpay[70] due Weinberg is as follows:

CALENDAR QTRS.	NET BACKPAY
1977-I	$ 554.40
1977-II	1742.40

1978-II	124.72

j. Jean Williams

The determination has been made that the Union's March 2, 1977 unconditional offer on behalf of the strikers to return to work constituted a valid unconditional offer. Considering the foregoing and the pleadings and admissions therein, it is clear that Williams' backpay period ran from March 3, 1977, to May 26, 1978, if certain alleged misconduct had not removed the remedial protection of the Act from Williams.

(1) The alleged misconduct

a. There was an incident that occurred during the first few days after October 19, 1976, where Jean Williams temporarily blocked the movement of someone who was on Preterm's staff and who was attempting to enter into Preterm's front entrance.[71]

Considering the above facts, or facts assumed if Levin's testimony were credited in all aspects, the facts of Williams' bumping or blocking of a staff person for a few moments, does not constitute serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove the remedial protection of the Act from her.

b. Levin testified concerning an alleged article about abortions written by Williams and published in a woman's magazine in February 1977. Levin's testimony about the article was in generalities as revealed by the following excerpts from her testimony:

> Q. What is your best memory as to what it is she said concerning Preterm?
> A. My best memory is that it talked about how Preterm abuses the rights of women in that we do not give them the opportunity to make decisions, that it is in essence forced upon them.

The above article was not presented in evidence. Apparently the Respondent could not locate such article at time of trial.

Williams denied that she had written said article. I found Williams to appear to be a truthful witness. I credit Williams' denial that she had written the referred-to article. I discredit Levin's testimony to the extent that it can be construed to the effect that Jean Williams wrote and signed the article testified to by Levin.

Considering all of the facts referred to above, I am persuaded that the facts do not establish that Williams engaged in serious misconduct by writing for publication an article on abortion. Assuming Levin's testimony to be correct insofar as establishing that Williams wrote an article on abortion, Levin's testimony is of such a general nature that it is not sufficient to establish the precise facts needed to support a finding of serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove the remedial protection of the Act from Williams.

c. Levin also testified that she received reports concerning Williams' misconduct and that such reports constituted part of the basis for denial of reinstatement to Williams on and after March 3, 1977. Levin's testimony as to such reports was generalized and imprecise. I found Williams to be a truthful appearing witness and credit her denial that she engaged in such alleged misconduct.

[68] The facts are based on DeAngelis' credited testimony. I found DeAngelis to appear a more credible witness than Weinberg on this issue. I discredit Weinberg's testimony contradictory of the facts found. Again, I note counsels' and the parties' difficulties in establishing events within a reasonably accurate time period. The incident involved herein is of such a nature that Weinberg would clearly be aware of the same.

[69] It is not established that this incident constituted a part of the Respondent's reason for refusing to reinstate Weinberg from March 3, 1977, to May 26, 1978. Furthermore, it is clear that such conduct did not render Weinberg an unsuitable employee.

[70] With interest thereon as indicated later herein.

[71] The facts are based on the credited aspects of Levin's testimony. Much of Levin's testimony was conclusionary and general in nature. I discredit Levin's testimony to the extent that it can be interpreted to indicate facts different from the facts found. I am persuaded that Williams attempted to testify truthfully. I am also persuaded that the incident described herein was so insignificant that Williams would not have construed it to be a blocking incident and would with reasonable probability have forgotten the same. Williams appeared surprised by the allegations of misconduct. If one had not engaged in misconduct, such surprise is reasonable.

Considering the above facts, I conclude and find that the facts do not establish that Williams engaged in serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove the remedial protection of the Act from her. Even in the absence of credited testimony by Williams, I would not find Levin's testimony of sufficient probative value to establish a good-faith objective belief that Williams had engaged in specific acts of serious misconduct.

(2) Conclusions

In sum, the facts do not establish that Williams engaged in serious misconduct of such a nature as to remove the remedial protection of the Act from her. Considering the determination of the issues herein, the pleadings and admissions therein, it is clear that the backpay[72] due Williams is as follows:

k. Miscellaneous

The Respondent also presented other evidence (concerning the employees denied reinstatement because of alleged misconduct) apparently relating to misconduct. It is not clear that such other alleged misconduct was considered as part of the reasons for failure to reinstate the employees discussed herein. In any event, such other alleged misconduct does not constitute serious misconduct of the type to remove the remedial protection of the Act from the striking employees. Such conduct, as an example, involved striking employees engaging in chanting or picketing away from Preterm premises, on the street, or at homes of nonstriking employees or supervisors. Such conduct mainly consisted of strike rhetoric and picketing. Considering the tolerance to be allowed strike rhetoric, such conduct does not approach the degree of serious misconduct of the type that removes the remedial protection of the Act from striking employees.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[73]

Ryder Truck Lines, Inc. and Melvin D. Taylor. Case 10–CA–19042

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 21 September 1983 Administrative Law Judge Philip P. McLeod issued the attached decision in this proceeding finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Melvin D. Taylor. On 30 April 1984 the Board issued an Order remanding the proceeding to the judge for further consideration in light of the Board's Decision in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984). The judge issued a supplemental decision on 17 July 1984 reaffirming his earlier decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

In his decision of 21 September 1983 the judge found that Taylor was unlawfully discharged for refusing to drive a truck that he reasonably believed was unsafe. The judge found it inappropriate to defer to the grievance committee's denial of Taylor's grievance because there was no evidence that the committee considered the statutory issues involved.[3]

In Olin Corp. the Board adopted Member Hunter's dissent in Propoco and declared it would find that an arbitrator has adequately considered the unfair labor practice if (1) the contractual issue is factually parallel to the unfair labor practice issue, and (2) the arbitrator was presented generally with the facts relevant to resolving the unfair labor practice.[4] The Board further held that the party seeking to have the Board reject deferral and consider the merits of a given case has the burden of affirmatively demonstrating the defects in the arbitral process or award.[5]

In his attached supplemental decision the judge examined the minutes of the Southern Multi-State Grievance Committee meeting and found that the contractual issue raised by Taylor's grievance was factually parallel to the unfair labor practice issue and that the Committee was presented generally with the facts relevant to resolving both issues. The Multi-State Committee was unable to reach a decision on Taylor's grievance and referred it to the Southern Area Grievance Committee. The judge noted the brevity of the Area Committee's minutes, which include a statement that "the transcript of the Multi-State hearing will be made a part of the record," and found the minutes insufficient to show that the Committee was presented generally with the facts relevant to resolving the unfair labor practice or that it adequately considered the issue. The judge particularly relied on the absence of evidence that the Area Committee actually discussed or considered the facts contained in the Mutli-State Committee minutes.

We find that the General Counsel has not met his burden of affirmatively demonstrating that the unfair labor practice did not receive adequate consideration in the parties' joint-panel grievance procedure. As found by the judge, the contractual and statutory issues are factually parallel and the parties generally presented the Multi-State Committee with the facts relevant to the statutory issue. The judge erred, however, in partitioning the grievance proceeding and requiring that a further showing be made that the relevant facts were discussed or considered by the Area Committee. We find that the parties' presentation of the facts relevant to the unfair labor practice at the Multi-State Committee stage of the grievance proceeding, together with the General Counsel's failure to affirmatively establish that these facts were not presented to the Area Committee,[6] satisfies the requirement set forth in Olin. Since the Area Committee's decision is consistent with the standards promulgated in Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), we shall defer to the grievance decision and dismiss the complaint.[7]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] We find no merit in the Respondent's contention that the judge was predisposed to find in favor of the Charging Party.

[3] In deciding not to defer, the judge relied on American Freight System, 264 NLRB 126 (1982); Propoco, Inc., 263 NLRB 136 (1982), enf. with unpublished, nonprecedential opinion, Case 83–4058 (2d Cir. 1983); and Suburban Motor Freight, 247 NLRB 146 (1980).

[4] 268 NLRB 573.

[5] Id. Suburban Motor Freight was overruled to the extent it provided for a different allocation of burdens in deferral cases.

[6] As noted above, the transcript of the Multi-State hearing was made part of the record of the Area Committee.

[7] In view of our dismissal of the complaint, we find it unnecessary to pass on the Respondent's motion for hearing de novo before a different administrative law judge.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, and for the reasons set forth in my separate opinion in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), I would have affirmed the administrative law judge's initial decision in this case, in which he declined to defer to the instant arbitration award, and found that the Respondent unlawfully discharged Charging Party Melvin Taylor for engaging in protected concerted activity by refusing to drive a truck which he claimed was unsafe to operate. More specifically, I agree with the judge's conclusion in the initial case that it would be inappropriate to defer to the result reached by the Teamsters Multi-State Grievance Committee, since there was not even a written decision by that committee from which it would be possible to determine whether the committee considered the statutory issues presented in this case.

For the same reasons as those stated above, I would affirm the judge's supplemental decision in which he continued to decline to the arbitration award, reaffirming his initial decision. More specifically, I agree with the judge that the brief cursory minutes of the Southern Conference Area Committee are not sufficient to show that the committee was presented with facts relevant to the unfair labor practice. In affirming the judge's supplemental decision, I find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's determination that he would have deferred to the arbitration proceeding before the Southern Multi-State Grievance Committee if that proceeding had resolved the grievance.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

PHILIP P. MCLEOD, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me on July 28 and 29, 1983, in Birmingham, Alabama. It originated from a charge filed by Melvin D. Taylor, an individual, against Ryder Truck Lines, Inc. (Respondent). On April 11, 1983, a complaint and notice of hearing issued alleging, inter alia, that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by discharging, and thereafter failing and refusing to reinstate, employee Melvin D. Taylor because he engaged in concerted activities with other employees for the purposes of collective bargaining and other mutual aid and protection. In its answer to the complaint, Respondent admitted certain allegations, including the filing and serving of the charge, its status as an employer within the meaning of the Act, and the fact that it discharged Taylor on December 2, 1982. Respondent denies that it discharged Taylor for reasons which violate the Act and denies having engaged in any conduct which would constitute an unfair labor practice.

At the trial herein, all parties were represented and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce evidence. Following the close of the trial, both Respondent and the General Counsel filed timely briefs with me which have been duly considered.

On the entire record in this case, and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Ryder Truck Lines, Inc. is a Florida corporation with offices and truck terminals located in various cities throughout the United States. The facility involved here is in Birmingham, Alabama. During the past calendar year, which period is representative of all times material herein, Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the interstate transportation of freight and commodities from its Birmingham facility directly to customers located outside the State of Alabama.

Respondent is, and has been at all times material herein, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ISSUES

The complaint alleges that Respondent discharged Taylor because he engaged in concerted activities with other employees for the purposes of collective bargaining and other mutual aid and protection. Counsel for the General Counsel contended in his opening statement that Taylor was "terminated for engaging in protected, concerted activities when he refused to drive an unsafe truck." The complaint does not specifically allege that Taylor engaged in protected activity by refusing to drive unsafe equipment. Respondent argues that because the complaint does not specifically set forth the latter allegation, the General Counsel should not be heard to propound that argument, but rather should be limited to the concerted activities theory specifically alleged. I reject Respondent's argument and find that the complaint language is sufficiently particular to encompass the "unsafe equipment" theory.

Respondent admits that it discharged Taylor in the early morning hours of December 2, 1982, because Taylor refused to drive a particular truck tractor assigned to him. Therefore, with regard to the discharge, two issues are presented: first, whether Taylor refused to drive the particular tractor as a result of concerted activities engaged in by him with other employees for their mutual aid and protection; and second, whether Taylor's refusal to drive the truck, if not the result of concerted activities with other employees, was the result of a reasonable belief on Taylor's part that the tractor was unsafe.

In addition to these, a third issue is presented as a result of Respondent's affirmative defense that the Board should defer to the Teamsters Multi-State Grievance Committee's denial of Taylor's grievance regarding his discharge and, as a result, dismiss the complaint herein.

III. THE FACTS

A. Background

Melvin D. Taylor was employed by Respondent as a truckdriver at its Birmingham, Alabama facility for 26 years. Respondent's truckdrivers, including Taylor, are represented for purposes of collective bargaining by the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America. Respondent is signatory to the National Master Freight Agreement and Southern Conference Area Over The Road Supplemental Agreement. Two portions of the collective-bargaining agreement have relevance to this proceeding. First, article 16, section 1, provides in part, "The employer shall not require employees to take out on the streets or highways any vehicle that is not in safe operating condition." Second, the collective-bargaining agreement contains provisions for the resolution of disputes through final and binding grievance and arbitration procedures.

From the Birmingham facility, drivers are dispatched to haul freight to other Ryder facilities in various locations throughout the country. Drivers do not have tractors permanently assigned to them which they drive day after day. Rather, tractors are assigned to drivers from a pool on a first-in-first out basis, i.e., tractors which have arrived at the Birmingham facility from other locations are assigned to Birmingham drivers in the order in which they arrived in Birmingham. When a driver is assigned a particular load, he is given bills of lading and other documents, including a Department of Transportation (DOT) "Equipment Inspection Report" which the driver is required to complete before leaving on his run. In order to complete this report, the driver is required to inspect both the tractor and trailer assigned to him and to report any deficiencies to the dispatcher. The dispatcher then communicates with the repair shop with regard to any repairs that need to be made. Because of arguments which have occurred in the past between drivers and repair shop employees, drivers are not permitted to communicate directly with the repair shop. If the repair cannot be completed in a reasonable time, the shop foreman will notify the dispatcher, and different equipment will be assigned to the driver from the existing pool.

Truck tractors used by Respondent are predominantly GMCs and Fords. The interior of these two tractors is somewhat different, and generally speaking the Ford tractors have less space in the cab than the GMC model. In years past, large drivers experienced difficulty being able to fit in the Ford models. As a result, an agreement was reached sometime ago between Respondent and the Union that certain individuals would not be required to drive Ford tractors. This agreement has been applied to two drivers at the Birmingham facility, a Mr. Starnes and a Mr. Morris. There is, however, no evidence that this agreement was given general application to any driver who thought himself too large to fit comfortably in the Ford cab. Rather, it appears that Respondent and the Union reached agreement that certain named individuals would be exempted from driving Ford tractors, and the rule has been applied to them alone.

The 1979 Ford tractors used by Respondent have an adjustable telescoping steering column. The telescoping mechanism contains an inner frame with spring-loaded pins which engage in adjustment holes located in an outer stationary frame. Two bolts located in the outer frame regulate the amount of play in the steering column between the inner and outer frames. If the bolts are loosened to allow the telescoping mechanism to adjust, play is experienced in the steering wheel. If the bolts are tightened to eliminate this play in the steering wheel, the telescoping mechanism will not adjust. In 1980, because of driver complaints about play in the steering wheel, Respondent welded the steering columns in a fixed position. Sometime during 1982, other drivers complained that the steering wheel would not adjust. A grievance was filed, and Respondent agreed to restore the telescoping mechanism to its original condition so that it would adjust. Restoring the mechanism to its original condition required the use of a cutting torch to remove a tack weld which had been used to fix them in place.

B. Taylor's Refusal to Drive 1979 Ford 79–597

On the night of December 1, 1982, when Taylor reported to work at the Birmingham facility, he was first assigned a GMC tractor to drive on his regular bid run to Monroe, Louisiana. After inspecting the tractor, Taylor turned in to the dispatcher a DOT report that the tractor had a broken seat. The dispatcher so informed the repair shop, which attempted necessary repairs. The repair shop informed the dispatcher that the seat could not be repaired, and Taylor was then assigned the next available tractor, 1979 model Ford 79–597.

After inspecting this Ford tractor, Taylor prepared and turned in a DOT report time-stamped 21.9 hours (9:54 p.m.) stating, "unable to adjust steering wheel" and "engine leaking oil."[1] The dispatcher informed the shop of the necessary repairs. At approximately 10:36 p.m., the repair shop informed the dispatcher that the unit was ready. Taylor returned to the "ready line" to check the vehicle. After this inspection, Taylor turned in to dispatcher Miller a DOT report at 10:48 p.m. stating, "steering column loose part of" [sic]. This was reported to the shop by Miller. Shop Superintendent Ed Mize informed Miller with a written note that the repair work had already been performed earlier and there would be "no come back/no pay."[2] Taylor then went to the vehicle, which had been returned to the "ready line" and drove it himself to the repair shop. Taylor attempted to confront Mize directly and convince him that the repairs were not complete. Mize interrupted Taylor, however, told Taylor that the shop was not going to work on the truck any more, that Taylor would have to drive it like it was, and that if Taylor had problems with the truck

[1] The General Counsel claims in brief that Taylor found the "exhaust manifold defective" and that "exhaust fumes leaked into the cab." The General Counsel is either very mistaken or making up facts to suit his needs, for they are found nowhere in this record. In either case, I reject this assertion and do not rely on it in any way in reaching my decision herein.

[2] This designation means that in Mize's opinion no further repair was necessary and the driver should not be paid for the additional time spent while the vehicle was being looked at a second time.

Taylor should go to the dispatcher.[3] Taylor then drove the truck back to the "ready line."[4]

Upon returning to the "ready line" from the repair shop, Taylor met two other drivers, Jack Simpson and W. R. Worthington. Taylor asked Simpson and Worthington to help him adjust the steering slide so that Taylor could fit behind the steering wheel. They were unable to do so. Worthington told Taylor that Taylor could not drive that tractor, that Taylor was too big. Taylor then returned to the dispatch office to speak to Miller. Taylor told Miller he could not drive the truck. Miller replied that the shop was not willing to work on the steering column any more, that it had made the necessary repairs, and that Taylor was going to have to drive the truck. Taylor went back out to the truck and a few minutes later returned to the dispatch office with a DOT report time-stamped 11:06 p.m. stating, "part of trailer's [lights] out. Brakes grabbing on tractor." Dispatcher Miller communicated the need for these repairs to the shop.

After filing this DOT report, Taylor returned to the ready line. Taylor was standing at the ready line by the truck with employees Joseph Shelby and Simpson when mechanic John Smith approached to repair the lights. Taylor asked Smith to examine the truck's steering. According to Smith's testimony, he found that the steering mechanism was loose, the steering column had been cut with a welding torch, and the ball bearings had been let out. According to Smith, the steering column did not slide properly and did not allow the driver to have all the room the cab was designed to allow. Smith testified that in his opinion the condition of the steering column could cause a driver to have steering trouble and possibly an accident. According to Smith, the steering column was "shot" and needed to be replaced.[5] Smith told Taylor, however, that he was assigned only to fix the lights. Taylor then left the ready line and went back to the dispatch office. Smith proceeded to fix the lights, and the truck was again returned to the ready line shortly after midnight.

After the truck was again released from the repair shop, at 12:24 a.m. Taylor turned in yet another DOT report which stated, "unable to adjust steering wheel." This report was relayed to the shop by dispatcher Miller. By this time, Shop Superintendent Mize, who left work at midnight, was gone. Mize's replacement, Shop Superintendent Keys, again had the vehicle inspected. Shortly after 1 a.m., Keys informed Miller that two mechanics had checked the steering, that the steering wheel was retracted as far as it would go, and that the mechanics had certified that to be so. The truck was again returned to the ready line. At 1:12 a.m., yet another "come back" was written to the shop that the trailer lights were out. This was again checked by the shop, repaired, and returned to the dispatcher as ready at approximately 1:36 a.m.

Taylor and dispatcher Miller then had a conversation which ultimately led to Taylor's discharge. The conversation was initiated by Taylor, who told Miller that he would not drive the tractor until the steering was fixed. Miller told Taylor that the shop had fixed the steering and that two mechanics had certified such to be the case. Taylor told Miller that he could not drive the truck, that he was too big, and that the shop had not fixed the steering mechanism so that it would properly adjust. Miller then asked the employee Thomas Floyd to be a witness to what was about to take place. Floyd agreed but said he wanted to inspect the truck first. Taylor and Floyd went to inspect the truck. Miller did not accompany them. Instead, while they were gone, Miller telephoned Terminal Manager Scotty Appleton and told him what had taken place. Miller informed Appleton that Taylor had made several writeups on the truck, but that it had come down to the fact that the steering did not adjust. Miller told Appleton that Taylor now refused to drive the truck. Appleton instructed Miller to order Taylor to drive the truck and that if Taylor refused, to discharge Taylor.

Floyd testified about what he found when he and Taylor went to the ready line to inspect the truck. As I have indicated above, of all the witnesses in this case, Floyd struck me as the most credible. When Floyd and Taylor went to inspect the truck, Floyd took a flashlight with him to make the inspection. When they got to the truck, Taylor got up into the cab and sat behind the steering wheel. As Floyd testified, "the steering wheel was hitting him in the stomach." Taylor then got out of the truck, and Floyd got in to inspect. Floyd testified, "the steering wheel would slide but there was something holding it off; it wouldn't go all the way against the dash like it normally would go." Floyd testified that he could place his two-cell flashlight in the space left behind the steering wheel and the dash board. Floyd testified that he could see that a cutting torch had been used to cut the weld loose and that "liquid wrench or break away fluid" had been used to lubricate the sliding mechanism.

[3] Testimony of Taylor and Mize conflicts with regard to the statement made by Mize to Taylor, but I accept a composite of their testimony on this point.

[4] I do not credit Mize's testimony that at this time he was able to observe Taylor sitting behind the wheel of the tractor, that the steering wheel may have been touching Taylor's shirt, but that the steering wheel was not "buried in" or substantially protruding into Taylor's stomach as Taylor asserted at trial. Rather, I credit the testimony of employee Floyd described below.

[5] I credit that portion of Smith's description of the actual physical condition of the steering column wherein he states that the steering column did not slide properly and did not allow the driver to have all the room the cab was designed to allow. I credit Smith on this point not because of his own demeanor, but because this point is corroborated by employee Thomas Floyd, whose testimony is described below and who impressed me as the most disinterested and credible witness in this case. In crediting this portion of Smith's testimony, I am mindful that, in general, Smith was clearly biased in Taylor's favor. His testimony was extreme and his demeanor unsettling. Smith admitted that he did not want to do anything to hurt Taylor. I have also considered the fact that following Taylor's discharge, union business agent Simmons requested a meeting with Smith and Shop Superintendent Paul Hergot to investigate Taylor's grievance. During this meeting, Smith told Simmons and Hergot that he did not want to cause trouble for Taylor and did not want to give a written statement, but that the steering wheel had actually been recessed as far as it would go when he examined it on the night of December 1, and that he had told Taylor so. The fact that Smith would make such a statement in the presence of Shop Superintendent Hergot is consistent with my impression of Smith's credibility that he would say anything he thought the listener wanted to hear. Thus, I credit only this limited portion of Smith's testimony because it is corroborated by Floyd.

Floyd testified, "It was dripping down in the floorboard." Floyd also testified that on the steering column there is a universal joint which allowed the steering column to turn the truck wheels regardless of the column's position. According to Floyd, "they had taken something and beat it to drive it in, and they had beat the rubber bushing off of it, and the bushing was hanging down on it." After inspecting the truck, Floyd told Taylor that in his opinion, if the telescoping mechanism would allow the steering wheel to slide as it normally would, Taylor could probably drive the truck. Floyd testified that, if such were the case, Taylor would have about 2 inches between his stomach and the steering wheel. As it was, however, the steering wheel hit Taylor in the stomach.

When Floyd and Taylor returned to the dispatch office after inspecting the truck, Miller did not ask, and Floyd did not have occasion to report, what he had found. Instead, Taylor told Miller that when the tractor was fixed, he would drive it. Miller replied that the shop had stated the truck was ready to go, and Taylor would have to drive it "or else." Miller then issued written instructions to Taylor to drive the truck. Taylor took the written instructions and placed them in his pocket. Taylor told Miller he would drive the truck when it was fixed. Miller asked for the written instructions back and Taylor refused to return them to Miller.[6] Miller then wrote out a second set of written instructions, showed them to Taylor, and told Taylor that if he did not drive the truck he was discharged. Taylor said he was going home, and left the office.

Before Taylor could leave Respondent's facility, he first had to perform some minor repair on his personal vehicle in Respondent's parking lot. While doing so, Miller came out to the parking lot and asked Taylor for the bills of lading for the load which he was to have taken that night. Taylor refused to give Miller the bills of lading, telling Miller to leave him alone, that he had had all he could stand.[7]

Another driver, Roland McLaurin, was called in to take the run which Taylor was to have taken to Monroe, Louisiana. McLaurin was told by dispatcher Miller that Taylor had refused to drive the truck because the steering mechanism would not adjust. McLaurin checked out the tractor, found that it would adjust to his satisfaction, and drove to Monroe and back without incident. It should be noted, however, that McLaurin weighs 200 pounds, while Taylor weighs approximately 240 pounds. McLaurin simply did not encounter the same problem experienced by Taylor.
